TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,

BY THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND, Fraunce, and Ireland Queene, defender of the faith: &c.

NDER hope of your highnes gratious and accuſtomed fauor, I haue preſumed to preſent here vnto your Maieſtie, Plutarkes lyues tranſlated, as a booke fit to be protected by your highnes, and meete to be ſet forth in Engliſhe. For vvho is fitter to giue countenance to ſo many great ſtates, than ſuch an highe and mightie Princeſſe? vvho is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, than she that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? vvho is fitter to authorize a vvorke of ſo great learning and vviſedome, than she vvhome all do honor as the Muſe of the vvorld? Therefore I humbly beſeech your Maieſtie, to ſuffer the ſimplenes of my tranſlation, to be couered vnder the amplenes of your highnes protection. For, moſt gracious Souereigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maieſties ſelfe, vvho are meeter to be the chiefe ſtorie, than a ſtudent therein, and can better vnderſtand it in Greeke, than any man can make it Engliſhe: yet I hope the common ſorte of your ſubiects, ſhall not onely profit them ſelues hereby, but alſo be animated to the better ſeruice of your Maieſtie. For amonge all the profane bookes, that are in reputacion at this day, there is none (your highnes beſt knovves) that teacheth ſo much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuocion to Princes, as theſe liues of Plutarke doe. Hovve many examples ſhall your ſubiects reade here, of ſeuerall perſons, and vvhole armyes, of noble and baſe, of younge and olde, that both by ſea & lande, at home and abroad, haue ſtrayned their vvits, not regarded their ſtates, ventured their perſons, caſt avvay their liues, not onely for the honor and ſafetie, but alſo for the pleaſure of their Princes?

Then vvell may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen Kings, vvhat should vve doe for Chriſtian Princes? If they haue done this for glorye, vvhat shoulde vve doe for religion? If they haue done this vvithout hope of heauen, vvhat should vve doe that looke for immortalitie? And ſo adding the encouragement of theſe exſamples, to the forvvardnes of their ovvne diſpoſitions: vvhat ſeruice is there in vvarre, vvhat honor in peace, vvhich they vvill not be ready to doe, for their vvorthy Queene?

And therefore that your highnes may giue grace to the booke, and the booke may doe his ſeruice to your Maieſtie: I haue tranſlated it out of French, and doe here moſt humbly preſent the ſame vnto your highnes, beſeeching your Maieſtie vvith all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errours of your moſt humble and obedient ſubiect and ſeruaunt, vvho prayeth God long to multiplye all graces and bleſſings vpon your Maieſtie. VVritten the ſixteene day of Ianuary. 1579.

Your Maieſties moſt humble and obedient ſeruaunt, Thomas North.

TO

To the Reader.

THE profit of ſtories, and the prayſe of the Author, are ſufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epiſtle to the Reader: So that I ſhall not neede to make many wordes thereof. And in deede if you will ſupply the defects of this tranſlation, with your owne diligence and good vnderſtanding: you ſhall not neede to truſt him, you may proue your ſelues, that there is no prophane ſtudye better then Plutarke. All other learning is priuate, fitter for Vniuerſities then cities, fuller of contemplacion than experience, more commēdable in the ſtudents them ſelues, than profitable vnto others. Whereas ſtories are fit for euery place, reache to all perſons, ſerue for all tymes, teache the liuing, reuiue the dead, ſo farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to ſee learning in noble mens liues, than to reade it in Philoſophers writings. Nowe for the Author, I will not denye but loue may deceiue me, for I muſt needes loue him with whome I haue taken ſo much payne: but I beleue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitableſt ſtory of all Authors. For all other were fayne to take their matter, as the fortune of the contries whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath choſen the ſpeciall actes of the beſt perſons, of the famoſeſt nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your ſelues. My onely purpoſe is to deſire you to excuſe the faults of my tranſlation, with your owne gentlenes, and with the opinion of my diligence and good entent. And ſo I wiſhe you all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twenty day of Ianuary. 1579.

Amiot to the Readers.

THe reading of bookes vvhich bring but a vaine and vnprofitable pleaſure to the Reader, is iuſtly miſliked of vviſe and graue men. Againe, the reading of ſuch as doe but onely bring profit, and make the Reader to be in loue therevvith, and doe not eaſe the payne of the reading by ſome pleaſauntnes in the ſame: doe ſeeme ſomevvhat harshe to diuers delicate vvits, that can not tary long vpon them. But ſuch bookes as yeeld pleaſure and profit, and doe both delight and teache, haue all that a man can deſire vvhy they ſhould be vniuerſally liked and allovved of all ſortes of men, according to the common ſaying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight, Doth winne the price in euery poynt aright.

Eyther of theſe yeeld his effect the better, by reaſon the one runneth vvith the other, profiting the more bicauſe of the delight, and deliting the more bicauſe of the profit. This commendacion (in my opinion) is moſt proper to the reading of ſtories, to haue pleaſure and profit matched together, vvhich kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this vviſe arme in arme, hath more allovvance then any other kind of vvriting or inuention of man. In reſpect vvhereof it may be reaſonably auovved, that men are more beholding to ſuch good vvits, as by their graue and vviſe vvriting haue deſerued the name of Hiſtoriographers, then they are to any other kind of vvriters: bicauſe an hiſtorie is an orderly regiſter of notable things ſaid, done, or happened in time paſt, to mainteyne the continuall remembrance of them, and to ſerue for the inſtruction of them to come.

And like as memorie is as a ſtorehouſe of mens conceits and deuiſes, vvithout the vvhich the actions of the other tvvo parts ſhould be vnperfect, and vvelneare vnprofitable: So may it alſo be ſayd, that an hiſtorie is the very treaſury of mans life, vvhereby the notable doings and ſayings of men, and the vvonderfull aduentures & ſtraunge caſes (vvhich the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preſerued from the death of forgetfulnes. Hereuppon it riſeth, that Plato the vviſe ſayth, that the name of hiſtorie vvas giuen to this recording of matters, to ſtay the fleting of our memorie, vvhich othervviſe vvould be ſoone loſt, and retaine litle. And vve may vvell perceiue hovv greatly vve be beholding vnto it, if vve doe no more but conſider in hovv horrible darkenes, and in hovv beaſtly and peſtilent a quamyre of ignorance vve ſhould be plunged: if the remembrance of all the thinges that haue bene done, and haue happened before vve vvere borne, vvere vtterly drovvned and forgotten. Novv therefore I vvill ouerpaſſe the excellencie and vvorthines of the thing it ſelfe, foraſmuch as it is not onely of more antiquitie then any other kind of vvriting that euer vvas in the vvorlde, but alſo vvas vſed among men, before there vvas any vſe of letters at all: bicauſe that men in thoſe daies deliuered in their lifetimes the remembrance of things paſt to their ſucceſſors, in ſonges, vvhich they cauſed their children to learne by hart, from hand to hand, as is to be ſeene yet in our dayes, by the example of the barbarous people that inhabite the nevvfound landes in the VVeſt, vvho vvithout any records of vvritings, haue had the knovvledge of thinges paſt, vvelneare eight hundred yeares afore. Likevviſe I leaue to diſcourſe, that it is the ſureſt, ſafeſt, and durableſt monument that men can leaue of their doings in this vvorld, to conſecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arche of triumph, nor piller, nor ſumptuous ſepulchre, that can match the durablenes of an eloquēt hiſtory, furniſhed vvith the properties vvhich it ought to haue. Again, I mind not to ſtand much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alvvayes profeſſeth to ſpeake truth, & for that the proper groūd therof is to treate of the greateſt & higheſt things that are done in the vvorld: inſomuch that (to my ſeeming) the great profit thereof is as Horace ſayth, that it is commonly called the mother of trothe & vprightnes, vvhich commendeth it ſo greatly, as it nedeth not elſvvhere to ſeeke any authoritye, or ornament of dignitie, but of her very ſelfe. For it is a certaine rule and inſtruction, vvhich by examples paſt, teacheth vs to iudge of things preſent, & to foreſee things to come: ſo as vve may knovve vvhat to like of, & vvhat to follovv, vvhat to miſlike, and vvhat to eſchevv. It is a picture, vvhich (as it vvere in a table) ſetteth before our eyes the things vvorthy of remembrance that haue haue bene done in olde time by mighty nations, noble kings & Princes, vvise gouernors, valiant Captaines, & persons renovvmed for some notable quality, representing vnto vs the maners of straunge nations, the lavves & customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their consultations & enterprises, the meanes that they haue vsed to compasse the vvithall, & their demeaning of themselues vvhen they vvere comen to the highest, or throvven dovvne to the lovvest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or vvarre, in publike or priuate affaires, but that the person vvhich shall haue diligently red, vvell conceiued, & throughly remembred histories, shall find matter in them vvhereat to take light, & counsell vvherby to resolue himselfe to take a part, or to geue aduice vnto others, hovv to choose in doutfull & daungerous cases that, vvhich may be for their most profit, and in time to find out to vvhat poynt the matter vvill come if it be vvell handled: and hovv to moderate himselfe in prosperitie, and hovv to cheere vp and beare himselfe in aduersitie. These things it doth vvith much greater grace, efficacy, and speede, than the bookes of morall Philosophie doe: forasmuch as examples are of more force to moue and instruct, than are the arguments and proofes of reason, or their precise precepts, bicause examples be the very formes of our deedes, & accompanied vvith all circumstances. VVhereas reasons and demonstrations are generall, and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into vnderstanding: and examples tende to the shovving of them in practise and execution, bicause they doe not only declare vvhat is to be done, but also vvorke a desire to do it, as vvell in respect of a certaine naturall inclination vvhich all men haue to follovv examples, as also for the beavvtie of vertue, vvhich is of such povver, that vvhersoeuer she is seene, she maketh her selfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things vvith greater vveight and grauitie, than the inuentions & deuices of the Poets: bicause it helpeth not it selfe vvith any other thing than vvith the plaine truth, vvheras Poetry doth commonly inrich things by commending them aboue the starres and their deseruing, bicause the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreouer, it doth thinges vvith more grace and modestie than the ciuill lavves and ordinances doe: bicause it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, than to chastise or punish. And yet for all this, an historie also hath his maner of punishing the vvicked, by the reproch of euerlasting infamie, vvherevvith it defaceth their remembrance, vvhich is a great meane to vvithdravv them from vice, vvho other vvise vvould be levvdly and vvickedly disposed. Likevvise on the contrarie parte, the immortall praise and glorie vvherevvith it revvardeth vvelldoers, is a very liuely & sharpe spurre for men of noble corage and gentlemanlike nature, to cause them to aduenture vpon all maner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high corage and vvisedom, vvho for desire to continue the remembraunce of their name, by the sure and certaine recorde of histories, haue vvillingly yeelded their liues to the seruice of the common vveale, spent their goods, susteined infinite peines both of bodie and minde in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lavves and gouernments, and in the finding out of artes and sciences necessarie for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull registring vvhereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue seeke no revvard of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe vvith the conscience of her vvell doing: yet notvvithstanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to dravv men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honor of their vertuous deedes, seeing that honor doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the shadovv doth the bodie. For vve commonly see, not to feele the sparkes of desire of honor, is an infallible signe of a base, vile and cloynish nature: and that such as account it an vnnecessarie, needelesse, or vnseemely thing to be praised, are likevvise no doers of any things vvorthy of praise, but are commonly men of faint corage, vvhose thoughtes extend no further than to their liues, vvhereof also they haue no further remembraunce, than is before their eyes. But if the counsell of olde men be to be greatlie esteemed, bicause they must needes haue seene much by reason of their long life: and if they that haue trauelled long in straunge countries, and haue had the managing of many affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this vvorld, are reputed for sage, and vvorthie to haue the reynes of great gouernmentes put into their handes: hovv greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, vvhich is able to furnishe vs vvith mo examples in one day, than the vvhole course of the longest life of any man is able to doe? Insomuch that they vvhich exercise themselues in reading as they ought to doe, although they be but young, become such in respect of vnderstanding of the affaires of this vvorld, as if they vvere old and grayheaded, and of long experience. Yea though they neuer haue remoued out of their houſes, yet are they aduertiſed, informed, and ſatisfied of all things in the vvorld, as vvell as they that haue shortned their liues by innumerable trauells and infinite daungers, in ronning ouer the vvhole earth that is inhabited: vvhereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that vvere done & come to paſſe before they vvere borne, continue ſtil as children, though they be neuer ſo aged, and are but as ſtraungers in their ovvne natiue contries. To be short, it may be truely ſayd, that the reading of hiſtories is the ſchole of vviſedom, to facion mens vnderſtanding, by conſidering aduiſedly the ſtate of the vvorld that is paſt, and by marking diligently by vvhat lavves, maners, and diſcipline, Empires, kingdoms and dominions, haue in old time bene ſtablished, and after vvard mainteyned and increaſed: or contrarivviſe chaunged, diminished, and ouerthrovven. Alſo vve reade, that vvhenſoeuer the right ſage and vertuous Emperour of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, vvas to conſult of any matter of great importance, vvhether it concerned vvarres or gouernment: he alvvayes called ſuch to counſell, as vvere reported to be vvell ſeene in hiſtories. Notvvithſtanding, I knovv there are that vvill ſtand againſt me in this poynt, and vphold that the reading of hiſtories can ſerue to ſmall purpoſe, or none at all, tovvards the getting of skill: bicauſe skill conſiſteth in action, & is ingendred by the very experience & practiſe of things, vvhē a man doth vvel marke & throughly beare avvay the things that he hath ſeene vvith his eyes, & found true by proofe, according to the ſaying of the aūcient Poet Afranius.

My name is skill, my Syre Experience hyght,
And memorie bred and brought me forth to lyght.

VVhich thing vvas ment likevviſe by the Philoſopher that ſayd, that the hand is the inſtrument of skill. By reaſon vvhereof it comes to paſſe (ſay they) that ſuch as ſpeake of matters of gouernment and ſtate, but ſpecially of matters of vvarre by the booke, ſpeake but as booke knights, as the Frenche prouerbe termeth them, after the manner of the Græcians, vvho call him a booke Pilot, vvhich hath not the ſure and certaine knovvledge of the things that he ſpeakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to truſt to the vnderſtanding vvhich he hath gotten by reading, in things that conſiſt in the deede doing, vvhere the hand is to be ſet to the vvorke: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reaſon of paynting, or the diſputing vppon colors, vvithout taking of the penſill in hand, can ſtand a man in any ſtead at all to make him a good paynter. But on the contrary part, many haue proued vviſe men and good Captaines, vvhich could neither vvrite nor reade. Beſides this, they alleage further, that in matters of vvarre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes vvhereof the ſlights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, vvill ſerue the turne no more than mynes that are blovven vp. According vvhereunto Cambyſes telleth his ſonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Muſicke the nevveſt ſongs are commonly beſt liked of for once, bicauſe they vvere neuer heard afore: So in the vvarres, thoſe policies that neuer vvere practiſed afore, are thoſe that take beſt ſucceſſe, & commonly haue the beſt effect, bicauſe the enemies doe leaſt doubt of them. Neuertheleſſe I am not he that vvill mainteyne that a vviſe gouernor of a common vveale, or a great Captaine can be made of ſuch a perſon, as hath neuer trauelled out of his ſtudy, and from his bookes: hovvbeit that vvhich Cicero vvriteth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that vvhen he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieuetenant of the Romanes, to make vvarre againſt kinge Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the vvarres, and yet after vvard he beſtovved ſo great diligence in the reading of hiſtories, and in conferring vppon euery poynt vvith the olde Captaines and men of longe experience, vvhome he caried vvith him, that by the tyme of his comming into Aſia, vvhere he vvas in deede to put his matters in execution, he vvas found to be a very ſufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: inſomuch that by thoſe vvayes, cleane contrary to the common order of vvarre, he diſcomfited tvvo of the moſt puyſſant, and greateſt Princes that vvere at that time in the Eaſt. For his vnderſtanding vvas ſo quicke, his care ſo vigilant, and his courage ſo greate, that he needed no longe trayning, nor groſſe inſtruction by experience. And although I graunt there haue beene diuerſe Gouernors and Captaynes, vvhich by the onely force of nature (furthered by longe continevved experience) haue done goodly and greate exployes: yet can it not be denyed me, but that if they had matched the giftes of nature vvith the knovvledge of learning, and the reading of hiſtories, they might haue done much greater thinges, and they might haue becomen much more perfect. For like as in euery other cunning & skill vvherein a man intendeth to excell: ſo alſo to become a perfect & ſufficient perſon to gouerne

in peace and vvarre, there are three thinges of neceſsitie required, namely, nature, art, and practiſe. Nature (in the caſe that vve treate of) muſt furniſhe vs vvith a good moother vvit, vvith a bodie vvell diſpoſed to indure all maner of trauell, and vvith a good vvill to aduaunce our ſelues: Art muſt geue vs iudgement and knovvledge, gotten by the examples and vviſe diſcourſes that vve haue read and double read in good hiſtories: and practiſe vvill get vs readineſſe, aſſuredneſſe, and the eaſe hovvto put thinges in execucion. For though skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a vertue of the minde vvhich teacheth a man the meane poynt, betvvene the tvvo faultie extremities of too much and too litle, vvherein the commendation of all doinges conſiſteth. And vvhoſoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely triall of experience, and had leuer to learne it at his ovvne coſt, than at an other mans: he may vvell be of the number of thoſe that are touched by this auncient prouerbe, vvhich ſayth, Experience is the ſchoolemiſtreſſe of fooles: bicauſe mans life is ſo short, and experience is hard and daungerous, ſpecially in matters of vvarre, vvherein (according to the ſaying of Tamachus the Athenian Captaine) a man can not fault tvvice, bicauſe the faultes are ſo great, that moſt commonly they bring vvith them the ouerthrovv of the ſtate, or the loſſe of the liues of thoſe that do them. Therefore vve muſt not tary for this vvit that is vvon by experience, vvhich coſteth ſo deere, and is ſo long a comming, that a man is oftimes dead in the ſeeking of it before he haue attained it, ſo as he had neede of a ſeconde life to imploy it in, bicauſe of the ouerlate comming by it. But vve muſt make ſpeede by our diligent and continuall reading of hiſtories both old and nevv, that vve may enioy this happineſſe vvhich the Poet ſpeaketh of t

Three things neceſſary for a Magiſtrate, or Captaine.

Prouerbe.

A happie wight is he that by miſhappes
Of others, doth beware of afterclappes.

By the vvay, as concerning thoſe that ſay that paper vvill beare all things: if there be any that vnvvorthily take vpon them the name of hiſtoriographers, and deface the dignity of the ſtory for hatred or fauor, by mingling any vntrueth vvith it: that is not the fault of the hiſtorie, but of the men that are partiall, vvho abuſe that name vnvvorthily, to couer and cloke their ovvne paſsions vvithall, vvhich thing ſhall neuer come to paſſe, if the vvriter of the ſtorie haue the properties that are neceſſarily required in a ſtorie vvriter, as theſe: That he ſet aſide all affection, be voyde of enuy, hatred, and flattery: that he be a man experienced in the affaires of the vvorld, of good vtterance, and good iudgement to diſcerne vvhat is to be ſayd, and vvhat to be left vnſayd, & vvhat vvould do more harme to haue it declared, than do good to haue it reproued or condemned: foraſmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to ſerue the common vveale, and that he is but as a regiſter to ſet dovvne the iudgements and definitiue ſentences of Gods Court, vvhereof ſome are geuen according to the ordinarie courſe and capacitie of our vveake naturall reaſon, and other ſome goe according to Gods infinite povver and incomprehenſible vviſedom, aboue and againſt all diſcourſe of mans vnderſtanding, vvho being vnable to reach to the bottome of his iudgements, and to finde out the firſt motions and groundes thereof, do impute the cauſe of them to a certaine fortune, vvhich is nought elſe but a fained deuice of mans vvit, dazeled at the beholding of ſuch brightneſſe, and confounded at the gaging of ſo bottomleſſe a deepe, hovvbeit nothing commeth to paſſe nor is done vvithout the leaue of him that is the verie right and trueth it ſelfe, vvith vvhom nothing is paſt or to come, and vvho knovveth and vnderſtandeth the very originall cauſes of all neceſsitie. The conſideration vvhereof teacheth men to humble them ſelues vnder his mightie hande by acknovvledging that there is one firſt cauſe vvhich ouerruleth nature, vvhereof it commeth, that neither hardineſſe is alvvaies happie, nor vviſedom alvvaies ſure of good ſucceſſe. Theſe ſo notable commodities are euery vvhere accompanied vvith ſingular delight, vvhich proceedeth chiefly of diuerſitie and nouelty vvherein our nature delighteth and is greatly deſirous of: bicauſe vve hauing an earneſt inclination tovvards our beſt proſperity and aduaunceement, it goeth on ſtill, ſeeking it in euery thing vvhich it taketh to be goodly, or good in this vvorld. But foraſmuch as it findeth not vvherevvith to content it ſelfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is ſoone vveary of the things that it had earneſtly deſired affore, & ſo goeth on vvãdring in the vnskilfulnes of her likings vvherof she neuer ceaſſeth to make a continuall chaunging vntill she haue fully ſatisfied her deſires, by attaining to the laſt end, vvhich is to be knit to her chiefe felicity, vvhere is the full perfection of all goodlines and goodnes. This liking of varietie can not be better releeued, than by that vvhich is the finder out and the preſeruer of time, the father of all noueltie, and meſſenger of antiquitie. For if vve finde

a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in hearkening to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and doe report things vvhich they haue ſeene in ſtraunge contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of liues, differing from ours: and if vve be ſometime ſo rauished vvith delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome vviſe, diſcreete, and vvell ſpoken old man, from vvhoſe mouth there flovveth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſvveeter than honnie, in rehearſing the aduentures vvhich he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath ouerpaſſed, ſo as vve perceiue not hovv the time goeth avvay: hovv much more ought vve be rauished vvith delight and vvondring, to behold the ſtate of mankind, and the true ſucceſſe of things, vvhich antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the vvorld, as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrovv of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of Kingdoms, and all things elſe vvorthie admiration, and the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the very reading of them vve feele our mindes to be ſo touched by them, not as though the thinges vvere alreadie done and paſt, but as though they vvere euen then preſently in doing, and vve finde our ſelues caried avvay vvith gladneſſe and griefe through feare or hope, vvell neere as though vve vvere then at the doing of them: vvhereas notvvithſtanding vve be not in any paine or daunger, but only conceiue in our mindes the aduerſities that other folkes haue indured, our ſelues ſitting ſafe vvith our contentation and eaſe, according to theſe verſes of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleaſure for to ſit at eaſe
Vpon the land, and ſafely thence to ſee
How other folkes are toſſed on the ſeaes,
That with the bluſtring windes turmoyled be.
Not that the ſight of others miſeries
Doth any way the honeſt hart delight,
But for bicauſe it liketh well our eyes,
To ſee harmes free that on our ſelues might light.

Alſo it is ſeene that the reading of hiſtories doth ſo holde and allure good vvits, that diuers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleaſures, but alſo ſerueth very fittely to turne avvay their griefes, and ſomtimes alſo to remedie their diſeaſes. As for example, vve find it vvritten of Alphonſus King of Naples, that Prince ſo greatly renovvmed in Chronicles for his vviſedom and goodneſſe, that being ſore ſicke in the citie of Capua, vvhen his Phiſitions had ſpent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he ſavv that nothing preuailed: he determined vvith him ſelfe to take no mo medicines, but for his recreacion cauſed the ſtorie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be red before him: at the hearing vvhereof he tooke ſo vvonderfull pleaſure, that nature gathered ſtrength by it, and ouercame the vvayvvardnes of his diſeaſe. VVhereupon hauing ſoone recouered his helth, he diſcharged his Phiſitions vvith ſuch vvords as theſe: Feaſt me no more vvith your Hippocrates and Galene, ſith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my helth: but vvell fare Quintus Curtius that could ſo good skill to helpe me to recouer my helth. Novv if the reading and knovvledge of hiſtories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I ſay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, bicauſe they haue to do vvith charges of greateſt vveight and difficultie, to be beſt ſtored vvith giftes and knovvledge for the diſcharge of their dueties: ſeeing the ground of ſtories is, to treate of all maner of high matters of ſtate, as vvarres, battells, cities, contries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it ſeemeth more fit for them, than for any other kinde of degrees of men: bicauſe they being bred and brought vp tenderly, and at their eaſe, by reaſon of the great regard and care that is had of their perſons, (as meete is for ſo great ſtates to haue) they take not ſo great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth thoſe to take vvhich vvill learne the noble auncient languages, and the painfull doctrine comprehended in Philoſophie. Againe, vvhen they come to mans ſtate, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, ſo as there remaineth no exerciſe of vvit more conuenient for thē, than the reading of hiſtories in their ovvne tunge, vvhich vvithout paine is able to teache them euen vvith great pleaſure and eaſe, vvhatſoeuer the painfull vvorkes of the Philoſophers concerning the gouernment of common vveales can shevve them, to make them skilful in the vvell ruling and gouerning of the people and contries that God hath put vnder their ſubiection. But the vvorſt is, that they euer (or for the moſt part) haue ſuch maner of perſons

about them as seeke nothing els but to please them by all the vvayes they can, and there are very fevv that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: vvhereas on the contrary part, an history flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of such as vvere like them in greatnesse of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalereus (a man renovvmed as vvell for his skill in the good gouernment of a common vveale, as for his excellent knovvledge other vvise) counselled Ptolomy, first king of AEgypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the gouernment of kingdomes, bicause (sayd he) thou shalt finde many things there, vvhich thy seruaunts and familiar friendes dare not tell thee. Moreoner, this is another thinge, that suche great personages can not easily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to goe vievv straunge contries as priuate persons doe: bicause the ielousie of their estate, and the regarde of their dignitie, requires that they should neuer be in place vvhere another man might cõmaund them. And often times for vvant of hauing seene the contries, and knovven the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue aduentured vppon attempts vvithout good ground: to auoyde the vvhich, the instruction they may haue by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there vvere none other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, vvherein are vvritten the heroitall deedes of vvise and valiant men, specially of kings that haue bene before them, the considering vvhereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially vvhich vvere of stately and noble courage: bicause the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred vvith them selues, doe then quicken them vp vvith an emulacion tovvards those that haue bene or are equall in degree vvith them, as vvell in respect of noblenes of bloud, as of greatnes of state, so as they be loth to giue place to any person, and much lesse can find in their harts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doinges. VVhereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing vvere not so vvel knovven of it self, that it vvere much more against reason to doubt of it, than needefull to proue it. Therefore a man may truely conclude, that an historie is the scholemistresse of Princes, at vvhose hand they may vvithout payne, in vvay of pastyme, & vvith singular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belonge to their office. Novv, according to the diuersitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of vvriting that it vseth, it hath sondry names giuen vnto it: But yet among the rest there are tvvo chiefe kinds. The one vvhich setteth dovvne mens doings and aduentures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other vvhich declareth their natures, sayings, and maners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both doe cloze very neare in one, yet doth the one respect more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more priuate: the one concerneth more the things that are vvithout the man, and the other the things that proceede from vvithin: the one the euents, the other the consultacions: betvvene the vvhich there is oftentymes great oddes, according to this aunsvver of the Persian Siramnes, to such as maruelled hovv it came to passe, that his deuises being so politike had so vnhappy succesSe: It is (quod he) bicause my deuises are vvholly from my ovvn inuention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of fortune and the king. And surely amonge all those that euer haue taken vppon them to vvrite the lines of famous men, the chiefe prerogatiue, by the iudgement of such as are cleerest sighted, is iustly giuen to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chæronea in the contry of Bœotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knovvledge, as his vvorkes may vvell put men out of doubt, if they lyst to read them through, vvho all his life long euen to his old age, had to deale in affayres of the common vveale, as he him selfe vvitnesseth in diuers places, specially in the treatise vvhich he intitled, VVhether an olde man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common weale or not: and vvho had the hap & honor to be schoolemaster to the Emprour Traian, as is commonly beleeued, and as is expresSely pretended by a certaine Epistle set before the Latin translation of his matters of state, vvhich (to say the truth) seemeth in my iudgement to be somevvhat suspicious, bicause I find it not among his vvorkes in Greeke, besides that it speaketh as though the booke vvere dedicated to Traian, vvhich thinge is manifestly disproued by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reasons. Yet notvvithstanding, bicause me thinkes it is vvisely & gravely vvritten, and vvell beseeming him: I haue set it dovvne here in this place. Plutarke vnto Traian sendeth greeting. I knovv vvell that the modestie of your nature vvas not desirous of Soueraintie, though you haue alvvayes indevvored to deserue it by your honorable conuersation: by reason

a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in hearkening to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and doe report things vvhich they haue ſeene in ſtraunge contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of liues, differing from ours: and if vve be ſometime ſo rauished vvith delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome vviſe, diſcreete, and vvell ſpoken old man, from vvhoſe mouth there flovveth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſvveeter than honnie, in rehearſing the aduentures vvhich he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath ouerpaſſed, ſo as vve perceiue not hovv the time goeth avvay: hovv much more ought vve be rauished vvith delight and vvondring, to behold the ſtate of mankind, and the true ſucceſſe of things, vvhich antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the vvorld, as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrovv of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of Kingdoms, and all things elſe vvorthie admiration, and the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the very reading of them vve feele our mindes to be ſo touched by them, not as though the thinges vvere alreadie done and paſt, but as though they vvere euen then preſently in doing, and vve finde our ſelues caried avvay vvith gladneſſe and griefe through feare or hope, vvell neere as though vve vvere then at the doing of them: vvhereas notvvithſtanding vve be not in any paine or daunger, but only conceiue in our mindes the aduerſities that other folkes haue indured, our ſelues ſitting ſafe vvith our contentation and eaſe, according to theſe verſes of the Poet Lucretius:

Vpon the land, and ſafely thence to ſee
How other folkes are toſſed on the ſeaes,
That with the bluſtring windes turmoyled be.
Not that the ſight of others miſeries
Doth any way the honeſt hart delight,
But for bicauſe it liketh well our eyes,
To ſee harmes free that on our ſelues might light.

Alſo it is ſeene that the reading of hiſtories doth ſo holde and allure good vvits, that diuers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleaſures, but alſo ſerueth very fittely to turne avvay their griefes, and ſomtimes alſo to remedie their diſeaſes. As for example, vve find it vvritten of Alphonſus King of Naples, that Prince ſo greatly renovvmed in Chronicles for his vviſedom and goodneſſe, that being ſore ſicke in the citie of Capua, vvhen his Phiſitions had ſpent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he ſavv that nothing preuailed: he determined vvith him ſelfe to take no mo medicines, but for his recreation cauſed the ſtorie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be red before him: at the hearing vvhereof he tooke ſo vvonderfull pleaſure, that nature gathered ſtrength by it, and ouercame the vvayvvardnes of his diſeaſe. VVhereupon hauing ſoone recouered his helth, he diſcharged his Phiſitions vvith ſuch vvords as theſe: Feaſt me no more vvith your Hippocrates and Galene, ſith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my helth: but vvell fare Quintus Curtius that could ſo good skill to helpe me to recouer my helth. I knovv vvell that the modestie of your nature vvas not desirous of Soueraintie, though you haue alvvayes indevvored to deserue it by your honorable conuersation: by reason

» vvhereof you haue bene thought ſo much the vvorthier of it, as you haue bene founde the further of » from all ambition. And therefore I do novv reioice in your vertue & my fortune, if it be ſo great as to » cauſe you to adminiſter that thing vvith iuſtice, vvhich you haue obtained by deſert. For othervviſe » I am ſure you haue put your ſelfe in hazard of great daungers, and me in perill of ſlaunderous tongues, » bicauſe Rome can not avvay vvith a vvicked Emperour, and the common voyce of the people is al-» vvaies vvont to caſt the faultes of the ſchollers in the teeth of their ſchoolemaiſters: as for example: » Seneca is railed vpon by ſlaunderous tonges, for the faultes of his ſcholler Nero: the ſcapes of Quinti-» lians young ſchollers are imputed to Quintilian him ſelfe: and Socrates is blamed, for being too myld » to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you ſhall doe all things vvell enough, ſo you keepe you as you » are. If you firſt ſet your ſelfe in order, and then diſpoſe all other things according to vertue, all things » ſhall fall out according to your deſire. I haue ſet you dovvne the meanes in vvriting, vvhich you muſt » obſerue for the vvell gouerning of your common vveale, and haue shevved you of hovv great force » your behauiour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follovv thoſe thinges, you haue Plutarke » for the directer and guider of your life: if not, I proteſt vnto you by this Epiſtle, that your falling into » daunger to the ouerthrovv of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiſtle vvitneſſeth plainly that he vvas the ſchoolemaiſter of Traian, vvhich thing ſeemeth to be auovved by this vvriting of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Chæronea in Bœotia, vvas in the time of the Em-perour Traian, and ſomvvhat affore. But Traian honored him vvith the dignitie of Conſulship, and commaunded the officers and Magiſtrates that vvere throughout all the contrie of Illyria, that they ſhould not do any thing vvithout his counſell and authoritie. So doth Suidas vvrite of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being ſo vviſe an Emperour, vvould neuer haue done him ſo great honor, if he had not thought him ſelfe greatly beholding to him for ſome ſpeciall cauſe. But the thing that maketh me moſt to beleue it true, is, that the ſame goodneſſe and iuſtice appeared to be naturally imprinted in moſt of Traians ſayings and doings, vvhereof the paterne and movvld (as a man might terme it) is caſt and ſet dovvne in Plutarkes Moralls, ſo as men may perceiue expreſſely, that the one could vvell skill to performe rightly, that vvhich the other had taught vviſely. For Dion vvriteth, that among other honors vvhich the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that euen vnto his time, vvhen a nevv Emperour came to be receiued of the Senate, among the cries of good hanſell, and the vvishes of good lucke that vvere made vnto him, one vvas: happier be thou than Auguſtus, and better than Traian. Hovvſoeuer the caſe ſtoode, it is very certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But vvhen he had liued a long time at Rome, and vvas come home againe to his ovvne houſe, he fell to vvriting of this excellent vvorke of Liues, vvhich he calleth Parallelon, as much to ſay, as a cupling or matching together, bicauſe he matcheth a Grecian vvith a Romane, ſetting dovvne their liues ech after other, and comparing them together, as he founde any likeneſſe of nature, condicions, or aduentures betvvext them, and examining vvhat the one of them had better or vvorſer, greater or leſſer than the other: vvhich things he doth vvith ſo goodly and graue diſcourſe euery vvhere, taken out of the deepeſt & moſt hidden ſecrets of morall and naturall Philoſophie, vvith ſo ſage precepts and frute-full inſtructions, vvith ſo effectuall commendation of vertue, and deteſtation of vice, vvith ſo many goodly allegacions of other authors, vvith ſo many fit compariſons, & vvith ſo many high inuentions:
that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treaſorie of all rare and perfect learning, than by any other name. Alſo it is ſayd, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of ſingular learning, and a vvorthie of the auncient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar frendes (vvhich ſavv him ſo ear-neſtly giuen to his ſtudie, that he forgate all other things) vvhat author he had leuereſt to chooſe, if he vvere at that poynt that he muſt needes chooſe ſome one to holde him to alone, did aunſvvere that he vvould chooſe Plutarke: bicauſe that if they vvere all put together, there vvas no one both ſo profitable, and ſo pleaſaunt to read, as he. Soſius Senecio to vvhom he dedicateth his vvorke, vvas a Senator of Rome, as vvitneſſeth Dion, vvho vvriteth that the three perſons vvhom Traian moſt loued and honored, vvere Soſius, Parma, and Celſus, inſomuch that he cauſed images of them to be ſet vp.
True it is that he vvrote the liues of many other men, vvhich the ſpitefulnes of time hath bereft vs of, among vvhich he himſelfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, & Metellus Numidi-cus. And I haue red a litle Epiſtle of a ſonne of his, vvhoſe name is not expreſſed, copied out of an olde

copie in the Libarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a frende of his, a register of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the cupples of liues, he setteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly the liues of Augustus Cæsar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing vsed all the diligence that I could in serching the chiefe Libraries of Venice, and Rome, I could neuer find them out. Onely I drewe out certaine diuersities of readinges, and many corrections by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue stoode me in great stead to the vnderstanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I haue restored by coniecture, by the iudgement & helpe of such men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine some places vnamended, howbeit very fewe, bicause some lines were wanting in the originall copies, whereof (to my seeming) it was better for me to witnesse the want by marking it with some starre: than to gesse at it with all aduenture, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, if I haue ouershot my selfe in any thing, as it is verie easie to do in so hard and long a worke, specially to a man of so small abilitie as I am: I beseeche the Readers to vouchsafe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he sayth:

A man may well be ouerseene
In workes that long and tedious bene.

Specially sith that of so many good men, & men of skill as haue heretofore set hand to the translating of it, there was neuer yet any one found that went through with it in any language, at least wise that I haue seene or heard of: and that such as haue enterprised to translate it, specially into Latin, haue euidently witnessed the hardnesse thereof, as they may easely perceiue which list to conferre their translations with mine. Neuertheles if it so fortune that men find not the speech of this translation so flowing, as they haue found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I beseech the readers to consider, that the office of a fit translater, consisteth not onely in the faithfull expresing of his authors meaning, but also in a certaine resembling and shadowing out of the forme of his style and the manner of his speaking: vnlesse he will commit the errour of some painters, who hauing taken vpon them to drawe a man liuely, do paint him long where he should be short, and grosse where he should be slender, and yet set out the resemblance of his countenance naturally. For howe harsh or rude soeuer my speech be, yet am I sure that my translation will be much easier to my contriemen, than the Greeke copie is, euen to such as are best practised in the Greeke tonge, by reason of Plutarkes peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather sharpe, learned, and short, than plaine, polished, and easie. At the hardest, although I haue not compassed my matters so happily as ye coulde haue wished and desired: yet do I hope that your Lordships in reading it will hold the parties good will excused, which hath taken such paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labor be so happie, as to content you: God be praised for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finish it.

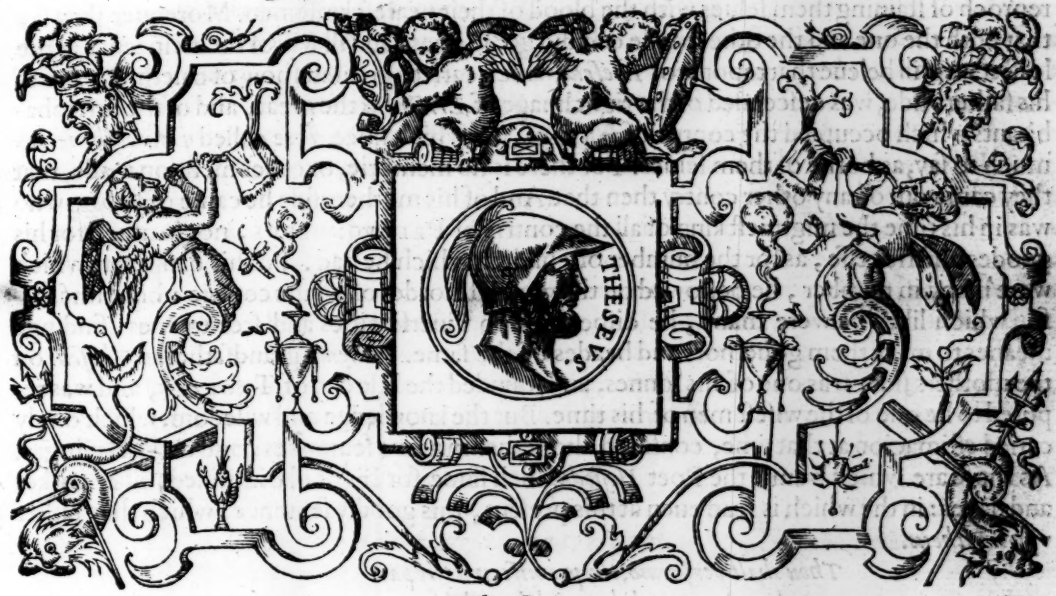
THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GRECIANS AND ROMANES, COMPARED TOGETHER BY THAT graue learned Philoſopher and Hiſtoriographer, Plutarche of Chœronea.



Theſeus.

A LIKE as hiſtoriographers deſcribing the world (frende Soſsius Senecio) doe of purpoſe referre to the vttermoſt partes of their mappes the farre diſtant regions whereof they be ignoraunt, with this note: theſe contries are by meanes of ſandes and drowthes vnnauigable, rude, full of venimous beaſtes, SCYTHIAN iſe, and froſen ſeas. Euen ſo may I (which in comparinge noble mens liues haue already gone ſo farre into antiquitie, as the true and certaine hiſtorie could lead me) of the reſt, being thinges paſt all proofe or chalenge, very well ſay: that beyonde this time all is full of ſuſpicion and dout, being deliuered vs by Poets and Tragedy makers, ſometimes without trueth and likelihoode, and alwayes B without certainty. Howbeit, hauing heretofore ſet foorth the liues of Lycurgus (which eſtabliſhed the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS) and of king Numa Pompilius: me thought I might go a litle further to the life of Romulus, ſence I was come ſo nere him. But conſidering my ſelfe as the Poet AEſchilus did:

Soſsius Senecio a Senator of Rome.

VVhat champion may vvith ſuch a man compare?
or vvho (thinke I) ſhalbe againſt him ſet?
VVho is ſo bold? or vvho is he that dare defend his force, in ſuch encounter met?

In the end I reſolued to match him which did ſet vp the noble & famous city of Athens, A with him which founded the glorious and inuincible city of Rome. Wherein I would wiſhe that the inuentions of Poets, and the traditions of fabulous antiquitie, would ſuffer them ſelues to be purged and reduced to the forme of a true and hiſtoricall reporte: but when they ſquare too much from likelyhode, and can not be made credible, the readers will of curteſie take in good parte that, which I could with moſt probability wryte of ſuch antiquities. Now Theſeus and Romulus very like. ſurely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many thinges was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by ſtealth, and out of lawful matrimony: both were reputed to be borne of the ſeede of the goddes.

Both valiant vvere, as all the vvorld doth knovv.

Both ioyned valiancy with gouernment. The one of them built Rome, and the other, by B gathering into one diſperſed people, erected the citie of Athens: two of the moſt noble cities of the worlde. The one and the other were rauiſhers of women: and neither thone nor thother coulde auoyde the miſchiefe of quarrell and contention with their frendes, nor the reproch of ſtaining them ſelues with the blood of their neareſt kinſemen. Moreouer, they ſay that both the one and the other in the end did get the hate and ill will of their citizens: at the were many in number, he beſtowed on the greateſt Lordes of all the contrie: his ſonnes al-

the mothers ſide, was one of his ſonnes, and founded the litle city of Troezen, and was reputed to be one of the wiſeſt men of his time. But the knowledge and wiſedom, which onely caried eſtimacion at that time, conſiſted altogether in graue ſentences, and morall ſayinges.
As thoſe are which wanne the Poet Heſiodus ſuch fame for his booke intituled, The workes and dayes: in the which is read euen at this preſent, this goodly ſentence, which they father D vpon Pitheus.

Thou ſhalt performe, thy promiſe and thy pay:

And this doth Ariſtotle the Philoſopher himſelfe teſtifie: and the Poet Euripides alſo, calling Hippolytus the ſcholler of the holy Pitheus, doth ſufficiently declare of what eſtimacion he was.
AEgeus the father of Theſeus. But AEgeus deſiring (as they ſay) to know how he might haue children, went vnto the city of Delphes to the oracle of Apollo: where by Apolloes Nunne that notable prophecy was geuen him for an aunſwer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to Athens. And bicauſe the words of this prophecy were ſomewhat darke, & hard: he tooke his way by the city of Troezen, to tell it vnto Pitheus. The wordes of the pro- E phecy were theſe.

O thou vvhich art a gemme of perfect grace, plucke not the tappe, out of thy truſty toonne: Before thou do, returne vnto thy place, in Athens tovvne, from vvhence thy race doth roonne.

A strength to remoue the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he left there: that she should then sende him vnto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body els might knowe of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which laye in wayte and spyall by all the meanes they could to kill him, only of despight bicause he had no children, they being fiftie brethern, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And Æthra within fewe moneths after was deliuered of a goodly sonne, the which from that time was called Theseus: and as some say, so called, bicause of the tokens of knowledge his father had layed vnder the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwardes at ATHENS when his father knewe him, and auowed him for his sonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie & childehood, he was brought vp in the house of his grādfather Pitheus, vnder the go-
B uernmēt & teaching of one called Cōnidas, his schoolemaster: in honour of whom the ATHENIANS to this daye doe sacrifice a weather, the daye before the great feaste of Theseus, hauing more reason to honour the memorye of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhasius, to whom they doe honour also, bicause they paynted and caste mowldes of the images of Theseus. Now there was a custome at that time in GREECE, that the yong men after their infancie and growth to mans state, went vnto the cittie of DELPHES, to offer parte of their heares in the temple of Apollo. Theseus also went thither as other did: and some saye that the place where the ceremonie of this offering was made, hath euer sence kept the olde name, (and yet continueth) Theseia. Howbeit he dyd not shaue his head but before only, as Homer sayeth, like the facion of the ABANTES in olde time: and this manner of shauing of heares, was called for C his sake, Theseida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in trothe they were the very first that shaued them selues after this facion: neuertheles they learned it not of the ARABIANS as it was thought of some, neither dyd they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS. But bicause they were warlike and valliant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the worlde were skilfulleſt in fight hande to hande, and woulde keepe their grounde: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses.

They vse no slynges in foughten fields to haue, nor bended bowes: but swords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to raue, then doe they deeds, right cruell to recompt.

For in this wise, the braue and warlike bande Doe shew their force which come from Negrepont.

The cause why they were thus shauen before, was, for that their enemies should not haue the vauntage to take them by the heares of the head while they were fighting. And for this selfe same consideration, Alexander the great commaunded his captaines to cause all the MACEDONIANS to shaue their beards: bicause it is the easiest holde (and readiest for the hande) a man can haue of his enemie in fighting, to holde him fast by the same. But to returne to Theseus. Æthra his mother had euer vnto that time kept it secret from him, who was his true fa-
E ther. And Pitheus also had geuen it out abroade, that he was begotten of Neptune, bicause the TROEZENIANS haue this god in great veneration, and doe worshippe him as patron and protector of their cittie, making offerings to him of their first fruites: and they haue for the marke and stampe of their money, the three picked mace, which is the signe of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was comen to the prime and lustines of his youth, and that with the strength of his bodie he shewed a great courage, ioyned with a naturall wisedome, and stayednes of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollowe stone laye, and telling him truely the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, & gaue him counsell to goe by sea to ATHENS vnto him. Theseus easily lyft vp the stone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: How-F beit he answered playnely, that he would not goe by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deale the safer waye, and that his mother and grandfather both had instantly intreated him, bicause the waye by lande from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very daungerous, all the wayes being beſett by robbers and murderers. For the worlde at that time brought forth men, which A for ſtrongneſſe in their armes, for ſwyftnes of feete, and for a generall ſtrength of the whole bodye, dyd farre paſſe the common force of others, and were neuer wearie for any labour or trauell they tooke in hande. But for all this, they neuer employed theſe giftes of nature to any honeſt or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanouſly to hurte and wronge others: as if all the fruite and profit of their extraordinary ſtrength had conſiſted in crueltye, & violence only, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in ſubiection, and to force, deſtroye, and ſpoyle all that came to their handes. Thincking that the more parte of thoſe which thincke it a ſhame to doe ill, and commend iuſtice, equitie, and humanitie, doe it of fainte cowardly heartes, bicauſe they dare not wronge others, for feare they ſhould receyue wronge them ſelues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vauntage ouer others, had no- B

All the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and ſecuritie from ſuch kynde of people. How- C beit in GRECE, and all thereabouts, theſe olde miſchiefes beganne againe to renue, growing hotter and violenter then before: bicauſe there was no man that puniſhed them, nor that durſt take vpon him to deſtroye them. By which occaſion, the waye to goe from PELOPONNESVS to ATHENS by lande was very perillous. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glorie of Hercules noble dedes, had long before ſecretly ſett his hearte on fire, ſo that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened vnto thoſe which woulde ſeeme to deſcribe him what manner of man he was, but chiefly vnto thoſe which had ſeene him, and bene in his companye, when he had ſayed or done any thing worthy of memorye. not lett him ſleepe. For euen ſo, the wonderfull admiration which Theſeus had of Hercules corage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the daye time, pricked forwardes with emulation and enuie of his glorie, he determined with him ſelfe one daye to doe the like, and the rather, bicauſe they were neere kynſemen, being coſins remoued by the mothers ſide. For Æthra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Theſeus and Hercules nere kynſemen.

Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyſidices, the which was halfe ſiſter to Pitheus, bothe children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he ſhould be vtterly ſhamed and diſgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the worlde in that ſorte, dyd E ſeeke out thoſe wicked theeues to rydde both ſea & lande of them: & that he, farre otherwiſe, ſhould flye occaſion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he ſhould meete on his waye. Moreouer, he was of opinion he ſhould greately ſhame and diſhonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in ſhonning occaſion to fight, he ſhould conuey him ſelfe by ſea, and ſhould carie to his true father alſo a paire of ſhooes, (to make him knowen of him) and a ſworde not yet bathed in bloude. Where he ſhould rather ſeeke cauſe, by manifeſt token of his worthie deedes, to make knowen to the worlde, of what noble bloude he came, and from whence he was deſcended. With this determination, Theſeus holdeth on his purpoſed iorney, with intent to hurte no man, yet to de-

So he firſt ſtrake at Theſeus to make him ſtande: but Theſeus fought ſo luſtely with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was ſo glad, and chiefly for that he had wonne his clubbe, that euer after he caryed it him ſelfe about with him, as Hercules dyd the lyons ſkynne. And like as this ſpoyle of the lyon dyd witneſſe the greatnes of the beaſt which Hercules had ſlayne: euen ſo Theſeus went all about, ſhewing that this clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne handes inuincible. And ſo going on further, in the ſtreightes of PELOPONNESVS he killed another, called Sinnis ſurnamed Pityocamtes, that is to ſaye, a wreather, or bower of pyne apple trees: whom he put to death in that ſelfe cruell manner that Sinnis had ſlayne many other trauellers before. For there is no man but will confeſſe, that Æacus was the moſt vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMINIAN is honoured and reuerenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man alſo but knoweth, that Peleus and Telamon were men of ſingular vertue. Nowe it is certeine, that this Sciron was the ſonne in lawe of Cychreus, father in lawe of Æacus, and grandfather of Peleus and of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the ſayed

F Sciron, and of his wife Charicle. Alſo it is not very likely, that ſo many good men would haue had affinitie with ſo naughty and wicked a man: in taking of him, and geuing him that, which men loue beſt of all things in the worlde. And therefore the Hiſtoriographers saye, that it was not the first time, when Theseus went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron: but that it was many dayes after, when he tooke the cittie of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS helde at that time, where he deceyued the gouernour of the cittie called Diocles, and there he slewe Sciron. And these be the obiections the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He slewe also Cercyon the ARCADIAN, in the cittie of ELEVSIN, wrestling with him. And going a litle further, he slewe Damastes, otherwise surnamed Procrustes, in the cittie of HERMIONIA: and that by stretching on him out, to make him euen with the length and measure of his beddes, as he was wont to doe vnto straungers that passed by. Theseus dyd that after the imitation of Hercules, who punished tyrannes with the selfe same payne and torment, which they had made others suffer. For euen so dyd Hercules sacrifice Busiris. So he stifled Antheus in wrestling. So he put Cycnus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus heade, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this daye: for this Termerus dyd vse to put them to death in this sorte whom he met: to iolle his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this selfe manner, punishing the wicked in like sorte, iustly compelling them tabyde the same payne and torments, which they before had vniustly made others abyde. And so he helde on his iorney vntill he came to the riuer of CEPHISVS, where certaine persones of the house of the Phytalides were the first which went to meete him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him according to the ceremonies vsed at that time: and afterwardes hauing made a sacrifice of propitiation vnto their goddes, they made him great chere in their houses: and this was the first notable enterteinment he founde in all his iorney. It is supposed he arriued in the cittie of ATHENS, the eight daye of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. He founde the comon wealth turmoyled with seditions, factions, and diuisions, and perticularly the house of AEgeus in very ill termes also, bicause that Medea (being banished out of the cittie of CORINTHE) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remained with AEgeus, whom she had promised by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children. But when she heard tell that Theseus was comen, before that the good king AEgeus (who was nowe becomen olde, suspitious, and affrayed of sedition, by reason of the great factions within the cittie at that time) knewe what he was, she perswaded him to poyson him at a feaste which they woulde make him as a straunger that passed by. Theseus failed not to goe to this prepared feaste whereunto he was bydden, but yet thought it not good to disclose him selfe. And the rather to geue AEgeus occasion and meane to knowe him: when they brought the meate to the borde, he drewe out his sworde, as though he woulde haue cut with all, and shewed it vnto him. AEgeus seeing it, knewe it straight, and forthwith ouerthrewe the cuppe with poyson which was prepared for him: and after he had inquired of him, and asked thinges, he embraced him as his sonne. Afterwardes in the common assembly of the inhabitants of the cittie, he declared, howe he auowed him for his sonne. Then all the people receyued him with exceeding ioye, for the renowne of his valiantnes and manhoode. And some saye, that when AEgeus ouerthrewe the cuppe, the poyson which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this present a certen compasse inclosed all about within the temple, which is called Delphinium. For euen there in that place, in the olde time, stoode the house of AEgeus: in witnes whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercurye (which is on the side of the temple looking towardes the rising of the sunne) the Mercurye gate of AEgeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stoode allwayes in hope to recouer the realme of ATHENS, at the least after AEgeus death, bicause he had no children: when they sawe that Theseus was knowen, and openly declared for his sonne and heire, and successour to the Realme, they were not able any lenger to beare it, seeing that not onely AEgeus (who was but the adopted sonne of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloude royall of the Erictheides) had vsurped the Kingdome ouer them, but that Theseus also should enioye it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, and diuiding them selues into two partes, the one came openly in

A in armes with their father, marching directly towardes the cittie: the other laye close in ambushe in the village GARGETTVS, meaning to geue charge vpon them in two places at one instant. Nowe they brought with them an Heraulde borne in the towne of AGNVS, called Leos, who bewrayed vnto Theseus the secret and deuise of all their enterprise. Theseus vpon this intelligence went forth, and dyd set on those that laye in ambushe, and put them all to the sworde. The other which were in Pallas companie vnderstanding thereof, dyd breake and disparse them selues incontinently. And this is the cause (as some saye) why those of Pallena doe neuer make affinitie nor mariadge with those of AGNVS at this daye. And that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer speake these wordes which are cryed euery where els through out the whole

B countrye of ATTICA, Acouete Leos, (which is as muche to saye, as, Hearken, O people) they doe so extreamely hate this worde Leos, for that it was the Heraulde's name which wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who woulde not liue idelly at home and doe nothing, but desirous there withall to gratifie the people, went his waye to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which dyd great mischieues to the inhabitants of the countrye of TETRAPOLIS. And hauing taken him aliue, brought him through the citie of ATHENS to be seene of all the inhabitants. Afterwardes he dyd sacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Nowe concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged him, and to haue geuen him good enterteinment, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the olde time, those townes and villages thereaboutes dyd assemble together, and made a

C common sacrifice which they called Hecalesion, in the honour of Iupiter Hecalian, where they honoured this olde woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena: bicause that when she receyued Theseus into her house, being then but very younge, she made muche of him, and called him by many prety made names, as olde folkes are wont to call younge children. And forasmuche as she had made a vowe to Iupiter to make him a solemne sacrifice, if Theseus returned safe from the enterprise he went about, and that she dyed before his returne: in recompence of the good chere she had made him, she had that honour done vnto her by Theseus commaundement, as Philochorus hathe written of it. Shortely after this exployte, there came certaine of King Minos ambassadours out of CRETA, to aske tribute, being nowe the thirde time it was demaunded, which

D the ATHENIANS payed for this cause. Androgeus, the eldest sonne of king Minos, was slayne by treason within the countrye of ATTICA: for which cause Minos pursuing the reuenge of his death, made very whotte and sharpe warres vpon the ATHENIANS, and dyd them greate hurte. But besides all this, the goddes dyd sharpely punishe and scourge all the countrye, aswell with barrennes and famine, as also with plague and other mischieues, euen to the drying vp of their riuers. The ATHENIANS perceyuing these sore troubles and plagues, ranne to the oracle of Apollo, who aunswered them that they shoulde appease Minos: and when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrathe of the goddes woulde cease against them, and their troubles should haue an ende. Whereupon the ATHENIANS sent immediately vnto him,

E and intreated him for peace: which he graunted them, with condition that they should be bounde to sende him yerely into CRETA, seuen younge boyes, and as many younge gyrles. Nowe thus farre, all the Historiographers doe very well agree: but inthe reste not. And they which seeme furdest of from the trothe, doe declare, that when these yonge boyes were deliuered in CRETA, they caused them to be deuowred by the Minotaure within the Laberinthe: or els that they were shut within this Laberinthe, wandring vp and downe, and coulde finde no place to gett out, vntill suche time as they dyed, euen famished for hunger.

And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet

The Athenians payed tribute to Minos king of Creta, for the death of Androgeus his sonne.

The Minotaure what it was.

The Laberinthe a prison in Creta.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS doe not confesse that, but saye that this Laberinthe was a gayle or prisone, in the which they had no other hurte, sauing that they which were kept there vnder locke and keye, coulde not flye nor starte awaye: and that Minos had, in the memorye of his sonne Androgeus, instituted games and playes of prise, where he gaue vnto them that wanne the victorie, those younge children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithstanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the prisone of the Laberinthe: and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Kings captaines called Taurus, who was in best creditt with his master, wanne the prise. This Taurus was a churlishe, and naughtie natured man of condition, and very harde and cruell to these children of ATHENS. And to verifie the same, the philosopher Aristotle him selfe, speaking of the common wealth of the BOTTIEIANS, declareth very well, that he neuer thought that Minos dyd at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but sayeth, that they poorely toyled in CRETA euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true and painefull seruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to satisfie an olde vowe of theirs which they had made of auncient time) sent somtimes the first borne of their children, vnto Apollo in the cittie of DELPHES: and that amongest them they also mingled those, which were descended of the auncient prisoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But bicause they coulde not liue there, they directed their iorney first into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PVGLIA, and afterwardes from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIEIANS. In memory whereof, the daughters of the BOTTIEIANS in a solemne sacrifice they make, doe vse to singe the foote of this songe: Lett vs to ATHENS goe. But thereby we maye see howe perilous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmitie with a cittie, which can speake well, and where learning and eloquence dothe florishe. For euer sence that time, Minos was allwayes blased and disgraced through out all the Theaters of ATHENS. The testimonie of Hesiodus, who calleth him the most worthie King, dothe nothing helpe him at all, nor the prayse of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters familliar friende: bicause the tragicall Poets gott the vpper hande in disgracing him, notwithstanding all these. And vpon their stages where all the tragedies were played, they still gaue forth many ill fauored wordes, and fowle speaches of him: as against a man that had bene most cruell and vnnaturall. Yet most men thincke, that Minos was the King which established the lawes: and Radamanthus the iudge and preseruer of them, who caused the same also to be kept and obserued. The time nowe being comen about for payment of the thirde tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet maried, to geue them to be put forth to take their chaunce and lotte: the citizens of ATHENS beganne to murmure against AEgeus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was onely alone exempted from this griefe. And that to bring the gouernment of the Realme, to fall into the handes of a straunger his bastard: he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forsake them. These iust sorrowes and complaintes of the fathers, whose children were taken from them, dyd pearce the harte of Theseus, who willing to yelde to reason, and to ronne the selfe same fortune as the cittizens dyd: willingly offered him selfe to be sent thither, without regarde taking to his happe or aduenture. For which, the cittizens greatly esteemed of his corage and honorable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection, he seemed to beare vnto the comunaltye. But AEgeus hauing vsed many reasons and perswasions, to cause him to turne, and staye from his purpose, and perceyuing in the ende there was no remedye but he woulde goe: he then drue lottes for the children which should goe with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding dothe write, that they were not those of the cittie which drewe lottes for the children they should sende, but that Minos him selfe went thither in persone and dyd chuse them, as he chose Theseus the first, vpon conditions agreed betwene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS shoulde furnishe them with a shippe, and that the children should shippe and imbarke with him, carying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaure, this tribute should cease. Nowe before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of safetie of their children: therefore the ATHENIANS allwayes

A wayes ſent a ſhippe to conuey their children with a blacke ſayle, in token of aſſured loſſe. Neuertheles Theſeus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good corage, and promiſing boldly that he woulde ſett vpon this Minotaure: AEgeus gaue vnto the maſter of the ſhippe a white ſayle, commaunding him that at his returne he ſhould put out the white ſayle if his ſonne had eſcaped, if not, that then he ſhould ſett vp the blacke ſayle, to ſhewe him a farre of his vnlucky and vnfortunate chaunce. Simonides notwithſtanding doeth ſaye, that this ſayle which AEgeus gaue to the maſter, was not white, but redde, dyed in graine, and of the culler of ſcarlett: and that he gaue it him to ſignifie a farre of, their deliuerie and ſafety. This maſter was called Phereclus Amarſiadas, as Simonides ſayeth. But Philochorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMINIAN gaue to Theſeus a maſter called Nauſi-
B theus, and another marriner to tackle the ſayles, who was called Phæas: bicauſe the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practiſed to the ſea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lott fell was his nephewe: and thus muche the chappells doe teſtifie, which Theſeus buylt afterwardes in honour of Nauſitheus, and of Phæas, in the village of Phalerus: ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is ſayed moreouer, that the feaſte which they call Cyberneſia, that is to ſaye, the feaſte of Patrons of the ſhippes, is celebrated in honour of them. Nowe after the lotts were drawen, Theſeus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of ſupplication which they call Hiceteria: which was an olyue boughe hallowed, wreathed about with white wolle. After he had made his C prayer, he went downe to the ſea ſide to imbarke, the ſixt daye of the moneth of Marche: on which daye at this preſent time they doe ſende their younge girles to the ſame temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the goddes. But ſome ſaye, that the oracle of Apollo in the cittie of DELPHES had aunſwered him, that he ſhould take Venus for his guyde, and that he ſhould call vpon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cauſe he dyd ſacrifice a goate vnto her vpon the ſea ſide, which was founde ſodainly turned into a ramme, and that herefore they ſurnamed this goddeſſe Epitragia, as one would ſaye, the goddeſſe of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in CRETA, he ſlewe there the Minotaure (as the moſt parte of auncient authors doe write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fanſie with him, dyd geue him a clue of threede, by D the helpe whereof ſhe taught him, howe he might eaſely winde out of the turnings and cranckes of the Labyrinthe. And they ſaye, that hauing killed this Minotaure, he returned backe againe the ſame waye he went, bringing with him thoſe other younge children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne alſo he caried afterwardes awaye. Pherecides ſayeth moreouer, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the ſhippes of CRETA, bicauſe they ſhould not ſodainely ſett out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the captaine of Minos) was killed in a fight by Theſeus, euen in the very hauen mowthe as they were readye to ſhippe awaye, and hoyſe vp ſayle. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing ſett vp the games, as he was wont to doe yerely in the honour and memorye of his ſonne, euery one beganne to enuye captaine Taurus, bicauſe they euer looked that he ſhould E carye awaye the game and victorie, as he had done other yeres before: ouer and that, his authoritye got him much ill will and enuye, bicauſe he was proude and ſtately, and had in ſuſpition that he was great with Queene Paſiphäe. Wherefore when Theſeus required he might encounter with Taurus, Minos eaſely graunted it. And being a ſolemne cuſtome in CRETA that the women ſhoulde be preſent, to ſee theſe open ſportes and ſights, Ariadne being at theſe games amongeſt the reſt, fell further in loue with Theſeus, ſeeing him ſo goodly a perſone, ſo ſtronge, and inuincible in wreſtling, that he farre exceeded all that wreſtled there that daye. King Minos was ſo glad that he had taken awaye the honour from captaine Taurus, that he ſent him home francke and free into his countrye, rendring to him all the other priſoners of ATHENS: and for his ſake, clearely releaſed and forgaue the cittie of F ATHENS the tribute, which they ſhould haue payed him yerely. Howbeit Clidemus ſearching out the beginning of theſe things to thutmoſt, reciteth them very particularly, and after another ſorte. For he ſayeth, about that time there was a generall reſtraint through out all

GRECE, restrayning all manner of people to beare sayle in any vessell or bottome, wherein there were aboue fiue persones, except only Iason, who was chosen captaine of the great shippe Argus, and had commission to sayle euery where, to chase and driue awaye rouers and pyrates, and to scoure the seas through out. About this time, Dædalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a litle barke: Minos contrarie to this restraint, woulde needes followe him with a fleete of diuers vessels with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coaste of SICILE, fortuned to dye there. Afterwardes his sonne Deucalion, being marueilously offended with the ATHENIANS, sent to summone them to deliuer Dædalus vnto him, or els he woulde put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hostages. But Theseus excused him selfe, and sayed he coulde not forsake Dædalus, considering he was his neere kynseman, being his cosin germaine, for he was the sonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he caused many vessels secretly to be made, parte of them within ATTICA selfe in the village of Thymetades, farre from any highe wayes: and parte of them in the cittie of TROEZEN, by the sufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the ende his purpose shoulde be kept the secretlyer. Afterwardes when all his shippes were readye, and rygged out, he tooke sea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in so much as when they sawe them a farre of, they dyd take them for the barkes of their friends. Theseus landed without resistaunce, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dædalus, and other banished CRETANS for guydes, he entred the cittie selfe of GNOSVS, where he slewe Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinthe, with all his garde and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of CRETA fell by inheritance into the handes of his sister Ariadne. Theseus made league with her, and caryed away the yong children of ATHENS, which were kept as hostages, and concluded peace and amytie betweene the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promised, and sware, they woulde neuer make warres against them. They reporte many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no trothe nor certeintie in it. For some saye, that Ariadne honge her selfe for sorowe, when she sawe that Theseus had caste her of. Other write, that she was transported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, were she was maryed vnto OEnarus, the priest of Bacchus: and they thincke that Theseus lefte her, bicause he was in loue with another, as by these verses shoulde appeare.

Diuers opinions of Ariadne.

AEgles the Nymphe, vvas loued of Theseus, vvhich vvas the daughter of Panopeus.

Hereas the Megarian sayeth, that these two verses in olde time were among the verses of the Poet Hesiodus, howbeit Pisistratus tooke them awaye: as he dyd in like manner adde these other here in the description of the helles in Homer, to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Bolde Theseus, and Pirithous stovvte, descended both, from godds immortall race, Triumphing still, this vvearie vvorlde aboute in feats of armes, and many a comly grace.

Other holde opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theseus: the one of them was named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongest others the Poet Ion writeth it, who was borne in the Ile of CHIO, and speaking of his cittie, he sayeth thus:

OEnopion, & Staphylus Theseus sonnes.

OEnopion vvhich vvas the sonne, of vvorthy Theseus did cause men buylde, this stately touvne vvhich nouve triumpheth thus.

Nowe what things are founde seemely in Poets fables, there is none but dothe in manner synge them. But one Paenon borne in the cittie of AMATHVNTA, reciteth this cleane after another sorte, and contrarie to all other: saying, that Theseus by tempest was driuen with the Ile of CYPRVS, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with childe, and so sore sea sycke, that she was not able to abide it. In so muche as he was forced to put her a lande, and him selfe afterwards returning abourde hoping to saue his shippe against the storme, was forthwith compelled to loose into the sea. The women of the countrye dyd curteously receyue and intreate Ariadne: and to comforte her againe, (for she was marueilously oute of harte, to see

A see she was thus forsaken) they counterfeated letters, as if Theseus had wrytten them to her. And when her groninge time was come, and she to be layed, they did their best by all possible meanes to saue her: but she dyed notwithstanding in labour, and could neuer be deliuered. So she was honorably buried by the Ladies of CYPRVS. Theseus not long after returned thither againe, who tooke her death maruelous heauily, and left money with the inhabitantes of the countrie, to sacrifice vnto her yearely: and for memorie of her, he caused two litle images to be molten, the one of copper, and the other of siluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This sacrifice is done the seconde day of September, on which they doe yet obserue this ceremonie: they doe lay a young childe vpon a bed, which pitiefully cryeth and lamenteth, as women trauellinge with childe. They saye also, that the AMATHVSIANS doe yet call the B groue where her tombe is sette vp, the wodde of Venus Adriadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that reporte this otherwise: saying, there were two Minoes, and two Adriadnees, whereof the one was maried to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whome Staphylus was borne: and the other the youngest, was rauished and caried away by Theseus, who afterwardes forsooke her, and she came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nurce, called Corcyna, whose graue they doe shewe yet to this day. This seconde Adriadne dyed there also, but she had no such honour done to her after her death, as to the first was geuen. For they celebrate the feaste of the first with all ioye and mirthe: where the sacrifices done in memorie of the seconde, be mingled with mourninge and sorowe. Theseus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did sacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a C litle image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Adriadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had deliuered, he daunced a kinde of daunce, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they say: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turninges of the Labyrinthe. And the DELIANS call this manner of daunce, the crane, as Dicaearcus sayeth. And Theseus daunced it first about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to saye, horne-staffe: bicause it is made and builded of hornes onely, all on the left hande well and curiously sette together without any other bindinge. It is sayed also that he made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the first was geuen to him that ouercame, a braunche of palme for reward of victorie. But when they drewe neere the coast of ATTICA, they were so ioyfull, he and his master, that they forgate to set vp their white sayle, by which they shoulde haue gD uen knowledge of their healthe and safetie vnto AEgeus. Who seeinge the blacke sayle a farre of, being out of all hope euermore to see his sonne againe, tooke such a griefe at his harte, that he threw him selfe headlong from the top of a clyffe, and killed him selfe. So soone as Theseus was arriued at the porte named Phalerus, he performed the sacrifices which he had vowed to the goddes at his departure: and sent an Herauld of his before vnto the city, to carie newes of his safe arriuall. The Heraulde founde many of the citie mourning the death of king AEgeus. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be supposed. They would haue crowned him also with a garlande of flowers, for that he had brought so good tidinges, that the children of the citie were returned in safetie. The Heraulde was content to take the garlande, yet would he not in any wise put it on his head, but did winde it about his Heraulds E rodde he bare in his hande, and so returneth foorthwith to the sea, where Theseus made his sacrifices. Who perceiuinge they were not yet done, did refuse to enter into the temple, and stayed without for troubling of the sacrifices. Afterwardes all ceremonies finished, he went in and tolde him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for sorowe, hasted with speede towardes the citie. And this is the cause, why to this day, at the feast called Oscophoria (as who woulde say at the feast of boughes) the Herauld hath not his heade but his rod onely crowned with flowers, and why the assistantes also after the sacrifice done, doe make suche eryes and exclamations: Ele, leuf, ion, ion: whereof the first is the crye and voyce they commonly vse one to an other to make haste, or else it is the foote of some songe of triumphe: and the other is the crye and voyce of men as it were in feare and troF ble. After he had ended the obsequies and funeralls for his father, he performed also his sacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed the seuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arriued at their returne into the citie of ATHENS. Howbeit there are ſome which will ſay, that theſe verſes were made for the Heraclides, that is to ſay, thoſe that deſcended from Hercules: which flying for their ſafety and ſuccour vnto the ATHENIANS, were entertained & much made of by them for a time. But the moſt parte holde opinion, they were made vpon the occaſion aforeſaid. The veſſell in which Theſeus went and returned, was a galliot of thirtie owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the olde peeces of wodde that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer ſince, in the diſputations of the Philoſophers, touching things that increaſe, to wit, whether they remaine alwayes one, or elſe they be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for an example of doubt. For ſome mainteined, that it was ſtill one veſſell: others to the contrarie defended it was not ſo. And they holde opinion alſo, that the feaſt of boughes which is celebrated at ATHENS at this time, was then firſt of all inſtituted by Theſeus. It is ſayed moreouer, that he did not carye all the wenches vpon whome the lotts did fall, but choſe two fayer young boyes, whoſe faces were ſwete and delicate as maydens be, that otherwiſe were hardie, and quicke ſprighted. But he made them ſo oft bathe them ſelues in whotte bathes, and kepe them in from the heate of the ſunne, and ſo many times to waſhe, anointe, and rubbe them ſelues with oyles which ſerue to ſupple and ſmoothe their skinnes, to keepe freſhe and fayer their colour, to make yellowe and bright their heares: and withall did teache them ſo to counterfeate their ſpeache, countenaunce and facion of young maydes, that they ſeemed to be like them, rather then young boyes. For there was no manner of difference to be perceiued outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a proceſſion, in which both he and the other young boyes, were apparelled then as they be nowe, which carie boughes on the day of the feaſt in their handes. They carie them in the honor of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is tolde of them: or rather bicauſe they returned home iuſt, at the time and ſeaſon, when they gather the fruite of thoſe trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to ſay, ſupper caryers, which are aſſiſtantes to the ſacrifice done that day, in repreſenting the mothers of thoſe, vpon whom the lottes did fall, bicauſe they in like ſorte brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for ſo did their mothers tattle to their children, to comforte and encorage them. All theſe particularities were written by Demon the hiſtoriographer. There was moreouer a place choſen out to build him a tẽple in, and he him ſelfe ordained, that thoſe houſes which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, ſhould nowe yearely thenceforth become contributories towardes the charges of a ſolemne ſacrifice, which ſhoulde be done in the honor of him: and he did aſſigne the order and adminiſtration of the ſame, vnto the houſe of the Phytalides, in recompence of the curteſie which they ſhowed him when he arriued. Furthermore, after the death of his father AEgeus, he vndertooke a maruelous great enterpriſe. For he brought all the inhabitantes of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the citie of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before diſperſed into diuerſe villages, and by reaſon thereof were very hard to be aſſembled together, when occaſion was offered to eſtabliſh any order concerning the cõmon ſtate. Many times alſo they were at variance together, & by the eares, making warres one vpon an other. But Theſeus tooke the paines to goe from village to village, and from family, to familie, to let them vnderſtand the reaſons why they ſhould conſent vnto it. So he found the poore people C D E F

In which he woulde only reſerue to him ſelfe the charge of the warres, and the preſeruation of the lawes: for the reſt, he was content that euery citizen in all and for all ſhould beare a like ſwaye and authoritye. So there were ſome that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yelded notwithſtanding for feare of his diſpleaſure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to conſent with good will, vnto that he required: then to tary his forcible compulſion. Then he cauſed all the places where iuſtice was miniſtred, and all their halles of aſſembly to be ouerthrowen and pulled downe. He remoued ſtraight all iudges

B and officers, and built a towne houſe, and a counſaill hall, in the place where the cittie now ſtandeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwardes he inſtituted the greate feaſt and common ſacrifice for all of the countrye of ATTICA, which they call Panathenæa. Then he ordeined another feaſte alſo vpon the ſixtenth daye of the moneth of Iune, for all ſtrangers which ſhould come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metœcia, & is kept euen to this daye. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promiſe, and beganne to ſett vp an eſtate or policye of a common wealth, beginning firſt with the ſeruice of the goddes. The oracle of Apollo at Delphes.

It is founde written alſo that Sibylla afterwardes gaue out ſuche a like oracle ouer the cittye of ATHENS.

The bladder blovven maye flete vpon the fludde, D but cannot ſynke, nor ſticke in filthie mudde.

Moreouer, bicauſe he woulde further yet augment his people, and enlarge his cittie, he entiſed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the ſelfe ſame freedome and priuiledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that theſe wordes which are in vſe at this daye in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Come ye hither: be the ſelfe ſame which Theſeus then cauſed to be proclaymed, when he in that ſorte dyd gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he ſuffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without diſtinction of degrees & orders. For he firſt diuided the noble men, from huſbãdmen and artificers, appointing the noblemen as iudges & magiſtrates to iudge vpon matters of Religiõ, & touching the ſeruice of the godds: & of them alſo he dyd

E chuſe rulers, to beare ciuill office in the cõmon weale, to determine the lawe, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he mãde the noble men and the two other eſtates equall in voyce. And as the noblemen dyd paſſe the other in honour: euen ſo the artificers exceeded them in number, & the huſbandmen them in profit. Nowe that Theſeus was the firſt who of all others yelded to haue a common weale or populer eſtate (as Ariſtotle ſayeth) and dyd geue ouer his regall power: Homer ſelf ſemeth to teſtifie it, in numbring the ſhippes which were in the Græcians armie before the cittie of TROIA. For amongeſt all the GRÆCIANS, he only calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreouer Theſeus coyned money, which he marked with the ſtampe of an oxe, in memorye of the bulle of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or els to prouoke his citizens to geue them ſelues to labour. They ſaye alſo that of this money

Olympia. It was he alſo which made the games called Iſthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the ende that as the GRECIANS dyd celebrate the feaſt of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupiter, by Hercules ordinance: ſo, that they ſhould alſo celebrate the games called Iſthmia, B by his order and inſtitution, in the honour of Neptune. For thoſe that were done in the ſtraights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, & had rather forme of ſacrifice or of a myſterie, then of games & opē feaſt. Yet ſome will ſaye, that theſe games of Iſthmia were inſtituted in the honour & memorie of Sciron, & that Theſeus ordained them in ſatisfaction of his death: bicauſe he was his coſin germaine, being the ſonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other ſaye that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theſeus made theſe games, and not for the memorie of the other. Howſoeuer it was, he ſpecially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they ſhould geue vnto thoſe that came from ATHENS to ſee their games of Iſthmia, ſo much place to ſit downe before them (in the moſt honorable parte of the feaſt place) as the ſaile of their ſhippe ſhould couer, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus doe Hellanicus & Andron Halicarnaſſeus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the ſea Maior, C Philochorus, & ſome other holde opinion, that he went thither with Hercules againſt the AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantnes, Hercules gaue him ANTIOPA the AMAZONE. But the more parte of the other Hiſtoriographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, & Herodotus, doe write, that Theſeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, & that he tooke this AMAZONE priſoner, which is likelieſt to be true. For we doe not finde that any other who went this iorney with him, had taken any AMAZONE priſoner beſides him ſelfe. Bion alſo the Hiſtoriographer, this notwithſtanding ſayeth, that he brought her away by deceit and ſtealth. For the AMAZONES (ſayeth he) naturally louing men, dyd not flie at all when they ſawe them lāde in their countrye, but ſent them preſents, & that Theſeus entiſed her to come into his ſhippe, who brought D him a preſent: & ſo ſone as ſhe was aborde, he hoyſed his ſayle, & ſo caried her away. Another Hiſtoriographer Menecrates, who wrote the hiſtorie of the cittie of NICEA, in the countrye of BYTHINIA, ſayeth: that Theſeus hauing this AMAZONE ANTIOPA with him, remained a certaine time vpon thoſe coaſts, & that amongeſt other he had in his companie three younge brethern of ATHENS, Euneus, Thoas, and Solois. This laſt, Solois, was marueilouſly in loue with ANTIOPA, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, ſauing vnto one with whom he was moſt familiar, and whom he truſted beſt: ſo that he reported this matter vnto ANTIOPA. But ſhe vtterly reiected his ſute, though otherwiſe ſhe handled it wiſely and curteouſly, and dyd not complaine to Theſeus of him. Howbeit the younge man deſpairing to enioye his loue, tooke it ſo inwardly, that deſperately he lept into the riuer, and drowned him E ſelfe. Which when Theſeus vnderſtoode, and the cauſe alſo that brought him to this deſperation and ende: he was very ſorye, and angrie alſo. Whereupon he remembred a certeine oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commaunded to buyld a cittie in that place in a ſtraunge countrye, where he ſhould be moſt ſorye, and that he ſhould leaue ſome that were about him at that time, to gouerne the ſame. For this cauſe therefore he built a cittie in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, bicauſe he had built it only by the commaundement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuer in the which the younge man was drowned, Solois, in memorye of him: and left his two brethern for his deputies and as gouernours of this newe cittie, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it commeth, that at this daye the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certen place of their cittie, Hermus houſe. But they fayle in the accent, F by putting it vpon the laſt ſyllabe: for in pronouncing it ſo, Hermu ſignifieth Mercurie. By this meanes they doe transferre the honour due to the memorie of Hermus, vnto the god Mercurie.

Nowe

A Now heare what was the occasion of the warres of the AMAZONES, which me thinckes was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprise of a woman. For they had not placed their campe within the very cittie of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it selfe (called Pnyce) adioyning to the temple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the countrye thereabouts: neither had they all comen at the first, so valiantly to assaile the cittie of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by lande from so farre a countrye, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frosen as Hellanicus sayeth: it is hardely to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very cittie it selfe, the names of the places which cõtinewe yet to this present daye doe witnesse it, & the graues also of the women which dyed there. But so it is, that both armies laye a great time one in the face
B of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus hauing first made sacrifice vnto Feare the goddesse, according to the counsaill of a prophecie he had receyued, he gaue them battell in the moneth of August, on the same daye, in the which the ATHENIANS doe euen at this present solemnise the feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, desirous particularly to write all the circumstances of this encownter, sayeth that the left poynte of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right poynte marched by the side of CHRYSA, euen to the place which is called PNYCE, vpon which, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the temple of the Muses, dyd first geue their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graues of the women which dyed in this first encoũter, are founde yet in the great streete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neere vnto the chappell C of the litle god Chalcodus. And the ATHENIANS (sayeth he) were in this place repulsed by the AMAZONES, euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to saye, of the furies. But on thother side also, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardettus, & Lucium, draue backe their right poynte euen to within their campe, & slewe a great number of them. Afterwards, at the ende of foure moneths, peace was taken betwene them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theseus maried, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Neuertheles, some saye that she was slayne (fighting on Theseus side) with a darte, by another called Molpadia. In memorie whereof, the piller which is ioyning to the temple of the Olympian ground, was set vp in her honour. We are not to maruell, if the historie of things so auncient, be founde so diuersely written. For there are also that D write, that Queene Antiopa sent those secretly which were hurte then into the cittie of CALCIDE, where some of them recouered, & were healed: and others also dyed, which were buried neere to the place called AMAZONION. Howsoeuer it was, it is most certain that this warre was ended by agreement. For a place adioyning to the temple of Theseus, dothe beare recorde of it, being called Orcomosium: bicause the peace was there by solemne othe concluded. And the sacrifice also dothe truely verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONES, before the feast of Theseus, long time out of minde. They of MEGARA also doe shewe a tumbe of the AMAZONES in their cittie, which is as they goe frõ the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they finde an auncient tumbe, cut in facion & forme of a losenge. They saye that there died other of the AMAZONES also, neere vnto the cittie of CHAERONEA, which were buried all alongest the E litle broke passing by the same, which in the olde time, (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, & is nowe named Hæmon, as we haue in other places written in the life of Demosthenes. And it semeth also, that they dyd not passe through THESSALIE, without fighting: for there are seene yet of their tũbes all about the cittie of SCOTVSA, hard by the rocks, which be called the doggs head. And this is that which is worthy memorie (in mine opinion) touching the warres of these AMAZONES. Howe the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made warres with Theseus to reuẽge the iniurie he dyd to their Queene Antiopa, refusing her, to marye with Phædra: & as for the murder which he telleth that Hercules dyd, that me thinckes is altogether but deuise of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Theseus maried Phædra, hauing had before of Antiopa a F sonne called Hippolytus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers doe not in any thing speake against the tragicall Poets, in that which concerneth the ill happe that chaunced to him, in the persones of this his wife & of his sonne: we must needes take it to be so, as we finde it written in the tragedies. And yet we finde many other reportes touching the mariages of Theſeus, whoſe beginnings had no great good honeſt ground, neither A fell out their endes very fortunate: & yet for all that they haue made no tragedies of them, neither haue they bene played in the Theaters. For we reade that he tooke away Anaxo the TROEZENIAN, & that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: and that he dyd alſo marye Peribæa, the mother of Aiax, and afterwards Pherebæa, & Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much alſo, for that he ſo lightly forſooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of AEgles the daughter of Panopæus, as we haue recited before. Laſtely, he tooke awaye Hellen: which rauiſhement filled all the Realme of ATTICA with warres, & finally was the very occaſion that forced him to forſake his countrye, and brought him at the length to his ende, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other princes of GRECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the warres, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theſeus was neuer B in any one of them: ſauing that he was at the battell of the Lapithæ againſt the Centauri. Others ſaye to the contrarie, that he was at the iorney of Cholchide with Iaſon, & that he dyd helpe Meleager to kill the wilde bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they ſaye) this prouerbe came: Not vvithout Theſeus. Meaning that ſuche a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theſeus ſelf dyd many famous actes, without ayde of any man, and that for his valiantnes this prouerbe came in vſe, which is ſpoken: This is another Theſeus. Alſo he dyd helpe Adraſtus king of the ARGIVES, to recouer the bodyes of thoſe that were ſlayne in the battell, before the cittie of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the poet Euripides ſayeth, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell: but it was by cõpoſition. And thus the greateſt number of the moſt auncient writers doe declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus C writeth, that this was the firſt treatie that euer was made to recouer the dead bodyes ſlayne in battell: neuertheles we doe reade in the hiſtories and geſtes of Hercules, that he was the firſt that euer ſuffered his enemies to carye awaye their dead bodyes, after they had bene put to the ſword. But whoſoeuer he was, at this daye in the village of ELEVTHERES, they doe ſhowe the place where the people were buried, and where princes tumbes are ſeene about the cittie of ELEVSIN, which he made at the requeſt of Adraſtus. And for teſtimonie hereof, the tragedie AEſchilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he cauſeth it to be ſpoken euen thus to Theſeus him ſelf, dothe clerely ouerthrowe the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendſhippe betwixt Pirithous and him, it is ſayed it beganne thus. went euen of purpoſe to inuade his countrye, and brought awaye a certaine bootie of oxen of his taken out of the countrye of MARATHON. Theſeus being aduertiſed therof, armed ſtraight, and went to the reſcue. Pirithous hearing of his comming, fled not at all, but returned backe ſodainly to mete him. And ſo ſone as they came to ſee one another, they both wondred at eche others beawtie and corage, and ſo had they no deſire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hande firſt to Theſeus, ſayed vnto him. I make your ſelfe iudge of the damage you haue ſuſteined by my inuaſion, and with all my harte I will make ſuche ſatisfaction, as it ſhall pleaſe you to aſſeſſe it at. Theſeus then dyd not only releaſe him, of all the damages he had done, but alſo requeſted him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were preſently ſworne brethren in the fielde: after which othe betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & E

He had bidden alſo the Centauri to the feaſt: who being druncke, committed many lewde partes, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithæ chaſticed them ſo well, that they ſlewe ſome of them preſently in the place, & draue the reſt afterwards out of all the countrye by the helpe of Theſeus, who armed him ſelfe, and fought on their ſide. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter ſomewhat contrarie, ſaying that Theſeus went not at all vntill the warre was well begonne: and that it was the firſt time that he ſawe Hercules, & ſpake with him neere vnto the cittie of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his farre voyages, & greateſt troubles. A the mysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenaunce and fauour which Theseus shewed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessitie of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the companie of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fiftie yeres olde when he tooke awaye Hellen and rauished her, which was very younge, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus sayeth. By reason whereof, some seeking to hyde the rauishement of her as a haynous facte, doe reporte it was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that caryed her awaye, who left her in his custodie and keeping: and that Theseus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethern Castor and Pollux, which afterwardes dyd demaunde her againe of him. Others againe saye it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was afB frayed of Enarsphorus the sonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which commeth neareſt to the trothe in this case, and which in deede by many authors is testified, was in this sorte. Theseus & Pirithous went together to the cittie of LACEDÆMON, where they tooke awaye Hellen (being yet very younge) euen as she was dauncing in the tẽple of Diana surnamed Orthia: & they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON sent after her, but those that followed wẽt no further then the cittie of TEGEA. Now when they were escaped out of the countrye of PELOPONNESVS, they agreed to drawe lots together, which of them two should haue her, with condition that whose lot it were to haue her, he should take her to his wife, & should be bound also to helpe his companion to get him another. It was Theseus happe to light vpon her, who caryed her to the cittie of APHIDNES, bicause she was yet to younge to be maried.

C Whether he caused his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recõmending her to his good care, & to kepe it so secretly, that no bodye should knowe what was become of her. Bicause he would doe the like for Pirithous (according to th'agremẽt made betwext thẽ) he went into EPIRVS with him to steale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, who had surnamed his wife Proserpina, his daughter Proserpina, & his dogg Cerberus: with whom he made them fight which came to aske his daughter in mariage, promising to geue her to him that should ouercome his Cerberus. But the King vnderstãding that Pirithous was come, not to requeſt his daughter in mariage, but to steale her away, he tooke him prisoner with Theseus: & as for Pirithous, he caused him presẽtly to be torne in peces with his dogge, & shut Theseus vp in close prison. In this meane time there was one at ATHENS

D called Menestheus, the sonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the sonne of Orneus, & Orneus was the sonne of Erictheus. This Menestheus was the first that beganne to flatter the people, & did seeke to winne the fauour of the cõmunaltie, by sweete entising words: by which deuise he stirred vp the chiefest of the cittie against Theseus (who in deede long before begãne to be wearie of him) by declaring vnto them howe Theseus had taken from them their royalties & signiories, & had shut them vp in suche sorte within the walles of a cittie, that he might the better keepe them in subiection & obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour sorte of people, he dyd stirre vp also to rebellion, persuading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promised them: & howe contrariwise they were clearely dispossest & throwen out of their own houses, of their tẽples, & from their naturall places where they were borne, to thend only,

E that in liewe of many good & louing lordes which they were wont to haue before, they should now be compelled to serue one onely hedde, & a straunge lorde. Euen as Menestheus was very hotte about this practise, the warre of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pretẽce. For these Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Castor & Pollux, came downe with a great armie, against the cittie of ATHENS: & some suspect sore that Menestheus was cause of their comming thither. Howbeit at the first entrie they dyd no hurte at all in the countrye, but only demaunded restitution of their sister. To whom the citizens made aunswer, that they knewe not where she was left: & then the brethern beganne to make spoyle, & offer warre in deede. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who hauing knowledge (I can not tell by what meane) that she was secretly hidden in the cittie of APHIDNES, reuealed it vnto them.

The warre of the Tyndarides against the Athenians.

F By reason whereof the Tyndarides did alwayes honour him very much, so long as he liued, & afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing ofte burnt & destroyed the whole countrye of ATTICA throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academy of ATHENS for Academus sake.

Academia why ſo called.

Yet Dicearchus ſayeth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two Arcadians, Echedemus, & Marathus, and howe of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which ſithence hath bene called Academia: & after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, bicauſe he willingly offered him ſelf to be ſacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order & cõmandement of a prophecie. So they went & pitched their campe before the cittie of APHIDNES, & hauing wõne the battell, & taken the cittie by aſſault, they raced the place. They ſaye that Alycus, the ſonne of Sciron was ſlaine at this field, who was in the hoaſte of the Tyndarides, & that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his bodye was buried. Howbeit Hereas writeth that Theſeus ſelf dyd kill him before Aphidnes: In witnes whereof he alledgeth certain verſes which ſpeake of Alycus.

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the cittie of Aphidnes, & his mother alſo were taken. But when it was wonne, they of ATHENS beganne to quake for feare, and Meneſtheus counſelled them to receyue the Tyndarides into the cittie, and to make them good chere, ſo they would make no warres but vpon Theſeus, which was the firſt that had done them the wrõg & iniurie: & that to all other els they ſhould ſhowe fauour & good will. And ſo it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to doe as they liſted, they demaunded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporatiõ, & not to be reckoned for ſtraungers, no more then Hercules was: the which was graũted the Tyndarides, & Aphidnus dyd adopt them for his childrẽ, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they dyd honour them as if they had bene godds, calling them Anaces. Either bicauſe they ceaſed the warres, or for that they ordered them ſelues ſo well, that their whole armie being lodged within the cittie, there was not any hurte or diſpleaſure done to any perſone: but as it became thoſe that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watche to preſerue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greke word Anacos doth ſignifie, wherof perchaunce it comes that they call the kings Anactes. Yet there are other who aſwell reiect theſe two verſes, & mainteine they are not Homers: as alſo they reproue all that is reported of Munychus. To wit, that Laodice being priuely cõceiued of him by Demophon, he was brought vp ſecretly by AEthra within TROIA. But Hiſter the hiſtorien in his thirteenth of his hiſtories of ATTICA, maketh a recitall farre cõtrary to other, ſaying: that ſome hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was ſlayne in battell by Achilles, & Patroclus in the coũtrye of THESSALIE, neere to the riuer of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector tooke the cittie of TROEZEN, from whence he brought awaye AEthra: in which there is no manner of apparance or likelihodde. But AEdoneus king of the MOLOSSIANS, feaſting Hercules one daye as he paſſed through his realme, deſcended by chaunce into talke of Theſeus & of Pirithous, howe they came to ſteale away his daughter ſecretly: & after told how they were alſo puniſhed. Hercules was marueilous ſorye to vnderſtand that one of them was now dead, & the other in daunger to dye, & thought with him ſelf that to make his mone to AEdoneus, it would not helpe the matter: he beſought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his ſake. And he graunted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of this captiuitie, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: & at his returne he dyd dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the cittie had before cauſed to be built in his owne honour. And where firſt of all they were called Theſea, he did now ſurname thẽ all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Nowe when he was arriued at ATHENS, he would immediately haue cõmaunded and ordered

A ordered things as he was wont to doe: but he found him ſelf troubled much with ſedition, bicauſe thoſe who had hated him of long time, had added alſo to their old canckered hate, a diſ-dain & contẽpt to feare him any more. And the comõ people now were become ſo ſtubborn, that where before they would haue done all that they were cõmanded, & haue ſpoken nothing to the contrarie: now they looked to be borne with, & flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the firſt to haue vſed force, but he was forced by the faction & contẽtion of his enemies to let all alone, & in the end, deſpairing he ſhould euer bring his matters to paſſe to his deſire, he ſecretly ſent away his children into the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the ſonne of Chalcodus. And him ſelf, after he had made many wiſhes & curſes againſt the Athenians, in the village of Gar-gettus, in a place which for that cauſe to this daye is called Araterion: (that is to ſaye, the place B of curſings) he did take the ſeas, & wẽt into the Ile of SCIROS, where he had goods, & thought alſo to haue founde friends. Lycomedes raigned at that time, & was king of the Ile, vnto whom Theſeus made requeſt for ſome lande, as intẽding to dwell there: albeit ſome ſaye that he required him to giue him ayde againſt the Atheniãs. Lycomedes, were it that he douted to entertaine ſo great a perſonage, or that he dyd it to gratifie Meneſtheus: caried him vp to the high rocks, faining as though he would from thence haue ſhewed him all his countrye round about. But when he had him there, he threw him downe hedlong from the toppe of the rocks to the bot-tome, & put him thus vnfortunately to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of him ſelf by an vnfortunate chaunce, walking one daye after ſupper as he was wont to doe. There was no mã at that time that dyd followe or purſue his death, but Meneſtheus quietly remained king of C ATHENS: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate ſouldiers followed Elphenor in the warres of TROIA. But after the death of Meneſtheus, who died in the iorney to TROIE, Theſeus ſonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their ſtate. Sithence there were many occaſiõs which moued the Athenians to reuerence & honour him as a demy god. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they ſawe his ſhadow & image in armes, fighting againſt the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yere wherein Phædon was gouernour of A-THENS) the nunne Pithia anſwered the Atheniãs, who had ſent to the oracle of Apollo: that they ſhould bring backe the bones of Theſeus, & putting them in ſome honorable place, they ſhould preſerue & honour them deuoutely. But it was a harde matter to finde his graue: & if they had founde it, yet had it bene a harder thing to haue brought his bones awaye, for the malice of D thoſe barbarous people which inhabited that Ile: which were ſo wild & fierce, that none could trade or liue with them. Notwithſtanding Cimon hauing taken the Iland (as we haue written in his life) & ſeeking his graue: perceiued by good happe an eagle pecking with her beake, & ſcraping with her clawes in a place of ſome prety height. Straight it came into his minde (as by diuine inſpiration) to ſearche & digge the place: where was founde the tumbe of a great bodye, with the head of a ſpeare which was of braſſe, & a ſword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gallie. The Atheniãs receiued them with great ioye, with proceſſions & goodly ſacrifices, as if Theſeus him ſelf had bene a liue, & had returned into the cittie againe. At this daye all theſe relicks lye yet in the middeſt of the cittie, neere to the place where the younge men doe vſe all their exerciſes of bodye. There is free libertie of acceſſe for E all ſlaues & poore men, (that are afflicted & purſued, by any mightier then themſelues) to pray & ſacrifice in remembraunce of Theſeus: who while he liued was protectour of the oppreſſed, & dyd curteouſly receiue their requeſts & petitiõs that prayed to haue ayde of him. The greateſt & moſt ſolemne ſacrifice they doe vnto him, is on the eight daye of October, in which he returned from CRETA, with the other younge children of ATHENS. Howbeit they doe not leaue to honour him euery eight daye of all other moneths, either bicauſe he arriued frõ TROE-ZEN at ATHENS the eight daye of Iune, as Diodorus the Coſmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meeteſt for him, bicauſe the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They doe ſacrifice alſo to Neptune, the eight daye of euery moneth, bicauſe the nũber

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

Diuers opinions about the name of Rome.

THE Hiſtoriographers doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe, the great name of the cittie of ROME (the glorie wherof is blowen abroad through all the worlde) was firſt geuen vnto it. For ſome thincke that the Pelaſgians, after they had ouercome the greateſt parte of the world, and had inhabited and ſubdued many nations, in the ende dyd ſtaye them ſelues in that place where it was newe buylded: and for their great ſtrength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the cittie, as ſignifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other ſaye, that after the taking and deſtruction of TROYA, there were certaine TROYANS which ſauing them ſelues from the ſworde, tooke ſuche veſſells as they founde at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put with the THVSCANE ſhore, where they anckred neere vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being ſo ſore ſea ſicke, that poſſibly they could not any more endure the boiſterous ſurges of the ſeas: it happened one of them among the reſt (the nobleſt and wiſeſt of the companie) called ROMA, to counſaill the other women of her cõpanions to ſet their ſhippes a fire, which they dyd accordingly. Wherewith their huſbands at the firſt were maruelouſly offended. But afterwards, being compelled of neceſſitie to plant them ſelues neere vnto the cittie of PALLANTIVM, they were appeaſed when they ſawe things proſper better then they hoped for, finding the ſoyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore amongeſt other honours they dyd to requite this lady Roma, they called their cittie after her name, as from whom came the originall cauſe of the building and foundation thereof. They ſaye that from thence came this cuſtome continuing yet to this daye at ROME, that the women ſaluting their kinſefolkes and huſbands doe kiſſe them in the mouthe, for ſo dyd theſe TROYAN ladyes to pleaſe their huſbands, and to winne them againe, after they had loſt their fauours, and procured their diſpleaſures with burning of their ſhippes. Other ſaye that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and of the wife of AEneas: other ſaye of Aſcanius, the ſonne of AEneas, who named the cittie after her name. Other holde opinion that it was Romanus (the ſonne of Vlyſſes and of Circé) that firſt founded ROME: other will ſaye that it was Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from TROYA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyranne of the LATINES, who draue the THVSCANS out of thoſe parts

The beginning of kiſſing their kinſefolkes in the mouthe, came from the Troian women.

A partes: which departing out of THESSALY went first of all into LYDIA, and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALIE. And furthermore, they who thincke that Romulus (as in deede it carieth best likelyhod) was he that gaue the name to the cittie, doe not agree about his auncesters. For some of them write, that he was the sonne of AEneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALIE of a litle childe with his brother Remus: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowen, all other shippes were cast awaye, sauing the shippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to a staye vpon a very plaine euen grounde on the bancke, and bicause the children beyond all hope were saued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwardes called ROMA. Other saye that Roma the daughter of the first Troian ladye was maried vnto Latinus the sonne of Telemachus, by B whom she had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEmilia, the daughter of AEneas and of Lauinia, which was gotten with childe by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is sayed that there was sometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whose house through the permission of the goddes appeared such a like vision: that there rose vp in the harthe of his chymney the forme & facion of a mans priuie member, which continued there many dayes. And they saye, that at that time there was in THVSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius suche an aunswer: that he should cause his daughter yet vnmaried to haue carnall companie with the straunge thing, for she should beare a sonne, that should be famous for his valliancie, for strength of bodye, and his happie successe wherein he should exceede all men C of his time. Tarchetius tolde this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this straunge thing: but she disdaining to doe it, sent one of her waiting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was so mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddesse Vesta appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and charged him he should not doe it. Whereupon he dyd commaund them to make him a pece of clothe in the prisone, with promise that they should be maried when they had finished it. These poore maydes toyled at it all the liue longe daye, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commaundement) that dyd vndoe all they had done the daye before. In the meane time, this waiting woman that was gott with childe by this straunge thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twynnes: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with D expresse commaundement he should cast them awaye. This Teratius caryed them vnto the bancke of the riuer: thither came a shee woulfe and gaue them sucke, and certaine byrdes that brought litle crommes and put them in their mouthes, vntill a swyneheard perceyuing them, and wondring at the sight, dyd boldly goe to the children, and tooke them awaye with him. These infantes being thus preserued after they were come to mans state, dyd set vpon Tarchetius and slewe him. One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this storie thus. But the reporte that carieth best credit of all, and is allowed of by many writers: commeth from Diocles Peparethian, (whome Fabius Pictor followeth in many thinges) who was the first that put forth this storie among the GRECIANS, and specially the chiefest poynts of it. Though this matter be somewhat diuersely taken, yet in effect the storie is thus. The E right line and bloude of the kings of ALBA descended from AEneas, by succession from the father to the sonne, and the Kingdome fell in the ende betweene two brethern, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lotte to make diuision betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the golde, syluer, readye money, goodes, and iuells brought from TROIA. Numitor by his lotte chose the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the golde and treasure in his handes, dyd finde him selfe thereby the stronger, and so dyd easely take his Realme from him. And fearing least his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, there to passe her dayes in virginitie, & neuer to be maried: (some call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheles not longe after she was founde with childe, against the F rule and profession of the Vestall Nunnes. So nothing had saued her from present death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithstanding she was straightly locked vp, that no body could see her, nor speake with her, least she should be brought a bedde without Amulius knowledge. In the ende she was deliuered of A two fayre boyes and marueilous great twymmes: which made Amulius more affrayed then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throwe them awaye, that brought them vp. But whosoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throwe them awaye, put them in a troughe, and went towards the riuer with intention to throwe them in. Howbeit he found it risen so highe, and running so swiftely, that he durst not come neere the waters side, & so they being in the troughe, he layed them on the bancke. In the meane time the riuer swelling still, and ouerflowing the bancke, in such sorte that it came vnder the troughe: dyd gently wont to come vnder the same in the extreame heate of the daye, and there dyd Ruminare, that sacrifices to her they vse no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with honye. To these two children lying there in this sorte, they write, there came a she woulfe & gaue them sucke:

and a hitwaw also which dyd helpe to norishe and keepe them. These two beastes are thought to be cõsecrated to the god Mars, & the LATINES doe singularly honour & reuerence the hi- C twaw. This dyd much helpe to geue credit to the wordes of the mother, who affirmed she was conceyued of those two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thincke she was deceyued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce dyd rauishe her. Other holde opinion that the name of the nurce which gaue the two children sucke with her breastes, gaue occasion to cõmon reporte to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINES doe call with one selfe name shee woulfes Lupas, & women that geue their bodyes to all cõmers: as this nurce the wife of Faustulus (that Acca Laurentia Faustulus wife, that nurced the twynnes. brought these children home to her house) dyd vse to doe. By her right name she was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES doe sacrifice yet vnto this daye: and the priest of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the sheading of wine and milke accustomed D at burialls, and the feast it selfe is called Larentia. It is true that they honour also another La- rentia, for like occasion. The clercke or sexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one daye howe to driue awaye the time as it should seeme: of a certaine liuelines and boldnes, dyd desire The Greeke sayeth Larentia. Larẽtia feast. the god Hercules to playe at dyce with him, with condition that if he dyd winne, Hercules Laurentia a courtisan should be bounde to send him some good fortune: and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promised Hercules he would prouide him a very good supper, and would besides bring him a fayer gentlewoman to lye with all. The conditions of the playe thus rehearsed, the sexten first cast the dyce for Hercules, and afterwards for him selfe. It fell out that Hercules wanne, and the sexten meaning good fayth, and thincking it very mete to performe the bargaine that him selfe had made, prepared a good supper, and hyered this Laurentia the courtisan, which was E very fayer, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus hauing feasted her within the tẽple, and prepared a bedde readye there, after supper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules should haue comen in dede & layen with her. And it is said for trothe, that Hercules came thither: & cõmaunded her in the morning she should goe into the market place, & salute the first man she met, & kepe him euer for her friend. Which thing she performed, & the first man she Tarrutius. met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeres, & one that had gathered together marueilous wealth & riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, & loued her so dearely, that shortely after chaũcing to dye, he made her heire of all he had: whereof she disposed afterwards by her last will and testament, the best and greatest Velabrum whereof Liuie deca. 3. lib. 7. parte vnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported also, that she now being growen to be F famous & of great honour (as thought to be the lẽman of a god) dyd vanishe away sodainely in the self same place, where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrũ:
bicause

A bicause the riuer being ouerflowen, they were oftentimes compelled to passe by bote to goe to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other saye, that those tomblers & common players, which shewed sundrye games and pastimes to winne the fauour of the people, were wont to couer that passage ouer with canuas clothes and veyles, by which they goe from the market place to the lystes or shewe place where they ronne their horses, beginning their race euen at the place: and they call a veyle in their tongue, Velum. This is the cause why the seconde Laurentia is honored at Rome. Faustulus, chief neateheard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children and no bodye knewe it, as some saye: or as other reporte, (and likest to be true) with the priuitie & knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who secretly furnished them with money that brought vp the two young children. It is sayed also they were both con-

B ueyed vnto the cittie of the GABIANS, where they were brought vp at schole, & taught all other honest things, which they vse to teache the sonnes & childrē of good & noble mē. Further they saye they were named Remus and Romulus, bicause they were founde sucking on the teates of a woulfe. Nowe the beawtie of their bodyes dyd presently shewe, beholding onely but their stature and manner of their countenaunces, of what nature and linadge they were: and as they grewe in yeres, their manly corage increased maruelously, so as they became stowte and hardy men, in so much as they were neuer troubled or astonied at any daunger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainely that Romulus had more wit & vnderstanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deale with their neighbours, either cōcerning hunting, or the boundes and limites of their pastures: it was easely decerned in him, that he was

C borne to commaund, and not to obeye. For this cause they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, and of those which were their inferiours. As for the kings heardmen, they passed not muche for them, saying that they were euen like them selues, and so seemed not to care a Pynne for their anger or displeasure, but wholy gaue them selues to all gentlemanly exercises and trades, thincking to liue idely & at ease without trauell, was neither comly nor conuenient: but to exercise and harden their bodyes with hunting, running, pursuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe those which were oppressed with wronge and violence, shoulde be credit and commendation to them. By reason whereof, in very shorte time they grewe to great fame and renowne, And it fell out by chaunce there rose some stryfe and variance betwene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in so muche as those that were Numi-

D tors, caryed awaye by force some cattell of the others. Thother side would not beare that, but pursued fast after, and beating them well fauoredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greatest parte of the cattell they had caried away with them. Wherat Numitor stormed maruelously, but yet his men seemed to make but litle accoumpt of it, and purposing reuenge, they gathered about them a good companie of vacabonds (that had neither home, nor resting place) and certaine fugitiue bonde men which they intised ill fauoredly, incoraging them to steale awaye from their masters. Thus one daye whilest Romulus was busie about some sacrifice, (being a deuoute man and religious, and well geuen to serue the goddes, and to learne to diuine and tell before hande what things should happen and come to passe) it happened the heard men of Numitor to meete Remus very slenderly accompanied: so they fell

E vpon him sodainely, blowes were delt rowndely on bothe sides, and men were hurte on either parte. Howbeit Numitors men in the ende proued the stronger parte, and dyd take Remus by force, and caryed him straight before Numitor, alledging many complaintes and matters against him. Numitor durst not punish him of his owne authoritie, bicause he feared his brother Amulius, who was somewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earnestly besought him to doe him iustice, and not to suffer him being his owne brother, to receyue such iniurye of his men. There was not a man in the cittie of ALBA, but dyd greatly mislike the iniurie done to Numitor: and spake it openly, that he was no persone to be offered such a wronge. In so muche as Amulius moued herewith, dyd deliuer Remus into his handes, to punishe him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he

F beganne to consider better of him, with admiration howe goodly a younge man he was, howe in height and strength of bodye he passed all the rest of his people: and perceyuing in his face an assured constancie, and bolde stedfast corage that yelded not, nor was abashed for any

So he aſked him what he was, & who was his father and mother: ſpeaking to him in a more gentle wiſe, and with a friendlier countenaunce then before, to make him the bolder to anſwer, & be of better hope. Remus boldly aunſwered him. Truely I will not hide the trothe from thee, for thou ſeemeſt to me more worthie to be

For thou enquiereſt, and heareſt firſt before thou condemneſt: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill nowe, we thought we had bene the children of two of the Kings ſeruants, to wit of Fauſtulus and of Laurentia: I ſaye we, bicauſe my brother and I are two twynnes. But ſeeing we are nowe falſely accuſed vnto B

Numitors wiſdome. comparing theſe wordes, with the age the younge man ſeemed to be of, and conſidering well his face: dyd not reiect the hope of his imagination that ſmiled on him, but handled the matter ſo, that he found meanes to ſpeake ſecretly with his daughter, notwithſtanding at that time ſhe was kept very ſtraightly. Fauſtulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was priſoner, and that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to doe iuſtice, Fauſtulus care to ſaue Remus. went to praye Romulus to helpe him, and tolde him then whoſe children they were: for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darcke ſpeaches, and glawnſingwiſe, and ſo muche as ſufficed to put them in ſome hope. So Fauſtulus taking the troughe with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haſte, as marueilouſly affrayed for the preſent daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings ſouldiers which warded at the gates of the cittie, beganne to gather ſome D ſuſpition of Fauſtulus manner of comming: and he made him ſelfe to be the more ſuſpected, being queſtioned with about the cauſe of his repaire thither, that he faltred in his wordes: beſides, they eſpied his troughe which he caried vnder his cloke. Nowe amongeſt the warders, there was by chaunce one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be caſt awaye, and was preſent when they were left on the bancke of the riuer to the mercie of fortune. This man knewe the troughe by & by, aſwell by the facion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who miſtruſted ſtraight that which was true in deede. So he dyd not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Fauſtulus with him to haue him confeſſe the trothe. Fauſtulus being in this perplexitie, could not kepe all cloſe vpon examination, but dyd vtter out ſomewhat of the matter, and yet he tolde not all. For he plainely iuſtified the E children were aliue: yet he ſayed they were farre from the cittie of ALBA, where they kept beaſtes in the fields. And as for the troughe, he was going to carye it to Ilia, bicauſe ſhe had diuers times prayed him to let her ſee and feele it: to the ende ſhe might be the more aſſured of her hope, who promiſed her that one daye ſhe ſhould ſee her children againe. So it chaunced Amulius perplexed in his minde. vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly dothe vnto thoſe that are troubled, and doe any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to ſend one preſently (who in all other things was a very honeſt man, but a great friende of his brother Numitors) to aſke him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This perſone being come to Numitors houſe, founde him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witnes thereof, and of the good happe diſcouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perſwaded him howe to ſet vpon his brother, and to F diſpatche the matter with ſpede. So from that time forwards, he tooke their parte. On thother ſide alſo the matter gaue them no leiſure to deferre their enterpriſe, although they had bene willing:

A willing: for the whole caſe was ſomewhat blowen abroade. So Romulus then got ſtraight a power, and drewe very neere the cittie, and many of the citizens of ALBA went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Nowe Romulus power which he brought (ouer and beſides thoſe citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were diuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his bande, carying litle bundells of graſſe or of boughes tyed to the ende of their poles: The LATINES call theſe bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this daye in an armie of the Romaines, the ſouldiers which are all vnder one enſigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus ſturring vp thoſe that were within the cittie, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyranne Amulius fell in ſuche feare and agonie, that without prouiding any thing for his ſafety, they came vpon him ſodain-

Thus you heare howe neere Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian doe agree in reciting the ſtorie, who was the firſt in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the cittie of ROME: howbeit there are that thincke they are all but fables & tales deuiſed of pleaſure. But me thincks for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or diſcredited, if we will conſider fortunes ſtraunge effects vpon times, and of the greatnes alſo of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her preſent poſſeſſed power & authoritie, if the goddes had not frō the beginning bene workers of the ſame, & if there had not alſo bene ſome ſtraūge cauſe, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being nowe ſlayne as before, & after that all things were appeaſed, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the cittie of ALBA, being no lordes thereof, nor alſo would be lords of it, ſo long as their grandfa-

Wherefore after they had reſtored him to his eſtate, and had done the honour and duety they ought vnto their mother: they purpoſed to goe & build a cittie in thoſe places where they had bene firſt brought vp, for this was the honeſteſt culler they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced ſo to doe whether they would or not, for the great number of baniſhed men, and fugitiue ſlaues which were gathered together by them for their ſtrength, who had bene vtterly loſt and caſt away, if they had bene once diſcharged by them. Therfore it was of neceſſitie that they ſhould dwell by them ſelues, ſeparated in ſome place, to kepe this number together and in ſome order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the cittie of ALBA would not ſuffer ſuch baniſhed perſones and runnagates to be mingled amongeſt them, nor would receaue them into their

D cittie to be free among them. All which appeareth ſufficiently: firſt, bicauſe they tooke awaye women by force: and ſo not of inſolencie, but of neceſſitie, when they founde no man that would beſtow any of them. It is manifeſt alſo they dyd greately honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their cittie beganne a litle to be ſetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues and afflicted perſones, which they called the temple of the god Aſylæus. Where there was ſanctuarie and ſafety for all ſortes of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple, for whom it was alledged they could not deliuer any bonde man to his maſter, nor detter to his creditor, nor murtherer to the iuſtice that was fled thither for ſuccor, bicauſe the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expreſſely enioyned them to graunte ſanctuary to all thoſe that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in

E ſhorte ſpace their cittie floriſhed, & was repleaniſhed, where at the firſt foundation of it, they ſaye there was not aboue one thouſand houſes, as more at large hereafter ſhalbe declared. When they came nowe to the building of their cittie, Romulus & Remus the two brethern fell ſodainely at a ſtrife together about the place where the cittie ſhould be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure ſquare, and would needes it ſhould remaine in the place which he had choſen. Remus his brother choſe another place very ſtrong of ſituation, vpon mounte Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and nowe is called Rignarium. Notwithſtanding, in the ende they agreed betwene them ſelues this controuerſie ſhould be decided, by the flying of birds, which doe geue a happy diuination of things to come. So being ſett in diuers places by them ſelues to make obſeruation, ſome ſaye that there appeared vnto daye in their diuinations and ſoothe ſayings of the flying of birds, doe maruelouſly obſerue the flying of the vulters. It is true which the hiſtoriographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth: that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vulter to him, being readie to beginne any enterpriſe. For it is the foule of the worlde that dothe leaſt hurte, and neuer marreth nor deſtroyeth any thing that man dothe ſowe, plante, or ſet: conſidering that ſhe feedeth on carion only, and dothe neuer hurte nor kill any liuing thing. Alſo ſhe dothe not praye vpon dead fowle, for the likenes that is betwene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the ſakers doe murther, kill, and eate thoſe which are of their owne kynde. And yet as Æſchylus ſayeth, Needes muſt that fovvle accompted be moſt vile, Moſt rauening, and full of filthie minde, VVhich doth him ſelf, continually defile, by praying ſtill vpon his propre kinde.

Moreouer, other birdes are allwayes (as a man would ſaye) before our eyes, and doe daylie ſhewe them ſelues vnto vs: where the vulter is a very rare byrde, and hardely to be ſeene, and men doe not eaſely finde their ayeries. Which hathe geuen ſome occaſion to holde a falſe opinion, that the vulters are paſſagers, and come into theſe partes out of ſtraunge countryes. The prognoſticators alſo thincke, that ſuche things which are not ordinarie, and but ſeldome ſeene, be not naturall, but miraculouſly ſent by the goddes to prognoſticate ſomething. When Remus knewe howe his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had caſt a dytche, as it were for the wall about his cittie, Remus dyd not only ſcorne it, but hindered alſo his worke, and in the ende for a mockerie lept ouer his wall. To conclude, he dyd ſo much, that at the laſt he was ſlayne there by Romulus owne handes as ſome ſaye: or as other holde opinion, by the handes of one of his men which was called Celer. In this fight they ſlewe Fauſtulus, and Pliſtinus alſo his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howſoeuer the matter fell out, this Celer abſented him ſelfe from Rome, and went into the countrye of Thvscane. And they ſaye, that men which are quicke, and readye vpon a ſodaine, tooke their names euer after vpon him, and were called Celeres. As amongeſt other, Quintus Metellus, after the death of his father, hauing in very fewe dayes made the people of Rome to ſee a combate of fenſers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the ſharpe, they ſurnamed him Celer, for that the Romaines marueiled howe he could prepare his things in ſo ſhorte a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing nowe buried his brother, and his other two bringers vp (called foſter fathers) in the place they call Remonia: beganne then to buyld and laye the foundation of his cittie, ſending for men out of Thvsgane, who dyd name and teache him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obſerue there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy myſterie. And firſt of all they made a rounde dytche in the place called at this daye Comitium, into which they dyd caſt their chiefeſt and beſt things, which men vſe lawfully for good, and naturally as moſt neceſſarie. After that they dyd throwe alſo into it, a litle of the earthe, from whence euery man came, and mingled theſe all together. This dytche in their ceremonies is called the worlde, in Latine Mundus, euen the ſelfe ſame name the Latines call the Vniuerſall. About this dytche they dyd trace the compaſſe of the cittie they woulde buylde, euen as one would drawe a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the cittie taketh a plough, to which he faſtened a culter or ploughe ſhare of braſſe, and ſo yoked in the ploughe an oxe and a cowe, he him ſelfe holding the ploughe dyd make rounde about the compaſſe of the cittie a deepe furrowe. Thoſe which followed him, had the charge to throwe the turues of earthe inward into the cittie, which the ploughe ſhare raiſed vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrowe thus caſt vp was the whole compaſſe of their walle, which they call in Latine Pomœrium, by ſhortning of the ſyllables, for poſt murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they dyd take of the ploughe ſhare, and drawe the ploughe, with leauing a certain ſpace of earthe vnbroken vp: whereupon the Romaines thincke all the compaſſe of their walles holy and ſacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and ſanctified, they would haue had a conſcience through them to haue brought in, or caried out of the cittie, any things neceſſarie for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Nowe they beleeue

A leene certainely, that this ceremonie of the foundation of their cittie was made the one and twentie of Aprill: bicause the ROMAINES doe yet keepe that daye holy daye, and call it the feast of the natiuitie of their countrye. On which daye they dyd not in olde time sacrifice any thing that had life, as esteeming that daye (which was the natiuitie of their cittie) to be moste mete to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloude. Notwithstanding before ROME was buylded, they had another feast called the sheapeheards or heardmens holy daye, which they dyd celebrate vpon the same daye, and called it Palilia. Nowe at this daye the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINES is cleane contrarie to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they holde opinion for certaintie that the daye on which Romulus founded his cittie, was assuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada: that is to saye, the

B thirtie daye. On which there was seene an eclypse of the moone, which they suppose was obserued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the cittie of TEOS) in the thirteenth yere of the sixt Olympiade. Likewise in the time of Martus Varro (as a man learned, and one that had redde as much of auncient stories as any ROMAINE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great philosopher and mathematician. Who being geuen to the calculation of astronomie for the delight of speculation only, wherein he was thought moste excellent: it dyd fall out that Varro gaue him this question, to searche out what hower and daye the natiuitie of Romulus was, who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they doe in the resolutions of certaine geometricall questions. For they saye, that by the selfe same science, one maye tell before of things

C to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainely the hower of his natiuitie: and howe one maye tell also the hower of his natiuitie, when by accidents they knowe what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius dyd the question that Varro gaue him. And hauing throughely considered the aduentures, dedes, and gestes of Romulus, howe long he liued, and howe he dyed: all which being gathered and conferred together, he dyd boldly iudge for a certaintie, that he was conceyued in his mothers wombe, in the first yere of the seconde Olympiade, the three and twentie daye of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Chaac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which hower there was a whole eclypse of the sunne: And that he was borne into the worlde, the one and twenteth of the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the rising of the sunne. And that ROME was begonne by him on the ninth daye of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS

D call Pharmuthi, and aunswereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will saye that a cittie hathe his reuolution and his time of continuaunce appointed, as well as the life of a man: and that they knewe by the situation of the starres, the daye of her beginning and foundation. These things and suche other like, peraduenture will please the readers better, for their straungenes and curiositie, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Nowe after he had founded his cittie, he first and foremost dyd diuide in two cōpanies, all those that were of age to carie armour. In euery one of these companies there were three thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, bicause they were sorted of the chosen men that were pyckt out amongest all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which signifieth the people.

E After this, he made a hundred counsellers of the best and honestest men of the cittie, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would saye, the counsell of the auncients. So they were called Patricians, as some will saye, the counsaill of the fathers lawfull children, which fewe of the first inhabitants could shewe. It maye be, some will saye this name was geuen them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the sanctuarie of their cittie, which worde they vse at this daye in the selfe same signification: as one that followed Euander into ITALIE, was called Patron, bicause he was pitiefull, and relieued the poore and litle children, and so got him selfe a name for his pitie and humanitie. But me thinckes it were more like the trothe to saye, that Romulus dyd call them so, bicause he thought the chiefest men should haue a fatherly care of the meaner sorte: consider-

Romulus instituteth a cōmon wealth. What the Patricians & Senate were.

F ring also it was to teache the meaner sorte that they should not feare th'authoritie of the greater, nor enuie at their honours they had, but rather in all their causes should vse their fauour and good will, by taking them as their fathers. For euen at this present, straungers call thoſe of the Senate, lordes or captaines: but the naturall ROMAINES call them, Patres Conſcripti, which is a name of fatherhed and dignitie without enuie. It is true that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but ſithence, bicauſe they were many ioyned vnto the firſt, they haue bene named Patres Conſcripti, as a man ſhould ſaye, fathers of recorde together: which is the honorableſt name he could haue deuiſed to make a difference betwext the Senatours, and the people. Furthermore, he made a difference betweene the chiefer cittizens, and the baſer people, by calling the better ſorte Patroni, as muche to ſaye, as defenders: and the meaner ſorte Clientes, as you would ſaye, followers, or men protected. This dyd breede a marueilous great loue and good wil lamong them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutuall curteſies and pleaſures: for the Patrons dyd helpe the clients to their right, defended their cauſes in iudgement, dyd geue vnto them counſaill, and dyd take all their matters in hande. The clients againe enterchaungeably humbled them ſelues to their patrons, not onely in outwarde honour and reuerence towardes them, but otherwiſe dyd helpe them with money to marrie and aduaunce their daughters, or els to paye their dettes and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no lawe nor magiſtrate that could compell the patron to be a witnes againſt his client: nor yet the client to witneſſe againſt his patron. So they increaſed, and continued, all other rights and offices of amitie and friendſhippe together, ſauing afterwards they thought it a great ſhame and reproache for the better, and richer, to take rewarde of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we haue ſpoken ſufficiētly. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the cittie was layed, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauiſhement of women. There are ſome which laye it vpon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, and geuen to prophecies and aunſwers of the goddes, foretolde that his cittie ſhould become very great and mightie, ſo as he rayſed it by warres, and increaſed it by armes: and he ſought out this culler to doe miſchief, and to make warre vpon the SABYNES. To proue this true, ſome ſaye he cauſed certaine of their maydes by force to be taken awaye, but not paſt thirtie in number, as one that rather ſought cauſe of warres, then dyd it for neede of mariages: which me thinckes was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrarie. For ſeeing his cittie was incontinently repleaniſhed with people of all ſortes, whereof there were very fewe that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countryes, and the moſt parte of them poore and needye, ſo as their neighbours diſdayned them much, and dyd not looke they would longe dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maydes and rauiſhing them, to haue an entrie into alliance with the SABYNES, and to entiſe them further to ioyne with them in mariage, if they dyd gentely intreate theſe wiues they had gotten, enterpriſed this violent taking of their maydes, and rauiſhing of them in ſuche a ſorte. Firſt he made it to be commonly bruited abroade in euery place, that he had founde the altar of a god hidden in the grounde, and he called the name of the god, Conſus: either bicauſe he was a god of counſaill, wherupon the ROMAINES at this daye in their tongue call Conſilium, which we call counſell: and the chief magiſtrates of their cittie Conſules, as we ſaye counſellers. Other ſaye it was the altar of the god Neptune, ſurnamed the patron of horſes. For this altar is yet at this daye within the great liſtes of the cittie, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vſe the running games of their horſe race. Other ſaye bicauſe counſell euer muſt be kept cloſe and ſecret, they had good reaſon to kepe the altar of this god Conſus hidden in the grounde. Nowe other write when it was opened, Romulus made a ſacrifice of wonderfull ioye, and afterwardes proclaymed it openly in diuers places, that at ſuche a daye there ſhould be common playes in ROME, and a ſolemne feaſt kept of the god Conſus, where all that were diſpoſed to come ſhould be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all partes. He him ſelfe was ſet in the chiefeſt ſeate of the ſhowe place, apparelled fayer in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his cittie about him. And there hauing purpoſed this rauiſhement you haue heard of, he had geuen the ſigne before: that the ſame ſhould beginne, when he ſhould riſe vp and folde a playte of his gowne, and vnfolde the ſame againe. Hereupon his men ſtoode attending with their ſwordes: who ſo ſone as they perceyued the ſigne was geuen, with their ſwordes drawen in hande, and with great ſhowtes and cryes ranne violently on the maydes and daughters of the SABYNES to take them awaye and rauiſhe them, and ſuffered the men to ronne awaye,

A awaye, without doing them any hurte or violence. So some saye, there were but thirtie rauished, after whose names were called the thirtie linages of the people of ROME. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were fiue hundred and seuen and twentie; and Iuba, sixe hundred foure score and three. In the which is singularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he him selfe dyd take then but onely one of the maydes, named Hersilia: that afterwardes was the only cause & mediation of peace betwext the SABYNES and the ROMAINES. Which argueth plainely, that it was not to doe the SABYNES any hurte, nor to satisfie any disordinate lust, that they had so forcibly vndertaken this rauishement: but to ioyne two peoples together, with the straighteste bondes that could be betweene men. This Hersilia as some saye, was maried vnto one Hostilius, the noblest man at that time amongest the ROMAINES: or

B as others write, vnto Romulus him selfe, which had two children by her. The first was a daughter, and her name was Prima, bicause she was the first: the other was a sonne, whom he named Aollius, bicause of the multitude of people he had assembled together in his cittie, and afterwardes he was surnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth, wherein notwithstanding there be diuers that doe contrarie him. Among those which rauished then the daughters of the SABYNES, it is sayed there were founde certaine meane men carying away, a marueilous passing fayer one. These met by chaunce on the waye, certaine of the chief of the cittie, who would haue taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they begaune to crye they caried her vnto Talassius, who was a younge man marueilously well beloued of euery bodye. Which when the others vnderstoode, they were exceeding glad, and

C they commended them: in so much as there were some which sodainely turned backe againe, and dyd accompanie them for Talassius sake, crying out a lowde, and often on his name. From whence the custome came, which to this daye the ROMAINES synge at their mariages, Talassius, like as the GRECIANS synge Hymeneus. For it is sayed he was compted very happie that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wise, and well learned, tolde me once it was the crye and signe which Romulus gaue to his men, to beginne the rauishement: whereupon those which caried them awaye, went crying this worde Talassius, and that from thence the custome hathe continued, that they synge it yet at their mariages. Neuertheles the most parte of authors, specially Iuba, thinckes it is a warning to remember the newe maried women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the GRE-

And if it be true the ROMAINES vsed this terme of Talassia, as we of GREECE doe vse: we might by coniecture yeld another reason for it, which should carie a better likelyhoode and proofe. For when the SABYNES after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINES, they put in an article in fauour of the women in the treatie, that they should not be bounde to serue their husbands in any other worke, but in spinning of wolle. Euer since this custome hathe growen, that those which geue their daughters in mariage, and those who leade the bryde, and such as are present at the wedding, speake in sporte to the newe maried wife, laughing, Talassius: in token that they doe not leade the bryde for any other worke or seruice, but to spinne wolle. E the threshold of her husbands dore, but she is hoysed pretely into the house: bicause the SABYNE women at that time were so lift vp, & caried away by force. They saye also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded wiues heare, with the Iron head of a launcing, came vp then likewise: this storie being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the swords poynte: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and showe the causes of the ROMAINES facions and customes. This rauishement was put in execution about the eighteenth daye of the moneth then called Sextilis, and nowe named August: on which daye they yet celebrate the feast they call Consalia. Nowe the SABYNES were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within inclosed walles: being a thing fit for their noble courages that dyd to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers and persuasions, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, and then afterwardes, that he would cause them to be asked in mariage of their parents, as bothe reason and lawe would require. To thend that with good will and consent of all parties, both peoples might contract amitie and alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made aunswer, he could not restore the maydes which his people had taken awaye and maried: but most friendly he prayed the SABYNES to be contented with their alliance. This aunswer being returned, and not liked, whileſt the princes and communaltie of the SABYNES were occupied in consultation, and about the arming of them selues: Acron king of the CENINENSES (a man exceeding couragious and skilfull in the warres, and one that from the beginning mistrusted the ouer bolde & stowte enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, cõsidering the late rauishment of the SABYNES daughters, and howe he was alreadye greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and somwhat vntolerable, if he were not chasticed and brought lower) first beganne to inuade him with a puissant armie, and to make hotte and violent warres vpon him. Romulus on th'other side prepared also, and went forth to meete him. When they were come so neere together that they might see one another, they sent defiance to eache other, & prayed that they two might fight man to man amiddest their armies, & neither of theirs to sturre a foote. Bothe of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his prayer vnto Iupiter, dyd promise, and made a vowe: that if he dyd geue him the victorie to ouercome, he would offer vp to him the armour of his enemie, which he dyd. For first he slew Acron in the field, & afterwards gaue battell to his men, & ouerthrew them also. Lastely he tooke his cittie, where he did no hurte nor yet displeasure to any, sauing that he dyd commaũde them to pull downe their houses, & destroy them, and to goe dwell with him at ROME: where they should haue the selfe same rightes & priuiledges which the first inhabitants did enioye. There was nothing more enlarged the cittie of ROME, then this manner of pollicie, to ioyne allwayes vnto it those she had ouercome & vancquished. Romulus now to discharge his vowe, & in suche sorte that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleasaunt to his cittizens to beholde: did cut downe a goodly straight growen young oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lye. The same he trimmed & dyd set forth after the manner of victorie, hanging and tying all about it in fayer order, the armour and weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, and putting vpon his long bushe of heare, a garland of lawrell, layed the young oke vpon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his cittie, & songe a royall songe of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the cittie in order of battell: where his cittizens receyued him in all passing wise & triumphe. This noble & stately entrie euer since hath geuen them minds in such sorte, & in statelier wise to make their triumphe. The offering of this triumphe was dedicated to Iupiter surnamed Feretrian: bicause the Latine worde Ferire, signifieth to hurt & kill: & the prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt & kill his enemie. Such spoyles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore sayeth Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit me thinckes it were more likely to saye, that they were so named of this worde Opus, which betokeneth a dede, bicause he must needes be the chief of the armie, that hath slayne with his owne hands the generall of his enemies, & that must offer the spoyles called Spolia opima, as you would saye, his principal spoyles & dedes. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines onely: of the which Romulus was the first, who slew Acron, king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tolumnius, the generall of the THVSCANS. Clodius Marcellus was the thirde, who slewe Britomartus, king of the GAVLES, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus & Marcellus, they made their entrie into the cittie, carying their triumphes vpõ charets triumphant: but Romulus dyd not so. Therefore in this poynt Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus dyd enter into ROME vpon a charret triũphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the sonne of Demaratus, who first dyd set out triumphes in so stately and magnificent showe. Other holde opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euer entred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in Rome, carying his triumphe a foote. After this ouerthrowe & taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the cities of FIDENA, CRVSTVMERIVM, & ANTEMNA, rose alltogether against the ROMAINES, whiles

A whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing thē selues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrowe: & left their cities to the spoyle of Romulus, their lands to be geuen where he thought good, and them selues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then dyd geue their lands among his cittizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maydens that they had taken away & rauished. For he was contēted that the fathers of them should kepe still their lāds. By & by the other SABYNES stomaking thereat, did chuse them a generall called Tatius, & so went with a puysant army toward the cittie of ROME, whereunto to approche at that time it was very harde, the castell or keepe of their cittie being seated, where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrison, whereof Tarpeius was captaine, & not his daughter Tarpeia, as some will saye, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the ca-

B ptaines daughter, for the desire she had to haue all the golde bracelets which they dyd weare about their armes, solde the forte to the SABYNES, and asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: & she opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNES into the castell. Antigonus then was not alone, who sayed, he loued those which did betraye, & hated thē that had betrayed: nor yet Cæsar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN, that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. And it is a comon affection which we beare to wicked persons, whilest we stand in neede of them: not vnlike for all the world to those which haue nede of the gall & poyson of venemous beasts. For when they finde it, they are glad, & take it to serue their turne: but after their turne is serued, & they haue that they sought, they hate the crueltie of such beasts. So played Tatius at that time,

C For when he was gotten into the castell, he cōmanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to geue her all they weare on their left armes, & to doe as he did: who taking from his owne arme first, the bracelet which he ware, did cast it to her, and his target after. And so did all the rest in like sorte, in so much as being borne downe to the ground by the weight of bracelets & targets, she dyed as pressed to deathe vnder her burden. Neuertheles Tarpeius self was atteinted, & condēned also of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba sayeth, it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write nowe otherwise of Tarpeia, saying she was the daughter of Tatius, generall of the SABYNES, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how she was punished in this sorte by her own father after her said treason cōmitted: those I saye, amōgest whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the poet Simylus

D also dothe dote most, who sayeth Tarpeia solde the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom she was in loue: as in these verses dothe appeare.

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolishe mynde, vvhich nere vnto the Capitoll did dvvell (In feruent flames, of beastly loue beblynde, vvherevvith the king of Gaules did make her svvell) Caused stately ROME surprised for to be by enemies, as euery man maye see.
And so throughe hope of his fidelitie betrayed her syre, vvith all his familie.

E And a litle after, in speaking of the manner of her deathe, he sayeth also:

Yet lo: the Gaules, those vvorthie men of might threvv her not dovvne, into the vvaues of Po, But from their armes, vvherevvith they vvonte to fight they cast their shields vpon her body so, That she surprest vvith such an heauy vvaight, (Ah vvoefull mayde) to death vvas smoothred straight.

This mayden therefore being buried in the same place, the whole hill was called afterwardes Tarpeius after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King dyd dedicate all the plage to Iupiter: for then they caryed her bones into some other place, and so it lost her name. Onles and ſo returned to geue a newe onſet, and cryed out all he might to his ſouldiers to tarye, and ſhewe their face againe to their enemie. But for all his lowde crying, they left no flying his handes ſtraight to heauen, dyd moſt feruently praye vnto Iupiter, that it would pleaſe him D to ſtaye the flying of his people, and not ſuffer the Romaines glorie thus to fall to their their fathers and their husbands, ſome carying their ſucking babes in their armes, other ha-

A you, that we ſhould deſerue ſuche an heape of euills, as we haue already ſuffered, and yet you make vs beare? we were as you knowe violently (and againſt all lawe) rauiſhed by thoſe, whoſe nowe we remaine. But oure fathers, oure brethern, oure mothers and friends haue left vs with them ſo long, that proceſſe of time, and the ſtraighteſt bonds of the worlde, haue tyed vs nowe ſo faſt to them, whom mortally before we hated: that we are conſtrayned nowe to be ſlighted thus, to ſee them fight, yea and to lament & dye with them, who before vniuſtly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to oure reſcue when we were virgines vntouched, nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly aſſaulted vs, poore ſowles: but nowe ye come to take the wiues from their husbands, & the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thincke to geue vs nowe dothe grieue vs more, then the forſaking of vs was ſorowfull to vs then.

B Suche is the loue they haue borne vnto vs, and ſuche is the kyndenes we beare againe to them. Nowe, if ye dyd fight for any other cauſe then for vs, yet were it reaſon ye ſhould let fall your armes for oure ſakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in lawe, coſins & brothers in lawe) euen from thoſe againſt whom you now bend your force. But if all this warre beganne for vs, we hartely beſeeche you then that you will receyue vs with your ſonnes in lawe, and your ſonnes by them, and that you will reſtore vnto vs oure fathers, oure brethern, oure kinſefolkes and friends, without ſpoyling vs of oure husbands, of our children, and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs woefull captiues and priſoners in oure mindes. Theſe requeſtes and perſuaſions by Herſilia, and other the SABYNE women being heard, bothe the armies ſtayed, and helde euerie bodie his hand, and ſtraight the two generalles imparled together. During which

C parle they brought their husbands and their children, to their fathers and their brethern. They brought meate and drincke for them that would eate. They dreſſed vp the woundes of thoſe that were hurte. They caried them home with them to their houſes. They ſhewed them howe they were miſtreſſes there with their husbands. They made them ſee howe greately they were accompted of and eſteemed: yea howe with a wedlocke loue and reputation they were honored. So in the end peace was concluded betwene them, wherein it was articled, that the SABYNE women which would remaine with their husbands ſhould tarye ſtill, and be exempted from all worke or ſeruice (as aboue recited) ſaue only ſpinning of wolle. And that the SABYNES & ROMAINES ſhould dwell together in the cittie, which ſhould be called ROMA, after Romulus name: & the inhabitants ſhould be called Quirites, after the name of the cittie of Tatius king of

The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this daye Comitium: bicauſe that Coire, in the Latine tongue ſignifieth to aſſemble. So the cittie being augmented by the one halfe, they dyd chooſe of the SABYNES another hundred new PATRICIANS, vnto the firſt hundred of the ROMAINES that were choſen before. Then were the Legions made of ſixe thouſand footemen, & ſix hundred horſemen. After they diuided their inhabitāts into three Tribes, wherof thoſe that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenſes after his name: thoſe that came of Tatius were called Tatienſes after his name: and thoſe that were of the third ſtocke, were called Lucerenſes, as from the Latine word Lucus, called with vs a groue in Engliſh, bicauſe thither great number of people of all ſortes dyd gather, which afterwards were made citizens of ROME. For hereupon the ROMAINES call thoſe at this daye, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heades of the people. But euery one of theſe principall wardes had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them, which ſome thincke were called after the names of the thirtie SABYNE women that were rauiſhed: but that ſemeth falſe, bicauſe many of them cary the names of the places they came frō. Howbeit at that time many things were ſtabliſhed & ordeined in honour of women: as to geue them place, the vpper hande in meeting them, the vpper hand in ſtreets: to ſpeake no fowle or diſhoneſt word before them, no man to vnraye himſelfe, or ſhew naked before them: that they ſhould not be called before criminall iudges ſitting vpō homicides & murderers: that their children ſhould weare about their necks a kind of a

F Iuell called Bulla, facioned in māner like theſe water bubbles that riſe vpō the water when it beginneth to raine: & that their gownes ſhould be garded with purple. Now the two Kings dyd not ſtraight cōferre together ſo ſone as any occaſion of buſines was offered them, but either of them dyd firſt counſell alone with his hundred Senatours, and afterwards they dyd all aſſemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where nowe is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this preſent, the ſtayers of the fayer bäcke, then the deſcēt of mount Palatine, as they goe to the ſhowe place or great liſtes, where they ſaye was ſomtime the holy cornell tree, whereof they make ſo great accompt. Romulus one daye deſirous to proue his ſtrength, threwe (as it is ſayed) a darte from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine. The ſtaffe whereof was of a cornell tree: & the Iron of it entred ſo deepe into the ground being a luſtye fatte ſoyle, that no man could pul it out, although many proued it, and did the beſt they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did ſo nouriſhe the ende of this ſtaffe, that it tooke roote, and beganne to ſpread braunches: ſo that in time it became a fayer great cornell tree, which the ſucceſſours of Romulus dyd incloſe with a walle, & dyd kepe and worſhippe it as a very holy thing. If by chaunce any went to ſee it, and found it looked not freſhe and grene, but like a tree withered and dryed awaye for lacke of moyſture: he went awaye ſtraight as one affrayed, crying to all he met (& they with him went crying ſtill) in euery place, water, water, as it had bene to haue quenched a fyre. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with veſſels of water, to water and moyſte the tree. In the time of Caius Cæſar, who cauſed the ſtayers about it to be repayred: they ſaye the labourers rayſing the place, and digging about this cornell tree, dyd by negligence hurte the rootes of the ſame in ſuche ſorte, as afterwardes it dryed vp altogether. Nowe the SABYNES receyued the moneths after the manner of the Romaines, whereof we haue written ſufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vſed the SABYNES ſheldes: and both he and his people chaunged the facion of their armour and weapons they vſed. For the ROMAINES before dyd carye litle ſheldes after the facion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy dayes and ſacrifices, they kept them bothe together, and dyd not take awaye any of them, which either the one or the other people obſerued before, but they added thereunto ſome other newe. As that which they call Matronalia, which was inſtituted in honour of the women, bicauſe by their meanes peace was cōcluded. And that alſo of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be the goddeſſe of fate or deſtinie, bicauſe ſhe hathe rule & power ouer the natiuities of men, by reaſon whereof, the mothers call vpon her often, & reuerence her very much. Other ſaye ſhe was the wife of Euander the Arcadian, who being a propheteſſe inſpired by the god Phœbus, gaue the oracles in verſe, wherupō ſhe was ſurnamed Carmenta, bicauſe that Carmina in Latine ſignifie verſes: for it is of certaintie that her proper name was Nicoſtrata. Howbeit there are ſome which geue another manner of deriuation and interpretation of this worde Carmenta, which is the liklier to be true: as if they would ſaye, Carens mente: which ſignifieth wanting wit, for the very furie that taketh them when they are inſpired with the propheticall ſpirite. For in Latine Carere, betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, ſignifieth wit. As for the feaſt of Palilia, we haue tolde of it before: but the feaſt of Lupercalia, conſidering the time of celebrating thereof, it ſeemeth it is ordeined for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging dayes. The dayes in the olde time on which they did celebrate the ſame, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feaſt, is as much to ſaye, as the feaſt of woulues. Wherefore it ſeemeth to be a feaſt of great antiquitie, and inſtituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euāder: albeit the name of woulues is as comon to the females, as the males, & ſo it might perhappes be called, by reaſon of the woulfe that brought vp Romulus. For we ſee thoſe which ronne vp & down the cittie that daye, & they call Luperci, doe beginne their courſe in the very place where they ſaye Romulus was caſt out. Howbeit many things are done, whereof the originall cauſe were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of the yere are killed, then they bring two young boyes, noble mens ſonnes, whoſe foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloude of the goates that are ſacrificed. By & by they drye their forheads with wolle dipped in milke. Thē the yong boyes muſt laughe immediately after they haue dried their forheads. That done they cut the goates ſkinnes, & make thongs of thē, which they take in their hands, & ronne with them all about the cittie ſtarck naked (ſauing they haue a clothe before their ſecrets) and ſo they ſtrike with theſe thonges all they mete in their waye. The yonge wiues doe neuer ſhonne them at all, but are well contēted to be ſtriken with them, beleeuing

A beleeuing it helpeth them to be with childe, and alſo to be eaſely deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feaſt, that theſe LVPERCIANS which ronne about the cittie, doe alſo ſacrifice a dogge. Cõcerning this feaſt, the Poet named Butas dothe write ſomewhat in his elegies, where ſhewing the occaſion of the fond cuſtomes and ceremonies of the Romaines, he dothe ſaye that Romulus after he had ſlayne Amulius, did runne ſtraight with great ioye to the very place where the wolfe gaue him & his brother ſucke, in memory of which rũning, he ſayeth this feaſt of Lupercalia was celebrated: & that the noble mens younger ſonnes doe runne through the cittie, ſtriking & laying on them which they meete in their way with their goate thongs, in token that Remus and Romulus ranne from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawen ſwordes in their hãds. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloudy knife, is in remẽbrance of the

B daunger they ſtoode in at that time to haue bene ſlaine. Laſt of all, the drying of their foreheads with wolle dipped in milke, is in memorie of the milke they ſucked of the woulfes. But Caius Acilius writeth, that Remus and Romulus before Rome was built, did happen to loſe their beaſts on a daye, & after they had made certaine prayers vnto Faunus for the finding of them, they ranne here & there ſtarcke naked as they went a ſeeking of thẽ, for feare they ſhould haue bene troubled with ouermuch heate & ſweatig. And this is the cauſe he ſayeth, why the LVPERCIANS doe at this daye ronne about naked. And if it be true they make this ſacrifice for a purging, a man might ſaye they might offer vp a dogge for that purpoſe, like as the Græcians in their ſacrifices of purgatiõ doe vſe to carie out all their doggs. And in many places they doe obſerue this ceremonie, to driue out the doggs, which they call Periſcylaciſmes. Otherwiſe, if it be of a thanck-

C fullnes to the woulfe that gaue Romulus ſucke, & ſaued him from periſhing, that the Romaines doe ſolemniſe this feaſt: it is not impartinẽt they ſacrifice a dogge, bicauſe he is enemie to the woulues. Onles a man would ſaye it was to puniſhe this beaſt, which troubleth and letteth the LVPERCIANS when they runne. Some ſaye alſo it was Romulus, who firſt inſtituted it a religion to kepe holy fire, & that firſt ordeined holie virgines, which are called Veſtales: other doe aſcribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithſtanding it is moſt certaine otherwiſe, that Romulus was a very deuoute man, & greatly ſkilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds: for which cauſe he did ordinarilie carie the augurs crooked ſtaffe, called in Latin Lituus. It is a rodde crooked at the end, wherewith the augurs or ſoothſayers when they ſit down to behold the flying of birds, doe poynte out & marke the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace:

D howbeit it was loſt in the time of warres with the GAVLES, when the cittie of ROME was taken. Afterwards when theſe barbarous people were chaſed and driuen out, it was founde againe (as it is ſayed) all whole, within a great hill or heape of aſhes, hauing no mãner of hurte, where all things els about it had bene conſumed and marred with the fire. He is ſayd to haue made certaine lawes, among which there is one that ſeemeth ſomewhat harde, which is: that the man is ſuffered to put awaye his wife, and in ſome caſe to geue her nothing: and like libertie is not geuen to the wife to put awaye her husband. As if ſhe maye be proued to haue conſented to the poyſoning of her children, or to haue counterfaited her husbands keyes, or to haue committed adulterie. But if he put her awaye for any other cauſe, then the one halfe of the goodes is adiuged to the wife, and the other moytie to the goddeſſe Ceres: and he that putteth away his wife

E after this ſorte, is commanded further, to ſacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This alſo was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordeined no payne nor puniſhement for parricides (that is for thoſe that kill their parents) called yet all murder parricide, to ſhewe how deteſtable that murder was, and as for parricides, he thought it vnpoſſible. And it ſeemed a great while, he had reaſon to thincke ſo, that ſuch wickednes would neuer happen in the worlde. For in fixe hundred yeres together it was not knowen that any man in ROME committed ſuche an offence: and the firſt parricide with them was Lucius Oſtius, after the warres of Hanniball. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the firſt yere of the reigne of Tatius, ſome of his kynſemen and friendes met by chaunce on the waye certeine ambaſſadours, comming from the citie of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whom they ſet vpon, and ment to haue robbed them.

F The ambaſſadours reſiſting them, and not willing to deliuer their money, they made no more a doe, but ſlewe them. This haynous deede being thus committed, Romulus was of opinion they ſhoulde be executed openly in the highe waye for example. But Tatius deferred it ſtill from daye to daye, and dyd allwayes excuſe the matter vnto him, which was the only cauſe, they fell out one with the other. For in all things els, they caried them ſelues as honeſtly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a common conſent and good accorde. But the parents & kynſefolkes of thoſe who were murdered, when they ſawe they could haue no iuſtice bicauſe of Tatius: watched him one daye as he ſacrificed with Romulus, in the cittie of Lauinium, and ſtabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather prayſed him for a good and righteous prince. Romulus cauſed the bodye of Tatius to be ſtraight taken vp, and buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place nowe called Armiluſtrium. Further he neuer ſhewed any countenaunce to reuenge his death. There are ſome Hiſtoriographers that write, that thoſe of the cittie of Laurentum being afeard at this murder, dyd deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambaſſadours. He notwithſtāding dyd let them goe againe, ſaying: one murder was requited by another. This gaue ſome occaſion of ſpeache to thincke, he was glad he was rydde of his companion: yet the Sabynes neither ſturred nor rebelled for all this, but ſome of them were affrayed of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honour they gaue him as a god, continuing ſtill in duetie & obedience towards him. Diuers ſtraūgers alſo had Romulus valiancie in greāt honour: as amongeſt other, thoſe who then were called the auncient Latines, which ſent ambaſſadours to him to make league and amitie with him. He deuiſed to take the cittie of Fidena which was nere neighbour to Rome. Some ſaye he tooke it vpon a ſodaine, hauing ſent before certen horſe men to breake downe the hookes & hingewes with force, which the gates hang by: & him ſelf came after with the reſt of his armie, and ſtale vpon them, before the cittie miſtruſted any thing. Other write that the Fidenates firſt inuaded his coūtrye, and foraged vnto the very ſuburbes of Rome, where they did great harme: and howe Romulus layed an ambuſhe in their waye as they returned home, and ſlewe a great number of them. When he tooke their cittie, he did not raſe it, but made a colonye of it, (as a place to ſend the ouerincreaſe of Rome vnto) whether he ſent afterwards two thouſand fiue hundred Romains to inhabite there: & it was on the thirtenth daye of Aprill, which the Romaines call the Ides of the ſame moneth. Not long after there roſe ſuche a great plague in Rome, that men died ſodainely, and were not ſicke: the earth brought forth no fruite: bruite beaſts deliuered no increaſe of their kynde: there rayned alſo droppes of bloude in Rome, as they ſaye. In ſo much as beſides the euills men felt in this extremitie, they fell in a marueilous feare of the wrathe of the goddes. Afterwards perceiuing the like happened to the inhabitants of Laurētum, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance and heauie hand of the goddes, who plagued and puniſhed theſe two citties for the murder committed vpon Tatius, and the ambaſſadours that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both ſides were apprehended, and executed: and theſe plagues by and by ceaſed both in the one and in the other cittie. Romulus beſides, did purifie the cities with certaine ſacrifices that he deuiſed, which they keepe ſtill at this daye, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceaſed, the Camerines came to aſſaulte the Romaines, & had ouercomen all the countrie, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtand them, bicauſe they had bene ſo ſore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithſtāding, Romulus ſet vp on them with his army, & wanne the field of them, in which conflict there were ſlaine about ſixe thouſand men. After the battell done, he tooke their cittie, & conueyed to Rome the one half of the inhabitans that remained. After this, he ſent twiſe as many Romaines as there were naturall Cameriās left at Camerine, to dwell there among them. This was done the firſt daye of Auguſt: ſo great was the multitude of the inhabitāts of Rome that had increaſed in ſixteene yeres from the firſt foundation of the cittie. Emong other ſpoyles he got there, he caried away a charret of braſſe with foure horſes, which he cauſed to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne ſtatue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triūphant. His power being growen thus great, his weake neighbours did ſubmit themſelues vnto him, being contented to liue in peace by him. His ſtronger neighbours were affrayed of him, and enuied much his greatnes, and dyd take it no good policie to ſuffer him thus to riſe in the face of the world, and thought it meete ſpedilie to dawnte his glorie, and clippe his winges. The firſt of the Thuſcans that bent their power againſt him, were the Veians, who had a great countrie, & dwelled in a ſtronge and mightie cittie. To picke

A a quarrell to him, they ſent to haue redeliuered to thē the cittie of FIDENA, which they ſayed belōged vnto them. This was thought not only vnreaſonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, cōſidering that all the while the FIDENATES were in warre, & daunger, the THVSCANS neuer came to their ayde, but had ſuffered them to be ſlayne, and then came to demaunde their lands and tenements, when other had poſſeſſion of them. Therefore Romulus hauing geuen them an aunſwer full of mockerie, and deriſion, they diuided their power into two armies, and ſent the one againſt them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went againſt the cittie of FIDENA, preuayled, and killed there two thouſand ROMAINES: the other was ouerthrowen and diſcomfited by Romulus, in which there dyed eight thouſand VEIANS. Afterwards, they met againe ſomewhat neere the cittie of the FIDENATES, where

B they fought a battell: and all dyd confeſſe, the chiefeſt exployte was done by Romulus owne hands that daye, who ſhewed all the skill and valliantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy captaine. It ſeemed that daye, he farre exceeded the cōmon ſorte of men, in ſtrength of bodye & feates of armes. Neuertheles that which ſome ſaye, is hardely to be credited: & to be plaine, is out of all compaſſe of beliefe and poſſibilitie. For they write, there were fourteene thouſand men ſlayne at that battell, & that more then halfe of them were ſlayne by Romulus own hands: & the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and oſtentation which the MESSENIANS reporte of Ariſtomenes, who offered in ſacrifice to the goddes three hundred beaſtes of victorie, as for ſo many LACEDÆMONIANS him ſelf had ſlayne in the battell. Their armie being thus broken, Romulus ſuffered them to flye who by ſwiftnes could ſaue themſelues, and

C marched with all his power in good arraye towards their cittie. The cittizens then conſidering their late great loſſe and ouerthrowe, would not hazard the daunger of withſtanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition & ſute for peace. All was graunted them for a hundred yeres, ſaue they ſhould forgoe their territorie called Septemagium, that was the ſeuenth parte of their countrye: & yeld to the ROMAINES all their ſalt houſes by the riuers ſide, and deliuer fiftie of their chiefeſt cittizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie and triumphe into ROME for them, the daye of the Ides of October, which is the fiftenth daye of the ſame moneth, leading in his triumphe many priſoners taken in thoſe warres: & among other, the generall of the VEIANS, a very auncient man who fondly behaued him ſelfe in his charge, and ſhewed by his doings, that his experience was farre ſhorte for his yeres in the warres. And

D from thence it commeth, when they offer to the goddes to geue thanckes for this victorie, that euen at this daye, they bring to the capitoll throughe the market place an old man apparelled in a purple robe, & with a Iuell called Bulla about his necke, which the gentlemens young children weare about their neckes: & a heraulde goeth harde by him, crying, who buyeth who, the SARDIANIANS, bicauſe they holde opinion the THVSCANS are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very cittie of VEIES ſtandeth in the countrie of THVSCANE. This was the laſte warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wonte to happen almoſt to all thoſe, who by ſodaine proſperitie, and fortunes ſpeciall fauour, are raiſed to highe and great eſtate. For truſting to proſperitie and good ſucceſſe of his actes, he beganne to

E growe more ſtraunge and ſtately, and to carie a ſowerer countenaunce then he was wonte to doe before: leauing to be after his olde manner, a curteous and gracious prince, and gaue him ſelfe in facions to be ſomwhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and ſtately porte and maieſtie that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vpon that, a longe robe of purple culler: and gaue audience, ſitting in a wyde chayer of eſtate, hauing euer about him young men called Celeres, as we would ſaye, flights for their ſwiftnes & ſpeede in executing of his commaundements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were ripſhaues in their hands, to make the people geue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to binde fall ſtreight, all the prince ſhould commaunde. Nowe in olde time the Latines layed, Ligare was to binde: but at this preſent they ſaye Alligare, from whence it commeth that the vshers and ſergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thincks it were more likely to ſaye, they had put to a.c.

F & that before they were called Litores, without a.c. For they be the very ſame which the GRAECIANS call Liturgos, and be in Engliſhe, miniſters or officers: and at this daye, Leitos, or Leos, in the GREKE tongue ſignifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was deid at the cittie of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to winne the fauour of A the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Comon weale, and euery yere dyd chuſe a newe magiſtrate to miniſter iuſtice to the SABYNES. This preſident taught the noble men of ROME, to ſeeke and deſire to haue a free eſtate, where no ſubiect ſhould be at the commaundement of a King alone, and where euery man ſhould commaund & obey as ſhould be his courſe. Thoſe which were called Patricians in ROME, dyd medle with nothing, but had onely an honorable name and robe, and were called to counſaill rather for a facion, then to haue their aduiſe or counſaile. For when they were aſſembled together, they dyd onely heare the Kings pleaſure and commaundement, but they might not ſpeake one word, and ſo departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the Cõmon wealthe, ſauing they were the firſt that dyd knowe what was done. All other things thereby dyd greue them leſſe. But when of his owne mere authoritie, & B as it were of him ſelf, he would as pleaſed him, beſtowe the conquered lands of his enemies to his ſouldiers, and reſtore againe to the VEIANS their hoſtages as he dyd: therein plainely appeared, how great iniurie he dyd to the Senate. Whereupon the Senatours were ſuſpected afterwards that they killed him, when with in fewe dayes after it was ſayed, he vaniſhed awaye ſo ſtraungely, that no man euer knewe what became of him. This was on the ſeuenth daye of the moneth nowe called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no manner of certaintie els of his deathe that is knowen, ſaue only of the daye and the time when he vaniſhed, as we haue ſayed before. For on that daye, the ROMAINES doe at this preſent many things, in remembrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his deathe was not knowen: ſeeing Scipio Africanus was founde after ſupper dead in his houſe, C and no man could tell, nor yet dyd know how he dyed. For ſome ſaye that he fainted, and dyed ſodainely being of weake complexion. Other ſaye he poyſoned him ſelf: other thincke his enemies dyd get ſecretly in the night into his houſe, & ſmoothred him in his bed. Yet they founde his body layed on the ground, that euery body might at leyſure conſider, if they could finde or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vaniſhed away ſodainely, there was neither ſeene pece of his garments, nor yet was there found any parte of his body. Therfore ſome haue thought that the whole Senatours fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peces, euery one caried awaye a pece of him, folded cloſe in the skyrte of his robe. Other thincke alſo, this vaniſhing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the preſence of the Senatours only: but they ſaye that Romulus was at that time without the D cittie, neere the place called the goates marſhe, where he made an oration to the people, and that ſodainely the weather chaunged, and ouercaſt ſo terribly, as it is not to be tolde nor credited. For firſt, the ſunne was darckned as if it had bene very night: this darcknes was not in a calme or ſtill, but there fell horrible thunders, boyſterous windes, and flaſhing lightnings on euery ſide, which made the people ronne awaye, and ſcatter here and there, but the Senatours kept ſtill cloſe together. Afterwardes when the lightning was paſt and gone, the daye cleared vp, & the element waxed fayer as before. Then the people gathered together againe, & ſought for the King: asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not ſuffer them to enquire any further after him, but counſelled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in ſteade of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull E & gratious god. The meaner ſorte of people (for the moſt parte of them) tooke it well, & were very glad to heare thereof: & went their waye worſhipping Romulus in their hartes, with good hope they ſhould proſper by him. Howbeit ſome ſeeking out the trothe more egerly did cõber ſore, and troubled the Patricians: accuſing them, that they abuſed the common people with vaine & fonde perſuaſions, whileſt them ſelues in the meane time had murdered the King with their owne hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, ſome ſaye there was one Iulius Proculus, the nobleſt of all the Patricians, being eſteemed for a maruelous honeſt man, & known to haue bene very familier with Romulus, & came with him from the cittie of ALBA: that ſtep-ped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greateſt and holyeſt othes a man might ſweare) that he had met Romulus on the waye, farre greater and fayerer, then he had ſeene him F euer before, and armed all in white armour, ſhyning bright like fire: whereat being affrayed in that ſorte to ſee him, he asked him yet: O King, why haſt thou thus left and forſaken vs, that are Iulius Proculus met with Romulus after his vaniſhing.

A so falsely accused and charged to our vter discredit and shame, by thy vanishing. To whom Romulus gaue this aunswer. Proculus, it hathe pleased the goddes from whom I came, that I should remaine amongest men so long as I dyd: and nowe hauing built a cittie, which in glorie and greatnes of empire shalbe the chiefest of the worlde, that I should returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therefore be of good comforte, & tell the ROMAINES, that they exercising prowesse and temperance, shalbe the mightiest and greatest people of the worlde. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These wordes seemed credible to the ROMAINES, aswell for the honesty of the man that spake them, as for the solemne othes he made before them all. Yet I wote not how, some celestiall motion, or diuine inspiration helped it much: for no man sayed a word

B against it. And so all suspition and accusation layed aside, euery man began to call vpon Quirinus, to praye vnto him, and to worshippe him. Truely this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Aristeas the proconnesian, & of Cleomedes the Astypalæian. For they saye, that Aristeas dyed in a fullers worke house, & his friends comming to carie awaye his bodye, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: & at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his waye towards the cittie of CROTONA. It is sayed also that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally strong and great, and therewithall madde, and furious hastie. For after many desperate partes he had played, he came at the last on a daye into a schoole house full of litle children, the roofe wherof was borne with one piller, which he dyd hit with so terrible a blowe of his fiste, that he brake Aristeas a Proconnesian taken out of mans sight after he was dead.

C it in the middest, so as the whole roofe fell and dashed the poore children in peces. The people ranne straight after him to take him. But he threwe him selfe forthwith into a chest, and pulled the lyd vpon him. He held it so fast downe, that many striuing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to styrre it. Whereupon they brake the chest all in peces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were marueilously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the propheteesse aunswered them in this verse:

Cleomedes Astypaleis vanished straungely out of mens sights, being fast locked in a chest.

Cleomedes the last of the demy goddes.

The reporte goeth also that Alcmenes corse dyd vanishe awaye, as they caried it to buriall, and howe in steade thereof they founde a stone layed in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other suche wonders, that are farre from any apparance of trothe: only bicause they would Alcmenes bodye vanished out of the beere.

D make men to be as goddes, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and denie diuine power, it were a lewde and wicked parte: euen so to compare earthe and heauen together, it were a mere follie. Therefore we must let suche fables goe, being most certaine that as Pindarus sayeth it is true,

The soule eternall.

Eche liuing corps, must yelde at last to deathe, and euery life must leese his vitall breathe:
The soule of man, that onely liues on hie, and is an image of eternitie.

For from heauen it came, and thither againe it dothe returne, not with the bodye, but then sooneste, when the sowle is furtheste of and separated from the bodye, and that she is kept holy,

E & is no more defiled with the flesh. It is that the philosopher Heraclitus ment, when he sayed. The drye light, is the best soule which flyeth out of the bodye, as lightning dothe out of the clowde: but that which is ioyned with the bodye being full of corporall passions, is a grosse vapour, darke and massie, & cannot flame, ryse or shoote out like lightning. We must not beleeue therefore, that the bodyes of noble and vertuous men, doe goe vp together with their soules into heauen, against the order of nature. But this we are certainely to beleeue, that by the vertues of their soules (according to diuine nature and iustice) they doe of men become saincts, and of saincts halfe goddes, and of halfe goddes, entier and perfect goddes: after that they are perfectly (as it were by sacrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine & mortalitie, & not by any ciuill ordinance, but in trothe & reason, they receaue call the poynte of a ſpeare, on the darte it ſelf, Quiris: by reaſon whereof the image of Iuno ſurnamed Quiritides, was ſet vp with an iron ſpeare, and the ſpeare which was conſecrated in the Kings pallace, was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vſe amongeſt men, to honour them with a ſpeare or darte, which haue ſhewed them ſelues valiant in the warres: and that for this cauſe Romulus was ſurnamed Quirinus, as who would ſaye, god of the ſpeares and warres. There was ſince buylt a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and ſo named of him. The daye whereon he vaniſhed, is called the flying of the people, or otherwiſe the Nones of the goates. For on that daye, they goe out of the cittie to doe ſacrifice in the place called the Fennie, or the goates marſhe: and the ROMAINES call a goate, Capra. As they goe thus together, they call with lowde ſhowtes and cryes vpon diuers Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gaius, in token of the flying that was then: and that they called one another backe againe, as they ranne awaye in great feare and diſorder. Howbeit other ſaye, that it is not done to ſhewe the ronning awaye, but to ſhewe their ſpede and diligence, and referre it to the ſtorie. Nowe after the GAVLES that had taken ROME were expulſed by Camillus, the cittie was ſo weakned, that they could ſcante recouer their force and ſtrength againe: wherfore many of the LATINES ioyning together, went with a great mightie armie, vnder the conducte of Liuius Poſthumius, to warre againſt the ROMAINES. This Poſthumius brought his campe as neere the cittie of ROME as he could, & ſent to the ROMAINES by a trumpet to let them vnderſtand, how the LATINES were deſirous by newe mariages, to reſtore their olde auncient amitie and kinred that was neere hand decayed betweene them: and therefore if the ROMAINES would ſend them a conuenient number of their daughters and young widowes to marie with them, they ſhould haue peace, as they had before time with the SABYNES, vpon the like occaſion. The ROMAINES hereat were ſore troubled, thincking that to deliuer their women in ſuch ſorte was no better, then to yelde and ſubmit them ſelues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a wayting mayde called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue them counſell to doe neither the one nor the other, but to vſe a pollicy with them, by meanes whereof they ſhould ſcape the daunger of the warres, and ſhould alſo not be tyed nor bounde by any pledges. The deuiſe was, they ſhould ſend to the LATINES her ſelfe, and a certaine number of their fayreſt bonde maydes, trimmed vp like gentlewomen and the beſt cittizens daughters, and that in the night ſhe would lifte them vp a burning torche in the ayer, at which ſigne they ſhould come armed, and ſet vpon their enemies as they laye a ſleepe. This was brought to paſſe: and the LATINES thought verely they had bene the ROMAINES daughters. Philotis fayled not in the night to lyft vp her ſigne, and to ſhewe them a burning torche in the toppe of a wilde figge tree: and dyd hange certaine couerlets and clothes behinde it, that the enemies might not ſee the light, and the ROMAINES contrariwiſe might decerne it the better. Thereupon ſo ſone as the ROMAINES ſawe it, they ranne with all ſpede, calling one another by their names, and iſſued out of the gates of the cittie with great haſte: and ſo tooke their enemies vpon a ſodaine, and ſlewe them. In memorie of which victorie, they doe yet ſolemniſe the feaſte called the Nones of the goates, bicauſe of the wilde figge tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they doe feaſt the women without the cittie, vnder ſhadowes made of the boughe of figge trees. The wayting maydes, they ronne vp and downe, and playe here and there together. Afterwards they ſeeme to fight, and throwe ſtones one at another, as then they dyd when they holpe the ROMAINES in their fight. But fewe writers doe auowe this tale, bicauſe it is on the daye time that they call ſo eche other by their names, and that they goe to the place which they call the goates marſhe, as vnto a ſacrifice. It ſeemeth this agreeth better with the firſt hiſtorie when they called one another by their names in the night, going againſt the LATINES: onles peraduenture theſe two thinges after many yeres happened vpon one daye.

THE COMPARISON OF Theseus with Romulus.

A THVS haue we declared all things of Theseus and Romulus worthy memorie. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth first that Theseus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulsion of any (when he might with safety haue reigned in the cittie of TROEZEN, and succeeded his grandfather in no small kingdome) dyd desire of him selfe, and rather sought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Romulus on the other side, to deliuer him self from bondage and seruitude that laye sore vpon him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still dyd hange ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato sayeth) to shewe him selfe hardie for feare: who seeing howe extremely he was like to be handled, B was of very force constrained to seeke aduenture, and hazarde the enterprise of atteining highe and great things. Moreouer the chiefest acte that euer he dyd was, when he slewe one onely tyranne of the cittie of ALBA called Amulius: where Theseus in his iorney only, as he trauelled, gaue his minde to greater enterprises, and slewe Sciron, Sinnis, Procrustes, and Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the worlde, he deliuered GREECE of all those cruell tyrannes, before any of those knewe him whom he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by sea, and neuer needed to haue trauelled, or put him selfe in daunger with these robbers, considering he neuer receyued hurte by any of them: where as Romulus could not be in safetie whilest Amulius liued. Hereupon it maye be alledged, that Theseus vnprouoked by any priuate wronge or hurte receyued, dyd set vpon these detestable C theues and robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwise, so longe as the tyranne dyd them no harme, dyd suffer him to oppresse and wronge all other. And if they alledge these were noble dedes, and worthy memorie: that Romulus was hurte fighting against the SABYNES, and that he slewe king Acron with his owne handes, and that he had ouercome and subdued many of his enemies. Then for Theseus on thother side may be obiected, the battell of the CENTAVRI, the warres of the AMAZONES, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: and howe he ventered to goe him selfe thither with the other young boyes and wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering him selfe to be deuowred by a cruell beaste, or els to be slayne and sacrificed vpon the tumbe of Androgeus, or to become bondslaue & tyed in captiuitie to the vile seruice of cruell men and enemies, if by his corage and manhodde he could not deliuer him self. This was such D an acte of magnanimitie, iustice & glorie, & briefly of so great vertue, that it is vnpossible truely to be set out. Surely me thinckes the philosophers dyd not ill define loue, when they sayd she was a seruitour of the goddes, to saue younge folkes, whom they thought meete to be preserued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of some god, and a meane purposely prepared for Theseus safety. Therefore the woman is not to be reproached nor blamed for the loue ſhe bare Theſeus, but rather it is muche to be wondred at, that euery man and woman in like wiſe dyd not loue him. And if of her ſelfe ſhe fell in loue with him, I ſaye (and not without cauſe) ſhe afterwards deſerued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her owne nature loued valiantnes and honour, and entertained men of ſinguler value. But both Theſeus and Romulus being naturally geuen to rule and raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a King, but bothe of them dyd degenerate alike: the one chaunging him ſelf into a popular man, the other to a very tyranne. So that by ſundrie humours, they both fell into one miſchief and errour. For a prince aboue all things muſt keepe his eſtate: which is no leſſe preſerued by doing nothing vncomely, as by doing all things honorably. But he that is more ſeuere or remiſſe then he ſhould be, remaineth now no more a King or a prince, but becommeth a people pleaſer, or a cruell tyrante: and ſo cauſeth his ſubiects to deſpiſe or hate him. Yet me thinckes the one is an errour of to muche pittie and baſenes: and the other of to muche pryde and crueltie. But if we maye not charge fortune with all miſchaunces happening vnto men, but that we ought to conſider in them the diuerſities of manners and paſſions, ſeeing anger is vnreaſonable, and wrathe raſhe and paſſionate: then can we not clere the one, nor excuſe the other of extreme rage and paſſion, in the facte committed by the one againſt his brother, and by the other againſt his naturall ſonne. Howbeit the occaſion and beginning of anger doth muche excuſe Theſeus, who moued with the greateſt cauſe that might be, was put into ſuche choller and paſſion. But if Romulus variaunce with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counſell, or cauſe of the common weales: there is none ſo ſimple to thincke, that his wiſdome would ſo ſodainely haue ſet vpon him. Where as Theſeus in contrarie manner killed his ſonne, prouoked by thoſe paſſions that fewe men can auoyde: to wit, loue, ielouſie, and falſe reporte of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, whereof the iſſue fell out very lamentable: Theſeus anger ſtretched no further, then to roughe wordes, and olde folkes curſes in their heate. For it ſeemeth, curſed fortune, and nought els, was the cauſe of his ſonnes only miſhappe, as foreſpoken and wiſhed for ſomewhat by his father. Theſe be the ſpeciall things maye be alledged for Theſeus. But for Romulus this was a noble thing in him. Firſt his beginning being very lowe and meane, and his brother and he taken for bonde men, and the children of hoggeheards, before they were them ſelues all free, they ſet at libertie in manner all the LATINES, winning at one inſtant many titles of glorie and honour: as diſtroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of newe cities, and no ouerthrowers of the olde, where as Theſeus of many habitations and houſes made onely one, and dyd ouerthrowe and plucke downe diuers ſtates, bearing the names of auncient Kings, princes, and halfe goddes of ATTICA. All theſe alſo dyd Romulus afterwards, and compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to diſtroye their owne houſes, and to come and dwell with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer chaunged nor increaſed any cittie that was buylt before, but buylt him ſelfe a newe cittie out of the grounde, getting all together, land, countrie, kingdome, kinred and mariages, without loſing or killing any man: and to the contrarie, rather he dyd good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrie, lands, nor houſes, and deſired nothing els but to make a people amongeſt them, and to become cittizens of ſome cittie. Alſo Romulus bent not him ſelfe to follow theeues and robbers, but ſubdued by force of armes many mightie and puiſſant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer Kings and Princes which he had vanquiſhed in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainely knowen of whoſe hands he dyed. The moſt parte of authors doe charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparant death, and reſtored his grandfather to the royall throne of Æneas, who before was depoſed and brought from a King to ſeruill obedience, without any regarde of honour or dignitie: to whom he dyd many moe great pleaſures and ſeruices. Beſides he neuer offended him willingly, no not ſo muche as ignorantly. Contrarylie I thincke of Theſeus, who fayling by negligence to put out his white ſayle at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, howe eloquent an oration ſoeuer could be made for his excuſe: yea though it were before the moſt fauorable iudges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceyuing that it was an harde thing to excuſe and defend ſo fowle a faulte, dothe fayne that the good olde man Ægeus hauing

By what meanes men are prouoked to great enterprises.

Loue the ministter of the goddes.

A hauing newes brought him that his ſonnes ſhippe was at hand, dyd ronne in ſo great haſte to his caſtell, to ſee his ſonne arriue a farre of, that as he ranne, his foote hit againſt ſome thing, and ouerthrewe him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man ſeeing him ronne ſo haſtely to the ſea ſide, dyd make haſte to attende and wayte vpon him. Furthermore, Theſeus faults touching women and rauiſhements, of the twaine, had the leſſe ſhadowe and culler of honeſtie. Bicauſe Theſeus dyd attempt it very often: for he ſtale awaye Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the Troezenian. Againe being ſtepped in yeres, and at later age, and paſt mariage: he ſtale awaye Helen in her minoritie, being nothing neere to conſent to marye. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONES (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birthe and B linadge of his owne countrie which were at ATHENS, and deſcended of the noble race and progenie of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) dyd geue men occaſion to ſuſpect that his womanniſhenes was rather to ſatisfie luſt, then of any great loue. Romulus nowe in a contrarie manner, when his people had taken eight hundred, or thereabouts, of the Sabyne women to rauiſhe them: kept but onely one for him ſelfe that was called Herſilia, as they ſaye, and deliuered the reſte to his beſt and moſt honeſt cittizens. Afterwardes by the honour, loue, and good entertainment that he cauſed them to haue & receyue of their husbands, he chaunged this violent force of rauiſhement, into a moſt perfect bonde and league of amitie: which dyd ſo knyt and ioyne in one theſe two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall loue which grewe afterwards betwext thoſe two people, and conſequently of the ioyning of their powers C together. Furthermore, time hath geuen a good teſtimonie of the loue, reuerence, conſtancie, kyndenes, and all matrimoniall offices that he eſtabliſhed by that meanes, betwext man and wife. For in two hundred and thirtie yeres afterwards, there was neuer man that durſt forſake or put awaye his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the beſt learned men, and moſt curious obſeruers of antiquities doe knowe his name, that was the firſt murderer of his father or mother: euen ſo all the ROMAINES knewe what he was, which firſt durſt put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Caruilius, bicauſe his wife was barren and had no children. The effects alſo doe agree with the teſtimonie of the time. For the Realme was common vnto Kings of both nations, and through the alliance of theſe mariages that beganne firſt of rauiſhements, both nations liued peaciblie, and in equalitie, vnder one ciuill po- D licie, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariewiſe, by Theſeus mariages, dyd get neither loue nor kynred of any one perſone, but rather they procured warres, enmities, & the ſlaughter of their cittizens, with the loſſe in the ende of the cittie of APHIDNES: and yet very hardely, and by the mercie of their enemies (whom they honored as godds) they eſcaped for him, the daunger which the TROIANS ſuffered afterwards, for the ſelf acte done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the laſt, that his mother was not only in daunger, but euen feelingly ſuffered like miſerie and captiuitie, which Hecuba dyd afterwards, when ſhe was forſaken of her ſonne: onles peraduenture thoſe things that they write of the impriſonment and captiuitie of Æthra, be founde falſe, and but fables, as for the fame and memorie of Theſeus were behouefull, that both it, and many other things alſo, were of no more trothe nor E likelyhood. That which they write of Romulus diuinements, maketh great difference betwene him and Theſeus. For Romulus in his birthe was preſerued by the marueluous fauour of the goddes: Theſeus to the contrarie, was begotten againſt the goddes will, as appeared plainely by the aunſwer of the oracle to Ægeus, that he ſhould not medle with any woman in ſtraunge and foraine countrie.

A MAN can not ſpeake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he ſhall finde great contrarietie of him amongeſt the hiſtoriographers. For, of his parentage & trauaill out of his countrie, of his deathe and making of lawes, of his forme and gouernment, and order of executing the ſame, they haue written diuerſely. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worſt about the time he liued in. For ſome of them (and Ariſtotle is of that number) will needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he dyd helpe him to ſtabliſh the ordinaunce that all warres ſhould ceaſe during the feaſt of the games olympicall: for a teſtimonie whereof, they alledge the copper coyte which was vſed to be throwen in thoſe games, and had founde grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the ſucceſſion of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratoſthenes, and Apollodorus) ſaye he was many yeres before the firſt Olympiades. Timæus alſo thincketh there were two of this name, and in diuers times: howbeit the one hauing more eſtimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glorie of both their doings. Some ſaye the eldeſt of the twaine, was not longe after Homer: and ſome write they ſawe him. Xenophon ſheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: ſaying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neereſt of bloude by deſcent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon ment not thoſe Heraclides, which deſcended from Hercules ſelf: for the laſt kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progenie, aſwell as the firſt. Therefore he meaneth thoſe Heraclides, which doubtles were the firſt and neareſt before Hercules time. Neuertheles though the hiſtoriographers haue written diuerſely of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we finde written of him in auncient hiſtories, and is leaſt to be denied, and by beſt teſtimonies moſt to be prooued. And firſt of all, the poet Simonides ſayeth, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the moſt parte doe write the pettigree otherwiſe, aſwell of Lycurgus ſelf, as of Eunomus. For they ſaye, that Patrocles the ſonne of Ariſtodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his firſt wife, and Lycurgus of the ſecond wife, called Dianaſſa: yet Euthychidas an other writer, maketh Lycurgus the ſixte of deſcent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his auncеſters, the nobleſt was Sous, in whoſe time the cittie of SPARTA ſubdued the Ilotes,

A Ilotes, and made them ſlaues, and dyd enlarge and increaſe their dominion, with the lands and poſſeſſions they had got by conqueſt of the Arcadians. And it is ſayed that Sous him ſelf being on a time ſtraightly beſieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard drye grounde, where no water could be founde: offered them thereupon to reſtore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his companie dyd drincke of a fountaine that was there not farre of. The CLITORIANS dyd graunte vnto it, and peace alſo was ſworne betweene them. Then he called all his ſouldiers before him, and tolde them if there were any one amongeſt them that would refrayne from drincking, he would reſigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his companie that could (or would) forbeare to drincke, they were ſo ſore a thirſt. So they all drancke hartely except him ſelf, who being the laſt that came downe, dyd no more but A ſubtill promiſe.

B a litle moyſte his mowthe without, and ſo refreſhed him ſelf, the enemies ſelues ſtanding by, and drancke not a droppe. By reaſon whereof, he refuſed afterwards to reſtore their lands he had promiſed, alledging they had not all droncke. But that notwithſtanding, he was greately eſteemed for his actes, and yet his houſe was not named after his owne name: but after his ſonnes name Eurytion, they of his houſe were called Eurytionides. The reaſon was, bicauſe his ſonne Eurytion to pleaſe the people, dyd firſt let fall and geue ouer, the ſole and abſolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwardes marueilous diſorder and diſſolution, which continued a great time in the cittie of SPARTA. For the people finding them ſelues at libertie, became very bolde and diſobedient: and ſome of the Kinges that ſucceeded, were hated euen to deathe, bicauſe they woulde perforce vſe their auncient authoritie

C ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and goodwilles of the people, or bicauſe they ſawe they were not ſtronge enough to rule them, dyd geue them ſelues to diſſemble. And this dyd ſo muche increaſe the peoples loſe and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus owne father being Kinge, was ſlayne among them. For one daye, as he was parting a fraye betweene two that were fighting, he had ſuche a wounde with a kytchin knyfe, that he dyed: and left his Realme to his eldeſt ſonne Polydectes, who dyed alſo ſone after, and without heyre of his bodye as was ſuppoſed. In ſo muche as euery man thought Lycurgus ſhould be Kinge: and ſo he tooke it vpon him, vntill it was vnderſtoode that his brothers wife was younge with childe. Which thing ſo ſoone as he perceyued, he publiſhed openly, that the Realme belonged to the childe that ſhould be borne, if it were a ſonne. After this he gouerned the Realme,

D but as the Kings lieutenante and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the regents of their Kinges that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus brothers widowe dyd ſend, and let him ſecretly vnderſtande, that if he would promiſe to marye her when he ſhould be King, that ſhe would come before her time, and either miſcarye, or deſtroye that ſhe went with. Lycurgus deteſtably abhorring this brutiſhe and ſauage vnnaturallnes of the woman, dyd not reiect her offer made him, but ſeemed rather to be very glad, then to diſlike of it. Neuertheles he ſent her worde againe, ſhe ſhould not neede to trye maſteryes, with drinckes and medicines to make her come before her time: for ſo doing, ſhe might bring her ſelfe in daunger, and be caſt awaye for euer. Howbeit he aduiſed her to goe her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he would finde meanes enough to make awaye the childe that Prodicos, Regents, or protectours of yong Kings in minoritie.

E ſhould be borne. And ſo with ſuche perſuaſions he drewe on this woman to her full time of deliuerie. But ſo ſoone as he perceyued ſhe was neere her time, he ſent certaine to keepe her, and to be preſent at her laboure, commaunding them that if ſhe were brought a bed of a daughter, they ſhould leaue her with the woman: and if it were a ſonne, they ſhould forthwith bring it to him, in what place ſoeuer he was, and what buſines ſoeuer he had in hand. It chaunced that ſhe came euen about ſupper time, and was deliuered of a ſonne. As he was ſitting at the table with the other magiſtrates of the cittie, his ſeruants entred the halle, and preſented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes, and ſayed openly to them that were preſent: beholde my lordes of SPARTA, here is a Kinge borne vnto vs. And ſpeaking theſe wordes, he layed him downe in the Kinges place, and na-

F med him Charilaus, as muche to ſaye, as the ioye of the people. Thus he ſawe all the lookers on reioycing muche, and might heare them prayſe and extoll his ſynceritie, iuſtice, and vertue. By this meanes he raigned only as King, but eight moneths. From thenceforth Charilaus, king of the Lacedæmonians, Herod. lib. 1. Dionyſius Halic. lib. 2.

he was taken and esteemed so iust and syncere a man among the cittizens, that there were moe A that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the Kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithstãding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder & disgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kinred of the Kings mother: whose power and honour were thought much impayred by Lycurgus authoritie. In so much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a daye, dyd not sticke to say to his face. I knowe for a certaintie one of these dayes thou wilt be King: meaning thereby to bring him in suspition with the cittizens. Which thing though Lycurgus neuer ment, yet of a subtill and craftie wit Leonidas thought by geuing out such words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lycurgus had secretly made him awaye. The Kings mother also gaue out such B like speaches, which in the end dyd so trouble him, with the feare he had, what euẽt might fall out thereof: that he determined to departe his countrie, and by his absence to auoyde the sus-Lycurgus trauelled countryes. pition that therein might growe vpon him any waye. So he trauelled abroade in the worlde as a straunger, vntill his nephew had begotten a sonne who was to succeede him in his kingdome.
He hauing with this determination taken his iorney, went first of all into CRETA, where he diligently obserued and considered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernment of their Cõmon weale, and euer kept company with the best, and euer was conferring with the most learned. There he founde very good lawes in his iudgement, which he noted of purpose to carie home to his countrie, to serue when time should come. He founde there other lawes also, but of them he made no reckoning. Nowe there was one man that aboue the rest was re- C puted wise and skilfull in matters of state & gouernment, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus dyd so much by intreatie, and for familier friendshippe, that he persuaded him to goe Thales a poet hærper. with him vnto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he sange all that the best and sufficientest gouernours of the worlde could deuise. For all his songes were goodly ditties, wherein he dyd exhorte and persuade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace & concorde one with the other. His words were set out with such tunes, countenance, & accents, that were so full of swetenes, harmony, and pearsing: that inwardly it melted mens heartes, and drue the hearers of a loue to like the most honest things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, sedition, and diuision, which at that time reigned sore amõg them. So as it maye be sayed, he it was that prepared the waye for Lycurgus, D whereby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto reason. At his de-Lycurgus iorney into Asia. parting out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent (as it is sayed) to compare the mãner of life and pollicie of those of CRETA (being then very straight and seuere) with the superfluities and vanities of IONIA: and thereupon to consider the difference betwene their two manners & gouernments, as the physitian doth, who to knowe the hole & healthfull the better, doth vse to compare them with the sicke & diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first sawe Ho- mers works, in the hands of the heires & successours of Cleophylus: & finding in the same, aswell many rules of pollicie, as the great pleasure of Poets faining, he diligently coppied it out, and made a volume thereof to carie into GRECE. It is true there was much fame abroad of Homers saye, that he was in their countrie also, & that hauing founde there one notable ordinaunce among other, that their souldiers aad men of warre were separated from the rest of the people, he brought the practise of it into SPARTA: where setting the marchants, artificers, & labourers euery one a parte by them selues, he did establish a noble Cõmon wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN historiographers, and some others also of GRECE doe write. He was also in AFRICKE, and in SPAYNE, & as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wise men there, that were called the philosophers of INDIA. I knowe no man that hathe written it, sauing Aristocrates, that was Hip- parchus sonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and sent F diuers and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maiestie of a prince, whereby they dyd excell the common people.

A people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to cõmaund, and to geue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to drawe men willingly to obeye him. Moreouer the Kings them ſelues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, bicauſe they hoped that his preſence would ſomwhat brydle, & reſtrayne the people from their inſolencie & diſobediẽce towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no ſooner arriued, but he beganne to deuiſe howe to alter the whole gouernment of the common weale, & throughout to chaunge the whole courſe and order of the ſtate: thincking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpoſe, but much like, as one ſhould geue ſome eaſie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowen bodye with all humours and diſſeaſes. Therefore he thought firſt that all groſſe & ſu-

Lycurgus returneth and chaungeth all the cõmon wealth.

B & perfluous humours, were meete to be diſſolued & purged, and then afterwardes to geue them a new forme and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with him ſelf, before he would take in hãd to doe any thing, he went to the citty of DELPHES: where after he had ſacrificed to Apollo, he cõſulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: ô beloued of the goddes, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to eſtabliſhe good lawes in his countrie, it was aunſwered him: that Apollo graunted his petition, and that he ſhould ordaine the beſt and perfecteſt manner of a Common wealth, that euer had or ſhould be in the worlde. This aunſwer dyd comforte him very much, & ſo he beganne to breake his purpoſe to certen of the chief of the cittie, & ſecretly to praye & exhorte them to helpe him, going firſt to thoſe he knew to be his friends, & after Lycurgus counſelleth with the oracle of Apollo at Delphes.

C by litle & litle he wanne others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterpriſe. So when he ſaw the time fit for the matter, he cauſed thirtie of the chiefeſt men of the cittie in a morning to come into the market place well appointed & furniſhed, to ſuppreſſe thoſe that would attẽpt to hinder their purpoſe. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer rehearſeth twentie of the chiefeſt: but he that aboue all others dyd moſt aſſiſt him in his doings, & was the greateſt ayde vnto the ſtabliſhing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The king Charilaus hearing of this aſſembly, dyd feare there had bene ſome conſpiracie or inſurrection againſt his perſon, & for his ſafety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceæcos, as much to ſaye, as Iunos braſen tẽple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the trothe, he waxed bolde, & came out of the temple againe, & he him

Chalceæcos, Iunos braſen temple.

D ſelf fauored the enterpriſe, being a prince of a noble minde, howbeit very ſoft by nature, as witneſſeth Archelaus (that was then the other king of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus aunſwered one that praiſed him to his face, in ſaying he was a good man. And how ſhould I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be euill to the euill? In this chaũge of the ſtate, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefeſt alteration was, his lawe of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regall power & equall authoritie with the Kings in matters of weight & importance, & was (as Plato ſayeth) to be the healthfull counterpeaſe of the whole bodye of the Cõmon weale. The other ſtate before was euer wauering, ſomtime inclining to tyrãnie, when the Kings were to mightie, & ſomtime to cõfuſion, when the people would vſurpe authoritie. Lycurgus therefore placed betweene the Kings & the people, a counſaill of Senatours, which was as a ſtronge beame, that helde bothe theſe extreames in an euen ballance, & gaue ſure footing

For the eight & twenty Senatours (which made the whole bodye of the Senate) tooke ſomtime the Kings parte, when it was neadfull to pull downe the furie of the people: and contrarilie, they held ſometimes with the people againſt the Kings, to bridle their tyrannicall gouernment. Ariſtotle ſayeth, he ordeined the number of Senatours to be but eight and twenty, bicauſe two of thirtie that ioyned with him as a fore, dyd for feare forſake him at his enterpriſe. Howbeit Spherus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purpoſed to haue more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhappes he had great regard to make it a perfect number, conſidering it is compounded of the number of ſeuen, multiplied by foure: and is the firſt perfect number next to ſixe, being equall to all partes gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he choſe this num-

28. were the number of the Senatours.

F ber rather then any other, bicauſe he ment the whole bodye of the counſaill ſhould be but thirtie perſones, adding to that number, the two Kinges. Lycurgus tooke ſo great care to eſtabliſhe well this counſell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apollaes temple in Retra of Lycurgus.

DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this daye Retra, as who would saye, the ſtatute oracle whereof the aunſwer was. When thou haſt built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou ſhalt ſtabliſhe a Senate of thirtie counſellers, with the two Kings: & ſhalt aſſemble the people at times conuenient, in the place betweene the bridge and the riuer Gnacion. There the Senatours ſhall propound all matters, and breake vp after their aſſemblies: and it ſhall not be lawfull for the people to ſpeake one worde. In thoſe dayes the people were euer aſſembled betweene two riuers, for there was no hall to aſſemble a counſaill at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no buylded place meete for men to geue good counſaill in, or to determine cauſes, but rather a hinderance: bicauſe in ſuch places men be drawen to muſe on vaine things, and their mindes be caried awaye with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, comonly ſet vp for ornamēt in ſuch open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and ſportes be made, they thincke more of them, then any counſaill. Againe, if it be in a great hall, then of the fayer embowed or vawted roofes, or of the fretiſed ſeelings curiouſly wrought, and ſumptuouſly ſet forth, and tend not ſtill their buſines they come for. When the people were aſſembled in counſaill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counſell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thinge: but the people had onely authoritie to geue their aſſent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senatours, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwardes, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, bicauſe the people dyd many times croſſe and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding ſome thing to it, they dyd adde theſe wordes to the oracle aforeſaid. That if the people would not aſſent to any ordinaunce of the Senate, then ſhould it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake vp the counſell, and to fruſtrate all things done in the ſame: the wiſe aduiſe of the Senate being encountered thus, & their meaning to the beſt, ſo peruerted to the worſe. Theſe two Kings perſuaded the people, that at the very firſt, this addition came with the oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tyrtæus maketh mention in the place, where he ſayeth:

Cnacion fl.

The open fields appointed for place of Counſaill.

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought of Pythia: into their country ſoyle.
The Kings (euen they to vvhom of right there ought a louing care in princely breaſts to boyle, the Spartane vvealthe, to garde from euery ſpoyle.) Shalbe the chief, graue cauſes to decyde vvith Senatours: vvhoſe ſounde aduiſe is tride.
And next to them, the people ſhall fulfill aſmuche as ſeemes, to pleaſe their princes vvill.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the forme of his comon weale, it ſeemed notwithſtanding to thoſe that came after him, that this ſmall number of thirtie perſones that made the Senate, was yet to mightie, & of to great authoritie. Wherefore to bridle them in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato ſayeth) a bytte in their mouths, & that was the authoritie of the Ephores, which ſignifie as much as comptrollers: and were erected about a hundred and thirtie yeres after the death of Lycurgus. The firſt which was choſen of theſe, was Elatus, and it was in the time of king Theopompus, whoſe wife on a daye in her anger ſayed: howe throughe his negligence he would leaue leſſe to his ſucceſſours, then he had receyued of his predeceſſours. To whom he aunſwered againe, not leſſe but more, for that it ſhall continue lenger, and with a more ſuertie. For, in loſing thus their too abſolute power, that wrought them great enuie & hatred amōg their citizens, they dyd eſcape the daūger & miſchief that their neighbours the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS dyd feele: who would not geue ouer the ſoueraine authoritie which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wiſdome and foreſight manifeſtly knowen: who ſo will deeply conſider the ſeditions & ill gouernements of the ARGIVES, & MESSENIANS (their neere neighbours and kinſemen) aſwell from the people, as from the Kings. Who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: & in deuiding of their lands a farre better order then theirs. This notwithſtanding, they dyd not proſper longe: but through the pryde of their Kings, Lycurgus wiſdome.

A Kings,and the disobedience of their people,they entred into ciuill warres one against another, shewing by their disorders & misfortunes the speciall grace the godds dyd beare to SPARTA, to geue them such a reformer,as dyd so wisely temper the state of their common weale, as we will shewe hereafter. The second lawe that Lycurgus made,and the boldest and hardest he euer tooke in hande,was the making of a newe diuision of their lands.For he sawe so great a disorder & vnequality among the inhabitants,aswell of the countrie,as of the citie LACEDÆMON,by reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so poore,that they had not a handfull of grounde,and other some being least in number were very riche,that had all: he thought with him self to banishe out of the cittie all insolencie,enuie,couetousnes, & deliciousnes,and also all riches and pouertie,which he tooke the greatest,and the most continuall plagues of a cittie,

B or common weale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessarie a meane,as to persuade his cittizens to suffer all the landes, possessions, and inheritance of their countrie,to ronne in common together: and that they should make a newe diuision equally in partition amongest them selues, to liue from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, so that no one were richer thē another,& none should seeke to go before eache other, any other waye then in vertue only: thincking there should be no difference or vnequalitie among inhabitants of one cittie,but the reproaches of dishonestie,& the prayses of vertue.Thus Lycurgus following his determination, dyd out of hande make a lawe of the diuision of their lands. For first he dyd deuide all the countrie of LACONIA,into thirtie thousand equall partes,the which he dyd set out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those landes that ioyned next

C to the cittie of SPARTA, that was the chief metropolitan cittie of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand partes,which he deuided to the naturall cittizens of SPARTA,who be those that are properly called Spartans.Howbeit some will saye,he made but sixe thousand parts,& that king Polydorus afterwards dyd adde to other three thousand partes.Other saye also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand partes made but the halfe onely,& Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these partes was such, as might yelde vnto the owner yerely, three score and tenne bushels of barley for a man,and twelue bushels for the woman,and of wine & other liquide fruites, much like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus iudged to be sufficiēt,to kepe the bodye of a man in health, & to make him stronge & lustie, without any further allowance. They saye after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields,and came ouer the lands where wheate had bene

D reaped not longe before,and sawe the number of sheaues lying in euery shocke together,& no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing,& told them that were with him,me thinks all LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many brethern, who had newly made partition together.He gaue an attempt to haue deuided also moueables, & to haue made a common partition betwene them,to thend he would haue vtterly taken away all vnequalitie.But finding the cittizens tooke it very impatiently,that openly that which they had,should be taken awaye: he went about to doe it more secretly,and in a conninger wise to take away that couetousnes.For first of all,he dyd forbid all coyne of golde and syluer to be currant: & then he dyd set out cer-

E taine coynes of iron which he commaunded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantitie was but litle worthe. So as to laye vp therof the value of tenne Minas, it would haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue neded a yoke of oxen to carie it any where.Nowe golde & siluer being thus banished out of the countrie,many lewde partes & faultes must needes cease thereby.For who would robbe,steale,picke,take awaye,hyde,procure,or whorde vp any thing,that he had no great occasion to desire,nor any profit to possesse, nor would be any pleasure to vse or employe.For,the iron they occupied for their coyne, they cast vineger vpon it while it was redde hotte out of the fire, to kill the strength & working of it to any other vse: for thereby it was so eger & brickle,that it would byde no hammer,nor could be made,beaten,or forged to any other facion.By this meanes he banished also,all superfluous & vnprofitable sciences,which he knew he should not neede to doe by any proclamation: bi-

F cause they would fall awaye(or the most parte of them) euen of them selues,when the basenes of the money they should take for their worke,should vndoe them.For their iron moneys were not currant els where in the cities of GREECE, but euery bodye made a ieste of it there. By this occasion,the LACEDÆMONIANS could buye no forrein wares nor marchandises, neither came there any ſhippe into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rethorician dyd repaire into their countrie to teache them eloquence, & the cunning caſt of lying: nor yet came there to them any wyſard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell houſe, nor yet goldſmithe or iueller, to make or ſell any toyes or trifles of golde or ſiluer to ſet forth women: conſidering all theſe things are vſed to be made to get money, and to hourd vp that they had not. After this ſorte, delicatenes that wanted many things that entertained it, beganne by litle and litle to vaniſhe awaye, & laſtely, to fall of from them ſelues: when the moſt riche men had no more occaſion then the pooreſt, and riches hauing no meane to ſhewe her ſelfe openly in the worlde, was fayne to remaine ſhut at home idely, as not able to doe her maſter any ſeruice. Thereupon moueables and houſeholde ſtuffe (which a man cannot be without, and muſt be daylie occupied) as bedſteades, tables, chayers, and ſuche like neceſſaries for houſe, were excellently well made: and men dyd greatly prayſe the facion of the LACONIAN cuppe which they called Cothon, and ſpecially for a ſouldier in the warres, as Critias was wont to ſaye. For it was made after ſuch a facion, that the culler of it dyd let the eye to diſcerne the fowle & vnwholſome water, which men are driuen oftetimes to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times againſt ones ſtomake to ſee it: and if by chaunce there was any filth or mudde in the bottome, it would cleaue and ſticke faſt vpon the ribbes of the bellie, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that drancke it. The reformer of their ſtate was the cauſe of all this: bicauſe their artificers tending now no ſuperfluous works, were occupied about the making of their moſt neceſſary things. Further, nowe to driue awaye all ſuperfluitie and deliciouſnes, and to roote out vtterly deſire to get and gather: he made another thirde lawe for eating and drincking, and againſt feaſtes and banckets. Firſt he willed and commaunded the cittizens, that they ſhould eate together all of one meate, and chiefly of thoſe he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he dyd expreſſely forbid them to eate alone, or a parte, or ſecretly by them ſelues, vpon riche tables and ſumptuous beddes, abuſing the labour of excellent worcke men, and the deuiſes of likerous cookes to cramme them ſelues in corners, as they doe fatte vp beaſtes and poultrie, which doth not only breede ill conditions in the minde, but dothe marre the complexions of men, and the good ſtates of their bodie, when they giue them ſelues ouer to ſuch ſenſualitie and gluttonie. Whereof it followeth in the ende that men muſt needes ſleepe muche, to helpe to diſgeſt the exceſſe of meates they haue taken, and then muſt they goe to the whotte houſes to bathe them ſelues, and ſpend long time about the ordinarie attendance of their ſickely bodyes. This was a marueilous thing for him to bring to paſſe, but much more, to make riches not to be ſtolen, and leaſt of all to be coueted, as Theophraſtus ſayd of him: which by this meanes of making them eate together with all ſobriety at their ordinarie dyet, was brought to paſſe. For there was no more meane to the riche, then to the poore, to vſe to playe, or ſhewe riches, ſithe both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: ſo as that which is commonly ſpoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truely verified only in the cittie of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the worlde. For there riches was layed on the grounde like a corſe without a ſoule, that moueth no whit at all: conſidering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home ſecretly in his houſe, before he came to their open halles, nor might not come thither for a countenance only to his meales, being already fedde and full fraight. For euery mans eye was vpon thoſe ſpecially which did not eate & drincke with a good ſtomake amongeſt them: & it was the vſe to reproche them as gluttons, and dayntie mouthed men, which refuſed to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they ſaye, that grieued moſt the riche aboue all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were moſt madde and angrie with him: in ſo muche, as on a daye, they all ſetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to ronne out of the market place, and getting grounde of them, he recouered the liberties of a churche, before any could ouertake him: ſauing one young man called Alcander, who otherwiſe had no ill nature in him, but that he was ſomewhat quicke of his hande, and cholericke with all. Who following Lycurgus nerer then any other, dyd geue him a blowe ouerthwart the face with a ſtaffe, and ſtrake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer baſhed or made worde at the matter, but dyd lifte vp his head to thoſe that followed him, and ſhewed Cothon a ſtraūge kinde of cuppe of the Lacedæmonian ſouldiers.

Lycurgus appointeth order for dyet vnto the Lacedæmonians.

Alcander ſtrooke out Lycurgus eye.

A ſhewed them his face all a gore bloude, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were all ſo ſore aſhamed, that there was not a man that durſt once open his mouth againſt him, but to the contrarie, they ſeemed to pittie him, and dyd deliuer Alcander into his handes that had done the dede, to puniſhe him as him ſelfe pleaſed. And ſo they all brought him to his houſe, and ſhewed they were right hartely ſorie for his hurte. Lycurgus thancking them, returned them all backe againe, ſaue that he made Alcander to goe with him into his houſe, where he neuer hurte him, nor gaue him fowle worde: but commaunded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinarie ſeruaunts to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now beganne to ſpye his owne faulte, dyd moſt willingly attend vpon him, and neuer ſpake worde to the contrarie. When he had ſerued him a certaine time, being very nere continually about Lycurgus patience and gentleneſs.

B him, he beganne to feele and taſte of his naturall liberalitie, and ſawe of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to doe all he dyd: he perceyued what was the ſeueritie of his ordinary life, and what his conſtancy was to endure labour without wearines. Alcander then beganne to loue and honour Lycurgus from his harte, and tolde his parents and friends, howe he was no ſuche ſeuere man as he ſeemed, but was of ſo kynde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I praye you howe Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his puniſhement alſo, which he ſhould haue receyued: for of a fierce, raſhe, and a lewde conditioned youth he was before, he became nowe a very graue and wiſe man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he ſurnamed Optiletide, bicauſe the Minerua optileside.

DORIANS which dwell in thoſe partes of PELOPONNESVS, doe call the eyes, optiles. There

C are other writers (as Dioſcorides for one) which ſaye Lycurgus had a blowe with a ſtaffe, but he had not his eye ſtriken out with it: and how contrariwiſe, he founded this temple to Minerua, to giue her thanckes for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euer ſince the SPARTANS haue bene reſtrayned to carie ſtaues in any aſſembly of counſell. But to returne to their common repaſtes, which the CRETANS called Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either bicauſe they were places wherein they learned to liue ſoberly and ſtraightly (for in the GREKE tongue Phido, is to ſaue and ſpare) or els bicauſe their amitie and friendſhippe grewe there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feaſts of loue, by chaunging.d. into. L: It maye be alſo they added the firſt letter as ſuperfluous, and ment to call the places Edtia, bicauſe they dyd eate and drincke there. They ſat in their halles by fifteene in a Andria and Phiditia meales why ſo called.

D companie, litle more or leſſe, and at the beginning of euery moneth euery one brought a buſhell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fiue pound of cheeſe, and two pound and a halfe of figges for a man, beſides ſome litle portion of their monye to buye certaine freſhe acates. And ouer and aboue all this, euery man when he dyd ſacrifice in his houſe, was bounde to ſend the beſt and chiefeſt things of his ſacrifice to the halles to be eaten. Likewiſe if any man went an hunting, and killed any veniſon: it was an order, he ſhould ſend a pece of the fleſhe thither. Hauing theſe two lawfull cauſes, they might eate and drinke by them ſelues at home, either when they ſacrificed any beaſt to the goddes, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwiſe they were bounde of neceſſitie to meete in their halles at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very ſtraightly a great time: in ſo muche as king Agis on a daye,

E returning from the warres, where he had ouerthrowen the ATHENIANS, and being deſirous to ſuppe at home priuately with the Queene his wife, he ſent to the halles for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers aſſiſting the Kings in the warres, dyd denye him. The next daye Agis left of for ſpight, to doe the accuſtomed ſacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the ende of euery warre: whereupon they ſet a fine on his head, and condemned him to paye it. The young children alſo went to theſe repaſts, euen as they ſhould goe to ſchooles to learne grauity and temperaunce, where they heard wiſe and graue diſcourſes touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of maſters that were as hierlinges. There they learned pretylie to playe vpon wordes, and pleaſauntly to ſporte one with another, without any broade ſpeaches, or vncomely ieſtes, and at others handes to beare the F ſame againe, without choller or anger. For this propertie haue the LACEDÆMONIANS aboue all other, to take and geue a mocke without any offence: neuertheles, if any mans nature could not beare it, he neded but praye the partie to forbeare his ieſting, and ſo he lefte it ſtraight.

The propertie of a Lacedæmonian.

And it was euer an ordinarie among them, that the eldeſt of the companie tolde the reſt that were come into the hall to meale, with ſhewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a worde here out of this dore. Euen ſo he that would be receyued to meale there in their companie, muſt firſt of neceſſitie be allowed and receyued in this ſorte, by all the reſt. Euery one of them tooke a litle balle of branne or dowe to waſhe their handes with, and without euer a word ſpeaking, they threwe it into a baſen, which the ſeruant that waited on them at the table dyd carie vpon his head: he that was contented the other ſhould be receyued in companie, dyd caſt in his balle as he dyd receyue it, but if he miſliked him, then he preſſed it flat betwene his fingers, and threwe it in. This ball of branne thus preſſed flat, was aſmuch as a beane bored thorough, and was to them a ſigne of condemnation. If any one balle were found of this ſorte, the ſuter was reiected: for they would not haue any enter into their companie, that was not liked of all the reſt. He that thus was reiected, they ſaye he was diſcadded: for the baſin wherein the litle balles were caried, was called Caddos. The beſt diſhe they ſerued at theſe meales, was that they call their blacke brothe: ſo that when they had that, the olde men dyd eate no fleſhe, but lefte it all to the younge men, and they by them ſelues dyd eate the brothe. There was a king of PONTVS, that being deſirous to taſte of this blacke broth, dyd buye of purpoſe a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once taſted thereof, he was very angry ſtraight. The cooke then ſayed vnto him: and it pleaſe your grace, ere one ſhall finde this brothe good, he muſt be waſhed firſt in the riuer of Eurotas. After they had eate and druncke thus ſoberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to goe thither, nor any where els with light, bicauſe they ſhould accuſtome them ſelues boldely to goe vp and downe the darcke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is ſpecially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wiſe haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expreſſely ſet downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes ſhould be written. For he thought that which ſhould chiefly make a cittie happie, and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens heartes and manners, as to haue continuaunce for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre ſtronger knot to tye men with, then any other compulſary lawe. Which when men by vſe and cuſtome through good education doe take in their childhoode, it maketh euery man to be a lawe to him ſelfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and barganing one with another, which are but trifles, and ſometime are chaunged in one ſorte, and ſometime in another, as occaſion ſerueth: he thought it beſt not to conſtrayne them to doe it by writing, nor to eſtabliſhe cuſtomes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and diſcretion of men which had bene brought vp in the ſame, bothe to take awaye, and to adde therein, as the caſe and time ſhould require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeſt pointe of a good lawe maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cauſe men to be well brought vp and inſtructed. One of his ordinaunces therefore was expreſſely, that not one of his lawes ſhould be written. Another of his deuiſes was, againſt ſuperfluous charges and expences: which to auoyde, he made a lawe that all rooſes of houſes ſhould be made only with the axe, and all gates and doores with the ſawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he ſayed, ſpeaking of his table: Such a borde neuer receyueth any treaſon. Euen ſo thought Lycurgus, that ſuch a buylt houſe would neuer receyue curioſitie or daintines. For no man is ſo maddely diſpoſed or ſimple witted, as to bring into ſo poore and meane houſes, bedſteades with ſiluer feete, imbrodered couerlettes, or counterpoyntes of purple ſilke, neither yet plate of golde nor of ſiluer, nor ſuche other like coſtly furniture and fineneſs, as thoſe things require to wayte vpon them: bicauſe the beddes muſt be aunſwerable to the meanenes of the houſe, the furnitures of the beddes muſt be ſutelike to the ſame, and all other houſeholde ſtuffe, dyet, meate, and drincke agreable to the reſt. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the firſt King of that name, ſayed once: who ſupping on a time in the cittie of CORINTHE, and ſeeing the rooſe of the hall where he ſatte, ſumptuouſly embowed and carued, he asked ſtraight if the trees dyd growe carued ſo in that countrie. The third lawe was, he dyd forbyd them to make warre often with one enemie, leſt the enemie forced to take often armes in hande, might in the ende growe experter and vallianter then they.

A they. For this cauſe king Ageſilaus was greatly blamed, who was a longe time after. For by making often warres with the countrie of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the ende as expert and valliant ſouldiers, as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Antaleidas ſeeing him hurte one daye, ſayed vnto him: The THEBANS haue nobely rewarded thee for their learning, ſith thou haſt made them expert ſoldiers vnwilling to learne the diſcipline of warre. Antaleidas ſaying.
These be the lawes Lycurgus ſelfe called Retra, and ſignifie as muche as Oracles, that the god Apollo had diſcouered to him. Nowe the education of children, he eſteemed the chiefeſt and greateſt matter, that a reformer of lawes ſhould eſtabliſhe. Therefore beginning a farre of, he firſt conſidered the ſtate of mariage, and the generation of children. For Ariſtotle ſayeth, that Lycurgus dyd attempt to reforme women, and dyd ſoone geue it ouer
B againe: bicauſe he could doe no good therein, by reaſon of the great libertie they had taken by the abſence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often ſo to be abroade, and that they dyd leaue them miſtreſſes of their houſe, and at their returne dyd honour them ſo muche, and make of them ſo beyonde meaſure, with calling them ladyes and miſtreſſes. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, aſwell as he had of mens: and ſo reaſon dyd require. Firſt of all, he willed that the maydens ſhould harden their bodyes with exerciſe of running, wreſtling, throwe the barre, and caſting the darte, to the ende that the fruite wherewith they might be afterwardes conceyued, taking noriſhement of a ſtronge and luſtie bodye, ſhould ſhoote out and ſpread the better: and that they by gathering ſtrength thus by exerciſes, ſhould more eaſely awaye with the paynes
C of childe bearing. And to take awaye from them their womaniſhe dayntines, and fines, he brought vp a cuſtome, for young maydes and boyes to goe as it were a preceſſion, and to daunce naked at ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to ſinge certaine ſonges of their owne making, in the preſence and ſight of young men. To whom by the waye they gaue many times prety mockes of purpoſe, as pleaſauntly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their dueties: and ſometimes alſo in their ſonge for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they prayſed them which had deſerued it. By this meanes, they dyd ſet young mens hartes a fire, to ſtriue to winne moſt prayſe and honour. For who ſo was prayſed of them for a valliant man, or whoſe worthy actes were ſonge by them, he thereby was incoraged to doe the better another time: and the pretie girdes and quippes they gaue to others, D was of no leſſe force, then the ſharpeſt wordes and admonitions that otherwiſe could be geuen them. This tooke place the rather, bicauſe it was done in the preſence of the Kings, the Senatours, & all the reſt of the cittizens which came thither to ſee theſe ſportes. And though the maydes dyd ſhewe them ſelues thus naked openly, yet was there no diſhoneſty ſeene nor offred, but all this ſporte was full of playe and toyes, without any youthfull parte or wantonnes: and rather caried a ſhewe of demurenes, and a deſire to haue their beſt made bodyes ſeene and ſpyed. Moreouer, it ſomewhat lifted vp their hartes, and made them noblier minded, by geuing them to vnderſtand, that it was no leſſe comely for them, in their kynde and exerciſes to carie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exerciſes to carie the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACEDÆMON were ſo bolde to ſaye, and thincke of them ſelues E that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one daye aunſwered: being in talke with a ſtraunge woman that ſayed to her. There be no women in the worlde that commaund their husbands, but you wiues of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene ſtraight replyed: ſo be there no women but we, which bringe forth men. Furthermore, theſe playes, ſportes, and daunſes, the maydes dyd naked before younge men, were prouocations to drawe and allure the young men to marye: not as perſuaded by geometricall reaſons, as ſayeth Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Thoſe which would not marye, he made infamous by lawe. For it was not lawfull for ſuche to be preſent, where theſe open games and paſtimes were ſhewed naked. Furthermore, the officers of the cittie compelled ſuche as would not marye, euen in the hardeſt time of the winter, to enuironne the place of theſe ſportes, and F to goe vp and downe ſtarcke naked, and to ſinge a certaine ſonge made for the purpoſe againſt them, which was: that iuſtely were they puniſhed, bicauſe that lawe they diſobeyed. Moreouer, when ſuche were olde, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vſually receiued. Therefore there was no man that miſliked, or reproued that, A which was ſpoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwiſe he was a noble captaine. For, comming into a preſence, there was a young man which would not vouchſafe to riſe & doe him reuerence, nor to geue him place for to ſit downe: & worthely, quoth he, bicauſe thou haſt not gotten a ſonne, were driuen to take them awaye by force whom they would marie, not litle younge wenches I meane, which were not of age to be maried: but luſtie & ſtrong maides of age to beare children. And when one of them was ſtolen awaye in this ſorte, ſhe that was priuie thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and ſhaued the heares of her head that was maried: then ſhe put her into mans apparell, & gaue her all things ſute like to the ſame, and layed her vpon a mattereſſe all alone, without light or candell. After this was done, the bridegroome, being B neither droncke nor finelier apparrelled then he was wonte to be, but hauing ſupped ſoberly at his ordinarie, came home ſecretly to the houſe where the bride was: and there vntied his wiues girdell, tooke her in his armes, layed her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards fayer & ſoftely ſtole awaye to the place, where he was wonte to ſleepe with other young men. And ſo from thenceforth, he continued allwayes to doe the like, being all the daye time, and ſleeping moſt of the night, with his companions, onles he ſometime ſtale to ſee his wife, being affrayed, and aſhamed euer to be ſeene, by any of the houſe where ſhe was. And hereunto his younge wife did helpe for her parte, to ſpye meanes and occaſions howe they might mete together, and not be ſeene. This manner endured a great while, and vntill ſomme of them had children, before they boldely met together, and ſawe eache other on the daye C time. This ſecret meeting in this ſorte did ſerue to good purpoſes, not only bicauſe it was ſome meane of continencie and ſhamefaſtnes, but alſo it kept their bodies in ſtrength and Holſome rules for maried cooples. better ſtate, to bring forth children. It continued alſo in both parties, a ſtill burning loue, and a newe deſire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as muche as they luſt: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping ſtill a longing deſire to deuiſe howe to mete againe. Nowe when he had ſtabliſhed ſuche a continencie, and ſo kynde a framed honeſtie in mariage, he tooke no leſſe care to driue awaye all fooliſhe iealouſie therein, thin-Lycurgus regard to auoyd iealouſie in the common wealth. king it very good reaſon to beware there ſhould be no violence, nor confuſion in mariage:

and yet as reaſon would, they ſhould ſuffer thoſe which were worthie to get children as it D were in common, laughing at the mad follie of them which reuenge ſuch things with warre and bloudſhed, as though in that caſe men in no wiſe ſhould haue no fellowſhippe together.
Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being ſtepped in yeres, and hauing a young wife, if ſeeing a fayer young man that liked him, and knowen with all to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with childe, and afterwardes would auowe it for his, as if him ſelfe had gotten it. It was lawfull alſo for an honeſt man that loued another mans wife, for that he ſawe her wiſe, ſhamefaſt, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreate her huſband to ſuffer him to lye with her, and that he might alſo plowe in that luſtie grounde, and caſt abroade the ſeede of well fauored children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloude and parentage, with the moſt honorable and honeſteſt perſones. For firſt of all, Lycur- E gus did not like that children ſhould be priuate to any men, but that they ſhould be common to the common weale: by which reaſon he would alſo, that ſuch as ſhould become cittizens, ſhould not be begotten of euery man, but of the moſt honeſteſt men only. So Lycurgus thought alſo there were many fooliſhe vaine toyes and fanſies, in the lawes and orders of other nations, touching mariage: ſeeing they cauſed their bitches and mares to be limed and coue-red with the fayreſt dogges and goodlieſt ſtalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the maſters and owners of the ſame: and kept their wiues notwithſtanding ſhut vp ſafe vnder locke and key, for feare leaſt other then them ſelues might get them with childe, although they were ſickely, feeble brayned, and extreme olde. As if it were not firſt of all, and chiefly a diſcommoditie to the fathers and mothers, and likewiſe to thoſe that bring them vp, to haue F vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of drie and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleaſure and benefit is it to thoſe that haue fayer and good children, borne,

borne, as gotten of like ſeede and men. Theſe things were done then by naturall and ciuill reaſon, neuertheles they ſaye women were ſo farre of then from intreatie, as euer they were before: ſo as in olde time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe whereof, the aunſwer made by Geradas (one of the firſt auncient SPARTANS) vnto a ſtraunger, maye be alledged: that asked him, what puniſhement they had for adulterers. My friend, quo he, there be none here. But if there were? replied the ſtraunger againe. Marye ſayed he, then he muſt paye as great a bull, as ſtanding vpon the toppe of the mountaine Taygetus, maye drincke in the riuer of Eurotas. Yea marye: but howe is it poſſible (quo the ſtraunger) to finde ſuch a bull? Geradas laughing, aunſwered him againe. And howe were it poſſible alſo to finde an adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birthe of euery boye, the father was no more maſter of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will: but he him ſelfe caried him to a certaine place called Leſché, where the eldeſt men of his kinred being ſet, did viewe the childe. And if they founde him fayer, and well proportioned of all his limmes, and ſtronge: they gaue order he ſhould be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thouſand partes of inheritaunce for his education. Contrariwiſe, if they founde him deformed, miſhapen, or leane, or pale, they ſent him to be throwen in a deepe pyt of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would ſaye, the common houſe of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the childe, nor yet for the common weale, that it ſhould liue, conſidering from his birthe he was not well made, nor geuen to be ſtronge, healthfull, nor luſtie of bodie all his life longe. For this cauſe therefore, the nurce after their birthe did not waſhe them with water ſimply (as they doe euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prooue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they ſuppoſe, that children which are geuen to haue the falling ſicknes, or otherwiſe to be full of rewmes & ſickneſſes, cannot abide waſhing with wine, but rather drye and pyne awaye: as contrarilie the other which are healthfull, become thereby the ſtronger and the luſtier. The nurces alſo of SPARTA vſe a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without ſwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with ſwadling bandes, or hauing on their heades any croſſe clothes: ſo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better ſhaped and goodlier of bodie. Beſides that, they acquainted their children to all kinde of meates, and brought them vp without muche tendaunce, ſo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be lefte alone in the darcke, neither were they criers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of baſe and cowardly natures. So that there were ſtraungers, that of purpoſe bought nources out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they ſaye Amycla was one of them, which nourced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwardes a bonde man called Zopyrus, to be his maſter and gouernour: who had no better propertie in him, then other common ſlaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernment of the children of SPARTA, into the handes of hyered maſters or ſlaues bought with money: neither was it lawfull for the father him ſelfe to bring vp his owne childe after his owne manner and liking. For ſo ſoone as they came to ſeuen yeres of age, he tooke and diuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accuſtome them to playe, to learne, and to ſtudie one with another. Then he choſe out of euery company one, whom he thought to haue the beſt wit, and had moſt courage in him to fight: to whom he gaue the charge and ouerſight of his owne companie. The reſte had their eyes waiting allwayes on him, they did obey his commaundementes willingly, they did abide paciently all corrections he gaue them, they did ſuche taskes and worckes as he appointed them: ſo that all their ſtudie was moſt to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde graye headed men were preſent many times to ſee them playe, and for the moſt parte they gaue them occaſions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better knowe and diſcerne the naturall diſpoſition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any ſignes or tokens in time to come, to become cowardes or valliant men. Touching learning, they had as muche as ſerued their turne: for the reſte of their time they ſpent in learning howe to obey, to awaye with payne, to indure labour, to ouercome ſtill in fight. groweth and yeres, they dyd chaunge the exercises of their bodyes: they dyd shaue their heads, they went barelegged, they were constrained to playe naked together the most parte of their time. After they were past twelue yeres of age, they ware no lenger coates: and they gaue them yerely but one seely gowne. This was the cause they were alwayes so nasty & sluttishe, & they neuer vsed to bathe or noynte them selues, sauing only at certaine dayes in the yere, when they were suffered to tast of this refreshing. They laye and slept together vpon beddes of straw, which they them selues dyd make, of the toppes of reedes or canes that grewe in the riuer of Eurotas: which they were forced to goe gather and breake them selues with their handes, without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they dyd mingle thistle downe with these, which is called Lycophonas, bicause that stuffe seemeth somewhat warme of it selfe. About this time, the fauorers and likers of this prety youthe, which were commonly the lustiest and best disposed youthes of the cittie, beganne to be ofter in their companie: and then the olde men tooke the better regarde vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daylie exercises, & where their vse was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mocke another. This dyd their olde men, not by waye of pastime only, but with suche care and harty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, masters, & gouernours, while they were boyes: in so much as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not allwayes some to admonishe, reproue, or correct them, if they dyd a faulte. Notwithstanding all this, there was euer one of the honestest men of the cittie, who had expressely the charge and gouernaunce of these boyes. He dyd diuide them in companies, and afterwards gaue the ouersight of them, to suche a one of the boyes as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardie, and of the best corage amongest them. They called the children that were past infancie two yeres, Irenes: and the greateste boyes Melirenes: as who would saye, ready to goe out of boyerie. This boye who was made ouerseer of them, was commonly twenty yeres of age. He was their captaine when they fought, and did commaunde them as his seruaunts when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest, and the most growen, to carie wodde when they should prepare dinner or supper, and those which were leaste and weakest, to goe gather erbes, which they must steale or lacke them. So they went out to steale some in gardens, some at the markets, other in the halles where the feastes were kept, and men did eate together, into the which they conueyed them selues as closely and cunningly as they could deuise: for if they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terriblie, bicause they were so grosse and necligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They stole also all other kinde of meate, whatsoeuer they could get or laye hands on. They pried and sought all occasions howe to take and steale meate handsomely, bothe when men were a sleepe, or els that they were careles, or did not geue good hede vnto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundely, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittaunce, bicause necessity should driue them to venter boldely, and wit should finde out all the deuises to steale finely. This was the chiefest cause, why they gaue them so small a diet. The seconde cause was, that their bodies might growe vp higher in height. For the vitall spirites not being occupied to concoct and disgest much meate, nor yet kept downe, or spread abroade by the quantitie or ouerburden thereof, doe enlarge them selues into lengthe, and shoote vp for their lightnes: and for this reason they thought the bodie did growe in height and lengthe, hauing nothing to let, or hinder the rising of the same. It seemeth, that the same selfe cause made them fayerer also. For the bodies that are leane and slender, doe better and more easely yeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to euery member: and contrariwise it seemeth these grosse, corpulent, and ouerfedde bodies doe encounter nature, and be not so nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heauy substaunce. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, and be somwhat cast before they should haue bene borne, be smaller and fayerer also, and more pure commonly then other that goe their time: bicause the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more supple and pliant, is the easelier welded by nature, which geueth them their shape and forme. Touching the naturall cause of this effect, let vs geue place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding of the same. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children.

A They dyd robbe with ſo great care, and feare to be diſcouered: that they tell of one, which hauing ſtolen a litle foxe, dyd hyde him vnder his cloke, and ſuffered him with his teethe and clawes to teare out all his bellie, and neuer cryed, for feare he ſhould haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he ſtoode. This is not vncredible, by that we ſee younge boyes doe abide at this daye: for we haue ſeene diuers, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, ſurnamed Orthia. Nowe this vnder maſter, who had the charge of euery companie of theſe boyes, vſed after ſupper (ſitting yet at the table) to byd one of them ſinge a ſonge: to another he put forth a queſtion, who was to be well aduiſed of his aunſwer, as for example: Who is the honeſteſt man in the cittie? or howe thinckeſt thou by that ſuch a one dyd? By this exerciſe they were enured from boyes ſtate, to iudge of things
B well or ill done, and to vnderſtand the life and gouernment of their cittizens. For which of them dyd not aunſwer quickly and directly to theſe queſtions, who is a good man, who is an honeſt cittizen, and who not: they thought it was a ſigne of a dulle wit, and careles nature, not geuen to any vertue, for deſire of honour and eſtimation. Furthermore this vnder maſter was euer to waite for his aunſwer, and to ſee it ſhould be brief and well knyt vp in wordes: otherwiſe his puniſhement that aunſwered croſſely, or to litle purpoſe, was that his maſter byt him by the thumbe. This he dyd many times in the preſence of the olde men and magiſtrates of the cittie, that they might ſee whether he puniſhed them with reaſon or not, and according to their deſeruing. And though he dyd hurte him, they dyd not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone awaye, then was he him ſelfe rebuked and puniſhed, if he had
C corrected them to ſore, or contrarylie had fauored them to muche. Moreouer they dyd aſcribe the good or ill opinion conceaued of the children, vnto euery of their fauorers, and louers, which dyd affect and entertaine them: in aſmuch as they ſaye, a young boye vpon a time fighting with another, and a crye ſcaping out of his mouthe, which his fainte cowardly harte dyd yelde, his fauorer & louer was ſtraight condemned by the officers of the cittie to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the moſt honeſt and vertuouſeſt women loued the young maydes thus alſo: yet was there no iealouſie nor ſuſpition that grewe hereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grewe a maruelous mutuall loue and kyndnes betweene them, which loued in one ſelfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, dyd deuiſe howe to make the childe they loued in common, the wiſeſt, the gentleſt, and the D beſt conditioned aboue all other. They taught theſe children to ſpeake in ſuche ſorte, that their ſpeache had euer in it a pleaſaunt grace, and in fewe wordes comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great maſſe and weight of iron money, ſhould be but litle worthe, and of a ſmall value, as we haue tolde you before: and contrarilie, that ſpeache in fewe wordes, without any affectation, ſhould holde much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long ſilence, ſhould be brief and pitthie in their aunſwers. For as the ſeede of incontinent men which are to buſie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bringe forth fruite: euen ſo immoderate ſpeache, full of wordes and buſie tattle, bringeth forth as litle ſenſe. Hereof it commeth, that the aunſwers of the LACONIANS were ſo ſhorte & witty. As they ſaye, king Agis aunſwered on a daye an ATHENIAN, who ieſting at the ſwords E the LACEDÆMONIANS dyd were, ſayed they were ſo ſhorte, that theſe tumblers, and iugglers dyd ſwallowe them downe in the ſight of all the world: and yet ſayed Agis, we hurte our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of ſpeaking: which is not to ſpeake much, but when they ſpeake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderſtand them. I thincke alſo, that Lycurgus ſelfe, was ſhorte and quicke in his talke. For ſo a man maye coniecture by his aunſwers which are written: as that which he made to one who earneſtly prayed him to ſtabliſhe a popular ſtate in LACEDÆMON, that the baſeſt might haue as great authoritie as the higheſt. Beginne (ꝙ he) to doe it firſt in thine owne houſe. And as that alſo which he aunſwered another who asked him, why he had appointed ſo ſmall things, and ſo little of value to be offered to the goddes? Bicauſe (ꝙ F he) we ſhould neuer ceaſe to honour them. And as that which he ſpake another time, touching fightes and frayes, which was: that he dyd neuer forbid his cittizens any of them, but thoſe wherein they vſe to geue their hande, as you would ſaye to yeld. Men finde alſo ſuche like aunſwers, in ſome of his letters written to his cittizens, as when they asked him. Howe can we defende our ſelues againſt our enemies? He aunſwered: If ye be poore, and one doe couet no more then another. And in another letter that was ſent, where he diſcourſeth, whether it were requiſite to incloſe the cittie with walles: he ſayeth, can that cittie be without walles, which is enuironned with men, though it be vncompaſſed with ſtone? Neuertheles it is harde to reſolue, whether thoſe letters, and other ſuche like that are ſhewed, be to be beleeued, or diſcredited to be his. But that long ſpeache was much diſliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifeſtly to be ſeene by the words, which ſomme amõgeſt them haue heretofore aunſwered. As king Leonidas ſayed one daye, to one that diſcourſed with him many good things, but out of ſeaſon: friend, thou ſpeakeſt many good wordes, but to litle purpoſe. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made ſo fewe lawes: bicauſe ſayed he, to men of fewe wordes, fewe lawes will ſerue. And Archidamidas ſayed thus to ſomme, which reproued Hecataeus the Orator, for that being bidden to ſupper at one of their feaſts he ſpake not a worde all ſupper time. He who can ſpeake well, knoweth alſo when to ſpeake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feate and quicke aunſwers, commonly there was ſome prety grace, it maye be well ſeene and knowen by theſe that followe. Demaratus aunſwered a buſie fellowe who troubled him to much with vaine importunate queſtions, asking him ſtill: who was the honeſteſt man of LACEDÆMON? euen he that is leaſt like thy ſelfe. And Agis ſayed to ſomme which highely prayſed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, & iuſt dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (q; he) if in fiue yeres ſpace the ELIANS one daye doe good iuſtice? And Theopompus likewiſe to a ſtraunger, who as deſirous to ſhew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery bodye called him Philolacon (as to ſaye) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honeſtie for thee (ſayed he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her cittizens. And Pliſtonax the ſonne of Pauſanias, when an Orator of ATHENS ſayed the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned, and ignorant: thou ſayeſt true q; he, for we only of all the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demaunded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enowe ſayd he, to driue awaye the wicked. We maye coniecture alſo their manner of ſpeaking, by their wordes in mirthe, which they ſpake ſometimes playing wiſe: for they dyd neuer vſe to ſpeake vaine wordes at randone, but it had alwayes ſome ſecret meaning in it, which required anothers good obſeruation that would finde it. As he which was deſired to goe heare the nightingall counterfeated naturally: I haue (ſayed he) heard the nightingall it ſelfe. And another which hauing redde this inſcription vpon a tumbe.

When as they had, vvell quenched tyrannie throughout their lande, by vvorthie vvarlike povver, Their happe vvas yet in vvretched vvife to dye, by ſcaling Selynuntaes' ſtrongeſt tovver.

They well deſerued death, ſayed he, that dyd but quenche tyrannie: they ſhould haue quite conſumed it with fire. And one younger boye to another, promiſing to geue him ſuche hardie cockes of the game, as ſhoul dye in the place where they fought. O geue me not thoſe (ſaid he) which will dye, but thoſe which with fighting will kill others. Another ſeeing men ſitting in coches and litters as they went: god forbid (ſaid he) that I ſhould euer ſit in a chayer, where I could not riſe to my elders. Suche were their aunſwers & encounters. So that ſomme had reaſon which ſayed heretofore, to ſpeake LACONIAN like, was to be philoſopher like: as you would ſaye, more to exerciſe the minde, then the bodye. Beſides all this, they dyd ſtudie to ſinge well, and to make goodly ditties and ſonges. Then they ſpake moſt properly and feately. There was in their ſongs alſo a certaine motion, I wote not what, which ſtirred vp the hearers hartes, and dyd kindle deſire in them to doe notable feates. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, conteining for the moſt parte the prayſe of thoſe, which were ſlayne in battell for the defence of their countrie, as being happy men: & a ſhame to thoſe that liue, which for fainte hartes refuſed ſo to dye, to leade a miſerable and vnfortunate life. For this cauſe therefore in all their warres, when they ſhould geue battell, the King dyd firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put his ſouldiers in minde (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline & wiſdome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiers were in the moſt extreme daunger, the Muſes ſhould preſent them ſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to pricke them forward to doe ſome noble actes of worthy memorie. In their time of warre, they dyd tollerate their young men a litle of their hard & old accuſtomed life, & ſuffered them then to trime their heares, to haue braue armour, to weare gay apparell, & tooke as great delight therein, to ſee them gallant, & luſtie, as to behold young neying & ſnorting horſe, deſirous for to fight. And althoughe from the beginning of their youthe, they dyd vſe to weare longe The longe buſhes and heare of the Laconians.
E heares: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe & bruſhe their heades, as when they ſhould to the battell. For when they dyd nointe them ſelues with ſweete oyles, & dyd ſhed their heare, remembring Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that heares to them which were fayer, dyd make them more fayer, & to them that were fowle, they made them more ougly & dredfull. The exerciſes alſo of their bodies, were more eaſie & gentle, & not ſo hard & ſtraight in their warres, as they were in a peace: & generally, their whole manner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they only were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarylie doe endure, to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwardes when their armie was ſet in battell raye, euen in the face of How the Laconians beganne battell.
F the enemie, the King dyd ſtraight ſacrifice a goate vnto the goddes, & forthwith commaunded all his ſouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heades, & willed that the pipes ſhould ſownd the ſonge of Caſtor: at the noyſe & tune whereof, he him ſelfe beganne firſt to marche The Laconiãs ſonge when they marched. Euſt. Ilia. 15.

forward. So that it was a maruelous pleasure, & likewise a dredfull sight, to see the whole battell marche together in order, at the sound of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confounde their ranckes, nor to be dismayde nor amazed themselues, but to goe on quietly & ioyfully at the sounde of these pipes, to hazard themselues euen to death. For it is likely, that such corages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercome with much furie: but rather they haue an assured constancie & valliantnes in good hope, as those which are backed with the assisting fauour of the goddes. The King marching in this order, had allwayes some about him, which had before time wonne the prises in games and iustes. And they saye there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great some of money at the games Olympicall, not to present him selfe at them: but he refused it, liking better with great payne to winne the prise, then for muche money to lose his honour. Whereupon one sayed vnto him, LACONIAN: & what hast thou gotten nowe, to carie away the prise with so much swet? The LACONIAN aunswered him laughing: I shall fight in the battell, sayeth he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they dyd still fiercely and fiercelier set vpon them, and dyd neuer cease, vntill their enemies gaue waye and fled: and then they chased and followed them still, vntill such time as their ouerthrowe and flight had assured them of the victorie. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhod, neither the parte of a noble minde, or of so wor hye a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hewe in peeces, men so scattered and out of order, hauing forsaken all the hope of victorie. This fell out not only honorable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them, knowing they killed none but suche as resisted stowtely, and howe they dyd let other goe which fled before them: they found it was more their benefit to flye, then to tarie and abide the strokes. Hippias the sophister sayeth, that Lycurgus him selfe was a very good captaine, & a great souldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fieldes: & Philostephanus ascribeth to him the deuise to put horsemen in troupes & companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fiftie men at armes was a troupe, whose manner was to put them selues in squadrōs. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwise, that Lycurgus was neuer at the warres, & that he made all his lawes and gouerniment in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of warres during the playes Olympicall, which they saye he deuised, doeth shew in apparaunce that he was a gentle natured man, & one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongest whom Hermippus was one) saye, he was not with Iphitus at the first beginning when he ordeined the playes Olympicall, but that by chaunce he happened to come thither, passing by in his iorney only, & that he stayed there to see the games: where he thought he heard the voyce of a man behinde him, saying, he maruelled much why he dyd not persuade his cittizens also to be parteners of this newe deuise: and turning backe to see who it was that spake to him, he sawe no bodye. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a speache from the goddes: & went therefore presently to seeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the statutes and orders of the feast, which afterwardes were farre more famous, better ordered, & more stately then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS: their discipline & order of life continued still, after they were full growen men. For it was not lawfull for any man to liue as hē listed, but they were within their cittie, as if they had bene in a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to liue withall, & what busines he hath els to doe in his calling. To be shorte, they were all of this minde, that they were not borne to serue them selues, but to serue their countrie. Therfore if they were cōmaunded nothing els, they went continually to see what the children dyd, and to teache them somewhat which might profit the common weale, or els they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lycurgus euer brought into his cittie, was the great rest and leysure which he made his cittizens to haue, only forbidding them that they should not professe any vile or base occupation: and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goodes were nothing profitable nor esteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bonde men by the warres, dyd till their groundes, and yeelded them a certaine reuenue euery yere. And as touching this matter, they tell of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a daye at ATHENS where the lawe was pleaded, dyd vnderstand that a cittizen there was condemned for Idlenes, and howe he went home

A to his houſe very ſorowfully, accompanied with his friends which were ſorie for him, & greatly lamented his ill happe. The LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed thoſe which were about him, to ſhewe him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to ſhew how he thought it a vile & ſeruill thing to exerciſe any handy craft, or to worke any thing by hande to get money. For ſutes in lawe, a man maye be well aſſured they were baniſhed with the golde & ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, conſidering now there was no more auarice nor couetouſnes there, nor yet pouertie nor lacke, but equalitie with aboundaunce, & quiet life with ſobrietie. All other times but when they had warres, they followed daunſing, feaſtes, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exerciſes of bodye, & meetinges to paſſe the time away. For the younge men vntill they came to thirtie yeres of age, neuer went into the market to buye any prouiſion

B or things for the houſe, but dyd their fathers or their friends buſines: naye it was a ſhame for the oldeſt men, to hawnte the market to often. As to the contrary, it was honorable for them to be preſent at the ſhewe place the moſt parte of the daye, where they diuerſely exerciſed their bodyes, & likewiſe to be at the places of aſſembly, there to ſpend time with talking together, & diſcourſing honeſtly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffike, or money. For all their talke (for the moſt parte) was about the prayſing of ſome honeſt thing, or ſportingwiſe to reproue ſome diſhoneſtie, which alwayes caried with it ſome gentle leſſon or monition by the waye. For Lycurgus was not ſuch a ſower man, as they neuer ſawe him laughe: but as Soſibius writeth, it was he that firſt ſacrificed to the litle god of laughture, which is at LACEDÆMON, bicauſe he would mingle their feaſtes and aſſemblies with mirthe, as a pleaſaunt

C ſawce to eaſe the trouble of their ſtrickt and harde life. To be brief, he did accuſtome his cittizens ſo, that they neither would nor could liue alone, but were in manner as men incorporated one with another, and were allwayes in company together, as the bees be about their maſter bee: ſtill in a continuall loue to ſerue their countrie, to winne honour, & to aduaunce the common weale. Which affection of theirs is playne & eaſely ſeene to be imprinted in them by certen of their aunſwers, as in that which Pædaretus ſayed on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his houſe mery and iocond as might be, ſayed: It did him good to ſee there were three hūndred founde better in the cittie than him ſelfe. Piſiſtratidas alſo being ſent ambaſſadour with certen other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN lordes asked him, if they came of their owne deſire, or

D whether they were ſent from the whole ſtate: if we obtaine, ſayed he, it is from the ſtate: if we be denied, then we come of our ſelues. And Argileonida the mother of Braſidas, asked ſome that went to viſite her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iorney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her ſonne died like a man, and a worthy SPARTAN. And they ſtraight did commend him highely, ſaying: there was not left in all LACEDÆMON ſuche a valliant man. She replied vnto them. Saye not ſo, my friends, I praye you: for Braſidas was in dede a valliant man, but the country of LACONIA hath many moe yet vallianter than he was. Now touching their Senate: Lycurgus was the firſt that erected it among them. The firſt that were thereof, were Lycurgus chief ayders & aſſiſters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwards he ordeined, that when any of thoſe firſt ſhould happen to dye, they ſhould chooſe in his

E place the moſt honeſt reported man in the cittie, ſo he were three ſcore yere olde and aboue. This was the nobleſt glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and priſe, not that he was ſwifteſt among the ſwift, nor ſtrongeſt amongeſt the ſtrong, but that he among the honeſt was honeſteſt. He had the reward of his vertue, as for libertie to ſpeake, ſoueraine authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the common weale, the honour, the life, and the goodes of the whole cittizens: howbeit the election was made after this ſorte. The people firſt aſſembled in the market place, where there were ſome appointed and ſhut vp thereabout in a houſe, from whēce they could neither ſee, nor be ſeene of thoſe that were aſſembled, but onely they might heare the noyſe which they made there. For the people by their crye and ſhowte, did declare whom they did chooſe, and whom they did refuſe of the competitours, as they vſed

F to ſhewe their liking by the like crye in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and preſented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, paſſed through the middeſt of the aſſemblie of the people, and ſayed neuer a worde.

The people ſtraight that liked, made a crye or ſhowte alowde. The men appointed which were locked vp, had bookes or tables in which they wrote and noted the greatnes of the crye, and ſhowte the people made, as euery competitour paſſed by, not knowing nor ſeing who he was. Theſe hidden men did onely ſet downe in their bookes, the firſt, the ſecond, the thirde, and ſo many more, as by ſhowtes and cryes they perceyued dyd paſſe thus through the aſſemblie. They noted alſo in their ſaid bookes, which of theſe had the greateſt crye and ſhowte of people at their paſſing thorough: and him they came and declared to be Senatour choſen. Then he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to all the temples of the goddes in the cittie to geue thankes, hauing a great traine of young men following, and prayſing of his vertues. There went alſo with him a maruelous company of women ſinging ſonges of his prayſe, and howe bleſſed he was, that he had liued ſo vertuouſly. Then euery one of his kinne prepared a bancket for him at home at their houſes, and as he entred the houſe, they ſayed vnto him: The cittie honoreth thee vvith this bancket. That done, he repayred afterwards to the ordinarie place of their eating, where he dyd in all things as he was accuſtomed, ſauing he was ſerued nowe at his table with a double allowaunce, whereof he reſerued the one. After ſupper, all his kinſewomen ſtoode in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: ſo he called her whom he loued beſt, and gaue her his allowaunce he had ſaued, and ſayed to her: This was geuen me in token I was this daye rewarded for my vertue: and euen ſo I geue it thee for a like token of rewarde for thy vertue. Then was ſhe brought home by all the women there to her houſe, euen in like ſorte as he was by the men. Touching burialles, Lycurgus made a wiſe order: For firſt of all, to cut of all ſuperſtition of burying places, he commaunded they ſhould burie their dead within the cittie, & that their graues ſhould be round about their temples, that young perſones might haue them allwayes in their eyes, & not be affrayed to ſee a dead bodye, as if to touche a corſe, or to paſſe by their graues, it ſhould defile a man. Then did he forbid them to burie any thing with the corſe, and willed they ſhould only lappe it vp in a redde clothe, with oliue leaues. It was not lawfull to graue the name of any dead bodye vpon his graue, but only of ſuche a man as died in the warres, or of ſome holy woman profeſſed into their temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very ſhorte. For it laſted not but a eleuen dayes, and on the twelft daye, they muſt doe ſacrifice to Proſerpina, and ſo leaue of their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or vnworking in his cittizens: for to all neceſſarie things which men can not lacke, Lycurgus ioyned euer a certaine emulation of men. As to deſire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furniſhed his cittie with many good preceptes and examples, emong which his cittizens being ſtill borne and bred vp, and hauing the ſame in euery place before their eyes where they went, they came to paſſe in time to be framed after the very patterne and moulde of vertue it ſelfe. For this cauſe he did not ſuffer any to trauell out of the countrie, or to goe abroad as he would, without ſpeciall licence, for feare leaſt thoſe which trauelled abroad for their pleaſure, ſhould bring home ſtraunge facions and manners, and a corrupt diſordered life, which by litle and litle might get waye, and bring an alteration and chaunge of the whole ſtate. Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all ſtraungers, except thoſe which had neceſſarie buſines there, or were come thither for ſome profit to the countrie: not that he was affrayed they ſhould learne ſome thing whereby to loue vertue, or that they ſhould deſire to followe his facion and manner of gouernment as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they ſhould teache his cittizens ſome naughty manners, or ſome ill fauored vice. For it muſt needes be, that ſtraungers bring euer ſtraunge and newe deuiſes with them: which newe deuiſes bring with them alſo newe opinions: and newe opinions beget newe affections and mindes, that many times are repugnant to the lawe, and to the forme of the common weale eſtabliſhed before, as diſcordes doe many times in an harmonie of muſicke, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he iudged it a thing moſt neceſſarie, to keepe his cittie free and ſafe from coũterfeating of any ſtraungers manners or facions, that were cõmonly as perſones infected with ſome contagious ſicknes. Nowe in all we haue ſpoken before, euen to this place, there is no manner of token or ſhewe of iniuſtice, or lacke of equitie, wherewith ſome ſeme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: by ſaying they were well made, to make men warlicke and valliant, but not to be iuſte or righteous. But cõcerning the lawe they call Cryptia, as much to ſaye, as their ſecret: if it were of Lycurgus

A curgus institution, as Aristotle sayeth, it might haue caried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his common weale. This was the lawe: The gouernours which had the charge and ouersight of the young men, at certaine appointed times, dyd chuse out those they thought to haue the best discretion, and sent them abroade into the countrie, some one waye, some another waye, who caried with them daggers, and some prouision to feede them. These young men being thus dispersed abroade in the countrie, did hide them selues all the daye close in secret places, and there they laye and tooke their rest: afterwardes when night was come, they went to seeke out the high wayes, and killed the first of the Ilotes that they met. Sometimes euen in the broade daye, they went into the countrie to kill the strongest and stowtest of them: as Thucydides telleth in his history of the warres of Peloponnesvs, where he sayeth. The cruelty of the Lacedæmonians against the Ilotes.

B That a certaine conuenient number of the Ilotes were crowned, by a publicke proclamation of the Spartans: and being infrancheſed, for their good seruices they had done the common weale, they were caried to all the temples of the goddes for an honour. Within a while after, no man knewe what was become of them, being about two thousand in number: so that neuer man heard tell neither then nor since, howe they came to their deathes. Howbeit Aristotle aboue all others sayeth, that the Ephores, so soone as they were placed in their offices, made warres with the Ilotes, bicause they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardely. For they forced them sometimes to drincke wine without water out of measure, till they had made them starke drunke. Then they brought them all into their common halles where they did eate, to make their children to beholde

C them, and to see what beastlines it was for a man to be drunke. Likewise they made them singe songes, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honest men, and suche as were full of derision and mockerie, and did forbid them expressely to singe any honest songes. So it is reported, that in the iorney the Thebans made to Laconia, many of the Ilotes were taken prisoners there: and when they were commaunded to singe the verses of Terpander, or of Alcman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not doe it: saying, they durst not singe them for their maisters. Diodor. Sicul. lib. 15.

Wherefore he that first sayed in the countrie of Lacedæmonia, he that is free is more free, and he that is bonde, is more bonde then in other places: knewe very well the diuersitie betweene the libertie and bondage there, and the libertie and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the Lacedæmonians beganne to vse these great outrages and cruelties, long

D time after the death of Lycurgus, and specially since the great earthquake that happened at Sparta, at which time the Ilotes rose against them with the Messenians, and did great mischief through the countrie, and put the cittie to the greatest distresse and daunger that euer it had. For I cannot be persuaded, that euer Lycurgus inuented, or instituted, so wicked and mischieuous an acte, as that kynde of ordinaunce was: bicause I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iustice wee see he vsed in all his other doings, and was witnessed besides by open oracle from the goddes, for a iust and wise man. Furthermore, they saye of him, that when he sawe the chiefest pointes of his gouernment had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his common weale went on, and was strong enough to maintaine and keepe it selfe a foote, like as Plato sayeth, that God reioyced greately after he had made the worlde,

E and sawe the same turne and moue his first mouing: euen so Lycurgus taking singular pleasure and delight in his minde, to see his notable lawes put in vre, and so well stablished and liked of by experience, sought yet to make them immortall, as neere as he could possible, by any forecast of man, that no after time whatsoeuer, might chaunge or put them downe. To bring this to passe, he caused all the people to assemble, and tolde them he thought his ciuill pollicie and state of common weale was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happy life: yet there was one matter behinde of greater importaunce than all the rest, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had first asked counsell of the oracle of Apollo. And therefore in the meane time they should keepe and obserue his lawes and ordinaunces inuiolable, without chaunging, remouing, or staying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the cittie of Plato in Timæo.

F Delphes, and then they should doe that other thing behinde, if the God then so counselled him. They all promised him to doe it, and prayed him to make haste to goe on his iorney. But before he departed, he made the Kings and Senatours sweare first, and consequently all the peo- Lycurgus wonderfull counsell in stablishing his lawes.

ple after, that they would keepe his lawes and ordinaunces without chaunging or altering any thing, vntill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the cittie of DELPHES, where so soone as he arriued, he sacrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man an happy life. Apollo made him aunswer, his lawes were very good, and that his cittie keping them, should be the most renowmed of the worlde. Lycurgus caused this oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he sacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friendes, and of his sonne, he determined to dye, bicause his cittizens should neuer be released of the othe they had made betweene his handes. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hathe strength enough to liue longer and yet was olde enough also to dye if he would. Wherefore finding him selfe happy to haue obteined his desire, he willingly pyned him selfe to death, by abstinence, and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit euer to the common weale, and that the ende of their life should be no more idle, or vnprofitable, then the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious actes, to haue their death extolled for worthines. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and crowne of his felicitie, after he had made and ordeined so many good and notable lawes, for the honour and benefit of his countrie: and should be as a seale of confirmation of his lawe, and the continuall preseruitour of his cittie, considering all his cittizens had sworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceaued of his hope, for his cittie was the chiefest of the worlde, in glorie and honour of gouernment, by the space of fiue hundred yeres. For so long his cittie kept his lawes without any chaunge or alteration by any of the Kings successours, vntill king Agis, the sonne of Archidamus beganne to reigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinewe any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strickt order: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordeined, for the maintenaunce & defence of the libertie of the people, whereas in deede they did also strengthen the authoritie of the Kings and Senate. Nowe in the raigne of king Agis, gold and siluer beganne first to creepe in againe to the cittie of SPARTA, by meanes of Lysander. With money there came in straight couetousnes, and gredines to get and gather. And although Lysander was not desirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and couetousnes into the countrie, and filled the same with all finenes, by bringing in great store of golde and siluer from the warres, directly against the lawes and ordinaunces of Lycurgus. The which so long as they were in force and vse, it appered that the gouernment of SPARTA seemed not to be a pollicy or common weale, but rather a certaine holy place & order of religion. And euen as the Poets fayne, that Hercules went through the world with his clubbe, and lyons skynne, punishing cruell robbers and vnnaturall tyrannes: so in like case with a litle scrowe of parchement, and a poore cape, did the SPARTANS commaund and geue lawes, to all the rest of GREECE, euen with their good liking and consent. And they chased the tyrannes awaye, which vsurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their citties, and did decide all controuersies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without sending out one souldier, but only a simple poore ambassadour. At whose commaundement, the people presently assembled like the bees, which gather together about their King, so soone as they spye him: they did then so greatly reuerence the good gouernment & iustice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which saye, the cittie of LACEDÆMON could obey well, but not commaunde: and for proofe they alleage wordes of king Theopompus, who aunswered one which sayd, that SPARTA was mainteined, bicause the Kings could commaund well. Naye the rather (sayd he) bicause the cittizens can obey well. For men commonly disdaine to obey those, which are not wise in commaunding. So that the faithfull obedience of the subiectes, dependeth much vpon the sufficient commaundement of the wise prince. For he that directeth well, must needes be well obeyed. For like as the arte of a good rider, is to make his horse gentle, and ready at commaundement: euen so the chiefest pointe belonging to a prince, is to teach his subiects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDÆMONIANS procured, that not onely other people did willingly obey them, but also desired to be ruled, and commaunded by them. For they asked them, neither shippes nor money, nor yet did send them any number of men

A of warre to compell them, but onely they sent one cittizen of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people submitted them selues, and were holpen by him in their necessitie, as fearing and reuerencing him. In this wise the SICILIANS were holpen by Gysippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Brasidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lysander, Callicratidas, and by Agesilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of princes, peoples, and Kings, vnto whom they were sent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the cittie of SPARTA, as vpon the most perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery worde spoken in iest by Stratonicus: Who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their sacrifices, and the ELIANS to tende their games: and if they made any faulte therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS should be well whipped. That

B was merely spoken, and in a iesting manner. But Antisthenes (the philosopher and one of Socrates scholers) seeing the THEBANS growen very hawtie & glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the iorney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh sayed he, these THEBANS here doe like the schoole boyes, which bragge and reioyce when they haue a litle beaten their master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his cittie to commaunde many. But he thought the felicitie of a cittie, as of a priuate man, consisted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the vnitie of the inhabitants thereof. He framed his common wealth to this ende, that his cittizens should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might mainteine and keepe them selues long in safetie. The self same intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in setting forth their bookes, which they wrote

C of the gouernment of common weales: and so had likewise many other great and learned men which haue written of the same matter. Howbeit they only left behinde them, wordes, and written bookes: but Lycurgus contrariwise, left no written bookes nor pamplets, but stablished and left behinde him, a royall forme of gouernment, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely see, a whole cittie liue together, and gouerne it selfe philosophically, according to the true rules and preceptes of perfect wisdome: which imagined, that true wisedome was a thing hanging in the ayer, and could not visiblie be seene in the worlde. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glorie all those, which euer tooke vpon them to write or stablishe the gouernment of a common weale. And therefore sayeth Aristotle, that after his death they did him lesse honour in LACEDÆMONIA,

D then he had deserued: albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could deuise. And yet they buylt a temple for him, and made solemne sacrifice to him euery yere, as vnto a god. More, they saye, that when the ashes of his bodie were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning vpon his tumbe where they were put: which they had not often seene to happen, to other men of name after their decease, sauing only to the poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neere the cittie of ARETHVSA. The which is some manifest argument, for suche as loue the Poet, to laye against those which somewhat depraue him, seing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the goddes. Some saye Lycurgus died in the cittie of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis sayeth, he died in

E ELIDA. Timæus and Aristoxenus write, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Aristoxenus sayeth further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shewe his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broade highe wayes side. He left one onely begotten sonne named Antiorus, who died without issue, so that his house and name fayled with him. But his neere kinsemen and familliar friendes, did set vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they assembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who sayeth, that he being dead in CRETA, his friendes burned his bodie, and afterwardes threwe his ashes into the sea, according as he had prayed and requested them. For he feared, that if any parte of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitans would haue sayed he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought them selues discharged of their othe, and might haue

THE Hiſtoriographers differ maruelouſly of the time, in which Numa Pompilius raigned King, albeit ſome will deriue from him many noble houſes deſcēded in ROME. For one Clodius, who wrote the booke intituled the table of time, affirmeth that the auncient regiſters of the cittie of ROME were loſt when it was taken and ſacked by the GAVLES: and that thoſe which are extant at this daye be not true, but were only made by men deſirous to gratifie ſome, which haue thruſt in auncient houſes and families of the firſt ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they ment to repreſent. On the other ſide, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familier friend and ſcholler of Pythagoras the philoſopher, yet ſome ſaye he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet mainteining that it is poſſible enough, that he was ſo well borne, and had ſuche perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer neded any maſter: & though he had neded, they had rather attribute the honour of the inſtructing of this King vnto ſome other foreane perſon, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other ſaye, that Pythagoras the philoſopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, & well nighe fiue ages after him. Howbeit other ſaye, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who hauing wonne the pryſe of running at the games Olympicall, in the ſixtenth Olympiade, & the third yere of Numaes raigne) did come into ITALIE, where he kept much about Numa, & did aſſiſt & helpe him in the gouerning & ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many cuſtomes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the ROMAINES, which this ſecond Pythagoras was ſayed to haue taught him. Neuertheles it is not confeſſed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they ſaye are deſcended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for ſuche as will followe the rolle or table of thoſe, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue wonne the pryſes of games Olympicall: conſidering the rolle or table that they haue at this preſent, was very lately publiſhed by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reaſon or argument of neceſſitie, why it ſhould be taken for an vndoubted trothe, which he in that ſorte hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing thoſe things worthie

In what time Numa was. Cicero de Or. 2. & Tuſcul. 4. Liu. Halic. lib. 2.

Whether Pythagoras had any conuerſation with Numa.

Pythagoras the ſeconde, a Spartan borne, taught Numa, at Rome.

A thie of memorie, which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest. It was nowe sithence ROME was buylt, seuen and thirtie yeres (for so long time raigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifte of the moneth of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a solemne sacrifice without the cittie, neere to a certaine place commonly called, the goate marshe. As all the whole Senate, with the most parte of the people were present at this sacrifice, sodainely there rose in the ayer a very great tempest, and a maruelous darcke thicke clowde, which fell on the earthe with suche boysterous windes, stormes, lightnings, and thunder: that the poore common people being affrayed of so sore a tempest, dispersed them selues sodainely, running here and there for succour, and therewithall king Romulus vanished awaye in suche sorte, that he was neuer after seene alyue nor B dead. This brought the Senatours, and noble men whom they called Patricians, into great suspition. And there ranne a fowle tale among the common people, howe they had a long time borne very impacientlye to be subiects to a King, bicause them selues would haue had and taken vpon them some soueraine authoritie, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulus. Adding somewhat more vnto it, howe a litle before he had vsed them more roughely, and commaũded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quenche all these bruites and murmurings, by doing diuine honour and sacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the noblest men among them called Proclus came in, and by othe affirmed before all the people, that he sawe Romulus ascending vp into heauen, armed at all peces, and that he heard a voyce saye: C from thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeased, there sprange vp another trouble, to knowe whom they should choose in his place. For the straungers which were come then from other places to dwell in ROME, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne ROMAINES: in so muche, as the common people dyd not only wauer, and stagger vp and down in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many & of diuers nations) did enter into a suspition one of another. These things notwithstãding they all agreed in this, that of necessitie they must choose a King: howbeit in the rest they differed much, not only whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first founders and buylders of the cittie of ROME with Romulus, could in no wise abide, nor suffer, that the SABINES (to whom they had diuided parte of their landes, and a moytie of their cittie) should attempt D and presume to commaund them, whom they dyd receyue and associate into their company and felowshippe. The SABYNES alledged on thother side for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probabilitie. Which was, that neuer sence the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to raigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being nowe deceased, reason would that the newe king should be chosen of their nation. And that albeit the ROMAINES had receyued them into their cittie, they could not say therefore, that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckoned of in any thing, than them selues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increased their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserued the honour and title of a cittie. These were the causes of their contention. But E to preuent that of this contention there might growe no confusion in the cittie, if it should remaine without an head to commaund: the Senatours which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counsell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, should carie the royall state of the King, and all the showes and ornaments of his maiestie, and should doe the ordinarie sacrifices of the King, and dispatche all causes sixe howers in the daye, and sixe howers in the night, as the King before had vsed. Thus they thought it best to deuide the rule, that one might haue asmuch power as the other, aswell in respect of them selues, as also for regarde of the people. For they imagined, that the chaunging and remouing thus of this regall dignitie, and passing it from man to man, would clene take awaye enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly see, that in one, and the selfe same daye F and night, euery of them should be a King and priuate persone also. The ROMAINES call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would saye, rule for the time. Nowe albeit their gouernment was very modest and ciuill, yet they could not for all that keepe themselues from falling into the suspition, and slaunder of the people: who gaue it A out straight, that this was a fine deuise of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a fewe noble mens handes, to the ende that the whole authoritie and gouernment of all publicke causes, should remaine still in them selues, bicause it grieued them to be subiect to a King. And in the ende, the two partes of the cittie came to this agreement: that the one parte should choose one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This course they liked very well, aswell for the pacification of present sturre and dissention amongest them sel-ues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and sturring vp a likenes of goodwill in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen: whereby he should loue the one parte for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other parte for that he was of their nation. The SABYNES were the first, which referred the election to the ROMAINES choyse: and the ROMAINES B thought it better to chuse one of the nation of the SABYNES, then to haue a ROMAINE chosen by the SABYNES. After they had consulted, they determined amongest them selues: and Numa chosen King. did choose Numa Pompilius one of the bodye of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, howbeit he was a man so famous for his vertue, that the SABYNES so soone as they named him, did receyue him more willingly, then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their election, the first and chiefest persones of the one & the other side, were chosen out to goe vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius Numa borne in the cittie of Cures. Quirites why so called. was borne in one of the chiefest and best citties which the SABYNES had, called Cures, whereupon the ROMAINES, and their fellowes the SABYNES, were called afterwardes Quirites, and he was the sonne of Pomponius a noble man, the youngest of foure brethern: being by the se- C cret worcking of the goddes, borne on the very daye, on the which ROME was first founded by Romulus, which was the one and twenty daye of Aprill. This man being naturally geuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increase the same, by studie, and all kynde of good disci-

The life and manners of Numa before his raigne. pline: and by the exercise thereof, and of true pacience, and right philosophie, he did maruelously adorne him selfe and his manners. For he did not only clere his soule, and minde, of all passions and vices commonly vsed in the worlde: but he conquered in him selfe all heates, violence, & coue tousnes. And would neither seeke nor vsurpe, that which was an other mans, a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people: but thought that to be the true, and right victorie in man, first to conquer and commaund him selfe by iudgement & reason, & then to subdue all couetousnes & greedines. Hauing therfore this opinion, he would in D no wise haue in his house any superfluity or finenes. He became to euery man that would employe him (aswell straunger as his owne countrie man) a wise coũsaillour, & an vpright iudge.
He bestowed his leysure, not to followe his owne delight, or to gather goods together: but to serue the goddes, & to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason & vn-derstãding could cõprehend. Thereby he got so great a name & reputation, that Tatius (which was king of ROME with Romulus) hauing but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his Tatia the wife of Numa. sonne in law. Howbeit this mariage put him in no such iolity, that he would dwel at ROME with his father in lawe, but rather kept at home at his own house in the countrie of the SABYNES, there to serue & cherish his olde father with his wife Tatia: who for her parte also liked better, to liue quietly with her husbãd being a priuate mã, then to goe to ROME where she might haue E liued in much honour and glorie, by meanes of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeres after she was maried. After her deathe, Numa leauing to dwell in the cittie, was better contẽted to liue in the country alone, & solitarie, & gaue him self to walke much in the fields & woddes consecrated to the godds, as one desirous to leade alone life, farre from the cõpanie of men. Wherupon was raised (in my opiniõ) that which is spoken of him, & of the goddesse Ege-
ria. That it was not for any straunge nes, or melancholines of nature, that Numa withdrew him self from the cõuersation & cõpany of men, but bicause he had found another more honorable Numa conuersant with the goddesse Egeria. & holy society of the Nymphe, & goddesse Egeria, who had done him, as they saye, that honour, as to make him her husbãd: with whõ as his beloued darling it is sayed he enioyed happy dayes, F & by dayly frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the loue & knowledge of all celestiall things. Surely, these deuises are much like vnto certain old fables of the Phrygiãs, which they hauing learned from the father to the sonne, doe loue to tell of one Atis: of the Bithynians, of one

A of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: and of many other ſuch like men, who in their liues were taken for ſaynctes, and beloued of the goddes. Notwithſtanding, it is likely, that the goddes loue neither birdes, nor horſe, but men, and haue ſometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and doe not diſdaine ſometime the conuerſation of ſuche as be holye, religious, and deuoute. But to beleeue the goddes haue carnall knowledge, and doe delight in the outward beawtie of creatures, that ſeemeth to carie a very harde beliefe. Yet the wiſe EGYPTIANS thincke it probable enough and likely, that the ſpirite of the goddes hath geuen originall of generation to women, and doe beget fruite of their bodies: howbeit they holde that a man can haue no corporall companie with any diuine nature. Wherein they doe not cõſider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like ſubſtaũce, to that

B wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithſtanding, it is mete we ſhould beleeue the godds beare good will to men, and that of it doth ſpring their loue, whereby men ſaye the goddes loue thoſe whoſe manners they purifie, and inſpire with vertue. And they doe not offende, which ſayne that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were ſometimes the louers of Apollo, and alſo Hippolytus the SICYONIAN: of whom they reporte, that euer when he paſſed ouer the arme of the ſea which lieth betweene the cities of SICYONA, and of GIRRHA, the god which knewe he came, reioyced, and cauſed Pythia the propheteſſe to pronounce theſe heroycall verſes,

It is ſayd alſo that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verſes, and that the goddes honored

C the poets Heſiodus, & Archilocus, after their death by the Muſes. They ſaye moreouer, that Æſculapius laye with Sophocles in his life time, and at this daye they doe yet ſhowe many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honorably buried. Nowe if they graunte, that ſuch things maye be true: how can we refuſe to beleeue, that ſome goddes haue bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroaſtres, Lycurgus, Numa, and ſuch other like perſonages, which haue gouerned kingdomes, & ſtabliſhed common weales? and it is not vnlike that the goddes in deede dyd company with them, to inſpire and teache them many notable things, and that they did drawe neere vnto theſe Poets, & players of the harpe, that made and played many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the leaſt for their ſporte and pleaſure onely, if euer they came neere them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the waye is open and

D large as Bacchylides ſayed, to thincke and ſaye as he luſt. For my ſelfe I doe finde, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other ſuche perſones, not to be without likelyhood and probabilitie: who hauing to gouerne rude, churliſhe, & ſtiffe necked people, and purpoſing to bring in ſtraunge nouelties into the gouernments of their countries, did fayne wiſely to haue conference with the godds, conſidering this fayning fell to be profitable & beneficiall to thoſe themſelues, whom they made to beleeue the ſame. But to returne to our hiſtorie. Numa was fourty yeres olde, when the ambaſſadours of ROME were ſent to preſent the Kingdome vnto him, & to intreate him to accept thereof. Proclus, and Veleſus, were the ambaſſadours that were ſent. But contrarely it was in deede a very hard thing, & required great perſuaſions, & much intreatie, to moue a man which had allwayes liued quietly, & at eaſe, to accept the regiment of a cittie, which as a man would ſaye, had bene rayſed vp and growen by warres, and martiall dedes. Wherfore he aunſwered them in the preſence of his father, and one other of his kinſemen called Martius in this ſorte. Chaunge & alteration of mans life is euer daungerous: but for him that lacketh nothing neceſſarie, nor hath cauſe to cõplaine of his preſent ſtate, it is a great follie to leaue his olde acquainted trade of life, & to enter into another newe and vnknowen, if there were no other but this only reſpect: that he leaueth a certainnie, to venter vpon an vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the daũgers & perills of this kingdom which

F they offer me, are not altogether vncertain, if we wil looke backe what happened vnto Romulus, Who was not vnſuſpected to haue layed waite, to haue had Tatius his fellow & cõpanion murdered: & now after Romulus death, the Senatours ſelues are miſtruſted to haue killed him on the other side by treason. And yet they saye it, and singe it euery where: that Romulus was the sonne of a god, that at his birthe he was miraculously preserued, and afterwardes he was as incredible brought vp. Whereas for my owne parte, I doe confesse, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men as you knowe: and these fewe qualities which they prayse & commend in me, are conditions farre vnmeete for a man that is to raigne. I euer loued a solitarie life, quiet and studie, and did exempt myselfe from worldly causes. All my life time I haue sought and loued peace aboue all things, and neuer had to doe with any warres. My conuersation hath bene to companie with men, which meete only to serue & honour the goddes, or to laughe and be merie one with another, or els to spende their time in their priuate affayers, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMAINE lordes) hath left you many warres begonne, which peraduenture you could be contented to spare: yet now to mainteine the same, your citie had neede of a martiall King, actiue, & strong of bodye. Your people moreouer, through long custome, and the great increase they are geuen vnto by feates of armes, desire nought els perhappes but warres: and it is plainely seene, they seeke still to growe, and commaund their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a mere mockerie for me, to goe to teache a cittie at this present to serue the goddes, to loue iustice, to hate warres, and to flye violence: when it rather hath neede of a conquering captaine, then of a peaceable King. These and suche other like reasons and persuasions Numa alleaged, to discharge him selfe of the Kingdome which they offred him. Howbeit the ambassadours of the ROMAINES most humbly besought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he would not be the cause of another newe sturre, and commotion among them, seeing both partes in the cittie haue geuen their consent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreouer, when the ambassadours had left him vpon this sute, his father, and Martius his kinseman, beganne also priuately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer than he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glorie, bicause he sought only most famous vertue: yet he must needes thincke, that to rule well, was to doe the goddes good seruice, whose will it was to employe the iustice they knewe in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (q they) this royall dignitie, which to a graue and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable workes and fruites. There you maye doe noble seruice to the godds, to humble the hearties of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readely turne, and easely conforme them selues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a straunger: they haue consecrated a memorie to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this daye. And it maye be, that the people seeing them selues conquerers, will be full enough of warres: and the ROMAINES being nowe full of spoyles & triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth iustice, that they maye thenceforth liue in peace, vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hartes be still full of heate and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their desire to make warres some other waye, when a man hathe the bridle in his owne handes to doe it, and to be a meane in the meane time to ioyne the countrie, and all the nation of the SABINES, in perpetuall loue and amitie, with so mighty and florishing a cittie? besides all these persuasions and reasons, there were many signes also (as they saye) which promised him good lucke, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne countrie cittizens. Who, so soone as they vnderstoode the coming, and commission of the ambassadours of ROME, they importunately desired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the ROMAINES. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done sacrifice to the goddes, he set forwardes on his iourney towardes ROME: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entrie, went blessing of him, and singing of his prayses. They dyd sacrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to be as ioyfull and glad: as if a newe Realme, and not a newe Kinge, had bene come to the cittie of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open ioye,

A and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignitie of the King. But he him selfe commaunded they should be stayed a while, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the goddes. Then he tooke the wise men & priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which that time was yet called mounte Tarpeian. And there, the chiefest of the soothesayers called Augures, turned him towardes the southe, hauing his face couered with a veyle, and stoode behinde him, laying his right hande vpon his heade, and praying to the goddes that it would please them to declare their willes by flying of birdes, or some other token concerning this election: and so the soothesayer cast his eyes all

B about, as farre as he could possiblie discerne. During all this time there was a maruelous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were assembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the issue of this diuination would be: vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hande, good and lucky birdes, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mounte Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receyued him with wonderfull showtes of ioye, as a man the most holy, and best beloued of the goddes that they could haue chosen. So hauing taken the royall seate of the Kingdome, his first acte was this. That he discharged the garde of the three hundred souldiers, which Romulus had allwayes about his persone, called Celeres: saying, he would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which

The garde of Celeres discharged by Numa.

C should mistrust him. His second acte was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter & Mars, a thirde, in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the auncient ROMAINES also called their priests, instituted in the olde time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrowe hattes which they did weare on their heades, as if they had called them Pilamines: for

Pilos in Greeke signifieth a hatte. And at that time (as they saye) there were many moe Greeke wordes mingled with the Latine, then there are at this daye. For they called the mantells the Kings did weare Lænas. And Iuba sayeth that it is the very same which the GRECIANS call Chlænas, and that the younge boye which was a seruaunte in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercurie, bicause he is seruaunt of the godds. Now Numa hauing done these things at his first entrie into his Kingdome, still to winne

D further fauour and goodwill of the people: beganne immediately to frame his cittizens to a certaine ciuilitie, being as iron wrought to softenes, and brought them from their violent and warlike desires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, ROME was properly that, which Plato ascribeth to a cittie full of trouble and pryde. For, first it was founded by the most coragious and warlike men of the worlde, which from all partes were gathered there together, in a most desperate boldnes: and afterwards it increased, and grewe strong, by armes and continuall warres, like as pyles driuen into the grounde, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and sticke the faster. Wherefore Numa iudging it no small nor light enterprise, to plucke downe the hawty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sobre and quiet life: dyd seeme to worcke it by meanes of the goddes, with drawing

E them on thereto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their whotte and fierce corages to fight, with sacrifices, feastes, dauncings, and common processions, wherein he celebrated euer him selfe. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled nowe and then, pastime and pleasure: and sometimes he layed the terrour and feare of the goddes before their eyes, making them beleeue that he had seene straunge visions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the goddes dyd threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, allwayes to pull downe and humble their heartes, vnto the feare of the goddes. This was the cause why they thought afterwardes that he had learned his wisdome of Pythagoras the philosopher: bicause the greatest parte of the philosophie of the one, and of the gouernment of the other, consisted in suche ceremonies, and diuine studies. They reporte also that Numa dyd put on Numa and Pythagoras institutions muche a like.

F the outwarde showe and semblaunce of Pythagoras holines, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they saye, made an eagle so tame and gentle, that she would stoupe, and come downe to him by certaine voyces, as she flewe in the ayer ouer his head. And that passing through the assembly of the games Olympicall, he shewed her thighe of golde, and many other prety feates and deedes they tell of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him:

Pythagoras vvhich loued to dvvell in dignitie, and had an harte to glorie bent, and past in pollecie, Muche like a man vvhich sought, by charming to enchaunte, did vse this arte, to vvinne mens mindes, vvhich vnto him did haunte.
His graue and pleasaunt tongue, in sugred speache did flovve, vvhereby he drevve most mindes of men, to bent of his ovvne bovve.

Euen so the fayned fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the loue of a goddesse, or some Nymphe of the mountaine: with whom he seemed to haue certaine secret meetings and talke, whereof we haue spoken before. And it is sayed he muche frequented the Muses in the woddes. For he would saye, he had the most parte of his reuelations of the Muses, and he taught the ROMAINES to reuerence one of them aboue all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would saye, ladye silence. It seemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did so specially commaund, and recomend silence vnto his schollers. Againe, if we consider what Numa ordeined concerning images, and the representation of the goddes, it is alltogether agreable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that god was neither sensible, nor mortall, but inuisible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa dyd forbid the ROMAINES also to beleeue, that god had euer forme, or likenes of beast or man. So that in those former times, there was in ROME no image of god, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred three score & tenne yeres, that they had buylt temples & chappels vnto the godds in ROME, and yet there was neither picture nor image of god within them. For they tooke it at the first for a sacriledge, to present heauenly things by earthely formes: seeing we cannot possibly any waye attaine to the knowledge of god, but in minde and vnderstanding. The very sacrifices which Numa ordeined, were altogether agreable, & like vnto the manner of seruing of the goddes, which the Pythagorians vsed. For in their sacrifices they spilt not the bloude, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle sheading of wine and milke, and with suche other light things. Suche as affirme that those two men did much company and were famillier together, doe laye further proofes & arguments for the same. The first is this: That the ROMAINES did make Pythagoras a free man of the cittie of ROME, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an auncient writer (and sometimes one of Pythagoras schollers) sayeth in a booke he wrote & dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: That Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras sonnes name, from whom they saye is discended, the house of the Æmylians, which is the noblest of the Patricians: for the King gaue him the surname of Æmylius, bicause of his sweete tongue and pleasaunt voyce. Furthermore, I my self haue heard saye many times in ROME, that the ROMAINES hauing receyued an oracle, which commaunded them to set vp images in their cittie, to the wisest and valliantest man that euer was amongest the GRECIANS: caused two statues of brasse to be set vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to striue about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubtes: me thincketh it were but vaine. Moreouer, they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the colledge pontificall: and saye he him selfe was the first Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, some will saye they were so called, bicause they chiefly were ordeined & appointed for the seruice of the almightie: for this worde Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mightie. Other thincke this name was geuen to them by their founders, as to exempt persones out of the worlde: who enioyned them to doe all the seruice and sacrifices to the goddes they could possibly, & yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most parte doe bring out another deriuation of this name, wherein me thinckes there is litle reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, bicause they had the charge of maintenaunce of the bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to saye truely, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the bishoppes: aswell as the keeping of the most holy and

A and vnchaungeable ceremonies. For the Romaines thought it not only a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a moſt damnable & wicked acte, to deſtroye or breake the bridge of wodde, which was only ioyned together (as they ſaye) with pinnes of wodde, & without any iron at all, by the commaundement of an olde oracle. But the ſtone bridge was buylt long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephewe Martius. Nowe the firſt and chiefeſt of theſe biſhoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the highe prieſte and maſter, of their pontificall lawe: who ſhould be carefull, not only about all publicke ſacrifices and ceremonies, but alſo about ſuche as were priuate, and to ſee that no man priuately ſhould breake the auncient ceremonies, nor bring in any newe thing into religion, but rather euery man ſhould be taught by him, how, and after what ſorte he ſhould ſerue B and honour the goddes. He alſo hath the keping of the holy virgines which they call Veſtales. For they doe geue Numa the firſt foundation and conſecrating of them, and the inſtitution alſo of keeping the immortall fire with honour and reuerence, which theſe virgines haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the ſubſtaunce of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the cuſtodie of cleane and vncorrupt maydes: or els bicauſe he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fitteſt, and moſt proper vnto virgines. For in Greece, where they kept continuall fire likewiſe (as in the temple of Apollo in Delphes, and at Athens) the maydens doe not keepe the ſame, but olde women which are paſt mariage. And if this fire chaunce to faile, as they ſaye in Athens the holy lampe was put out in the time of the tyrannie of Ariſtion: and in the cittie of Delphes it was put out, C when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the Medes: and at Rome alſo, in the time of the warres that the Romaines had againſt king Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and conſumed together: they ſaye that it muſt not be lighted againe with other common fire, but muſt be made a newe, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the ſunne, and that they doe in this manner. They haue a hollowe veſſell made of a pece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two ſides a like: ſo that from all partes of his compaſſe and circumference, it falleth into one pointe. Then they ſet this veſſell right againſt the beames of the ſunne, ſo that the bright ſunne beames come to aſſemble and gather together in the center of this veſſell, where they doe pearce the ayer ſo ſtrongely, that they ſet it a fire: & when they put to it any drye matter or ſubſtaunce, the fire taketh it ſtraight, D bicauſe the beame of the ſunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drye matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thincke that theſe Veſtall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other ſaye, there are other holy thinges alſo, which no bodie maye lawfully ſee but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the leaſt ſo much as maye be learned and tolde. The firſt maydens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they ſaye) Gegania, and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwardes king Seruius increaſed the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vntill this daye. Their rule and order ſet downe by king Numa was this: that they ſhould vowe chaſtitie for the ſpace of thirtie yeres. In the firſt tenne yeres they learne what they haue to doe: the next tenne yeres following, they doe that which they haue E learned: & the laſt tenne yeres, they teache young nouices. After they haue paſſed their thirtie yeres, they maye lawfully marie if they be diſpoſed, and take them to another manner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very fewe of them which haue taken this libertie, and fewer alſo which haue ioyed after they were profeſſed, but rather haue repented them ſelues, and liued euer after a very grieuous and ſorowfull life. This did ſo fraye the other Veſtalls, that they were better contented with their vowed chaſtitie: and ſo remained virgines, vntill they were olde, or els died. He gaue them alſo great priuiledges, and prerogatiues. As: to make their will and teſtament, in their fathers life time. To doe all things without any gardian or ouerſeer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they goe abroade, they carie maces before them to honour them. And if by chaunce they meete F any offendour in their waye, going to execution, they ſaue his life: howbeit the profeſſed Veſtall muſt affirme by othe, that ſhe met him vnwares, & not of ſet purpoſe. If any man preſume vnder their chayer, whereupō they are caried through the cittie, he ſhall die for it. Alſowhen

they them selues doe any faulte, they are corrected by the great byshoppe, who somtimes doth whippe them naked (according to the nature and qualitie of their offence) in a darcke place, & vnder a curtē. But she that hath deflowred her virginity, is buried quicke by one of the gates of the cittie, which they call Collina gate: where within the cittie there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the LATINES is sayed to be raised. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollowe vawte, and leaue a hole open, whereby one maye goe downe: and with in it there is set a litle bed, a burning lampe, and some vitells to susteine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honours sake: to the ende they would not be thought to famishe a bodie to deathe, which had bene consecrated by the most holy and deuoute ceremonies of the worlde. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer strongely, and close it vp with thicke leather in suche sorte, that no bodie canne so much as heare her voyce, & so they carie her thus shut vp through the market place. Euery one draweth backe, when they see this litter a farre of, and doe geue it place to passe by: & then follow it mourningly, with heauy lookes, & speake neuer a word. They doe nothing in the citie more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any daye wherein the people are more sorowful, then on such a daye. Then after she is come to the place of this vawte, the sergeants straight vnlose these fast bounde couerings: and the chiefe byshoppe after he hath made certen secret prayers vnto the godds, and lift his handes vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Vestall muffled vp close, and so putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawte. That done, he withdraweth, and all the priestes with him: and when the seely offendour is gone downe, they straight plucke vp the ladder, & cast abounddaunce of earthe in at the open hole, so that they fill it vp to the very toppe of the arche. And this is the punishment of the Vestalls which defile their virginitie. They thincke also it was Numa that buylt the round temple of the goddesse Vesta, in which is kept the euerlasting fire: meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which they saye is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middest whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, and name it the vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmoueable, not yet that it is set in the middest of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but saye to the contrarie, that the earth hanged in the ayer about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they graunte, that the earth is one of the first and chiefest partes of the world: as Plato helde opinion in that age, that the earthe was in another place then in the very middest, and that the center of the world, as the most honorableste place, did apperteine to some other of more worthy substaunce than the earthe. Furthermore, the byshoppes office was to show those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burialles, but rather it was to worshippe & honour the godds of the earthe, with vsuall and honorable ceremonies, as those which after their death receyue the chiefest seruice of vs that they canne. But aboue all other in burialles, they did specially honour the goddesse called Libitina, that is sayed, the chiefe gouernour and preseruer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proserpina, or Venus, as the most learned men among the ROMAINES doe iudge, who not without cause doe attribute the order of the beginning and ende of mans life, to one self god, & power diuine. Numa ordained also, how long time euery bodie should mourne in blackes. And for a childe from three yeres to tenne yeres of age, that died: he ordeined they should mourne no more monethes then it had liued yeres, and not to adde a daye more. For he commaunded, that the longest time of mourning should be but then moneths onely, and so long time at the least he willed women should remaine widdowes, after the decease of their husbands: or els she that would marie within that time, was bounde by his order to sacrifice a whole bullocke. Numa also erected many other orders of priestes: of two sortes whereof I will only make mention. The one shalbe the order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES: for me thinckes, both the one and the other doth manifestly showe the great holines, and singular deuotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly those, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would saye, peacekeepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, bicause they dyd

A did pacifie quarells with reaſon by waye of order, and did not ſuffer (as much as in them laye) that any matter ſhould be tried by violence, vntill they were paſt all hope of any peace. For the GRECIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuerſie with reaſon, and not with ſworde. Euen ſo thoſe which the ROMAINES called the Feciales, went many times in perſone to thoſe that dyd the ROMAINES iniurie, and ſought to perſuade them with good reaſon, to keepe promiſe with the ROMAINES, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeld to reaſon, whom they ſought to perſuade: then they called the goddes to the witnes thereof, and prayed them, that if they dyd not moſt earneſtly incenſe the ROMAINES, to purſue that moſt iuſtely apperteined vnto their right, that all euills and miſchieues of the warres might fall vpon them ſelues, and on their countrie. This done, they dyd

B threaten open warres againſt ſuch enemies. And if the FECIALES would not cõſent to open warres, and dyd happen to ſpeake againſt them: it was not lawfull in that caſe, neither for priuate perſone, nor for the King him ſelfe to make any warres. But like a iuſt prince, he muſt haue leaue by their ſufferance to make the warres. Then dyd he cõſider, & conſult, by what meanes he might beſt procure, & proſecute the ſame. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the ill happe which came to the ROMAINES, when the cittie of ROME was taken and ſacked by the GAVLES, chaunced iuſtely for breaking of this holy inſtitution. For at that time, the barbarous people beſieged the cittie of the CLVSINIANS: and Fabius Ambuſtus was ſent ambaſſadour vnto them, to ſee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill aunſwer: whereupon Fabius thincking his embaſie had bene ended, and being ſom-

Fortune fauored him in this chalẽge: for he ſlew the GAVLE, and ſtripped him in the fielde. The GAVLES ſeeing their man ſlayne, ſent immediately an heraulde to ROME, to accuſe Fabius, howe againſt all right and reaſon, he beganne warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then conſulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the handes of the GAVLES, as one that had broken the lawe of armes, & had deſerued it: but he made friends to the people which fauored him very much, & by their meanes eſcaped his deliuerie, and puniſhment. wer: which they tooke, ſacked, and burnt euery whit, ſauing the Capitoll, as we haue written

D more amplie in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Prieſtes that were called Salij, they ſaye he dyd inſtitute them vpon this occaſion. In the eight yere of his reigne, there came a peſtilent diſeaſe through all ITALIE, and at the length it crept alſo into ROME. Whereat euery man being greatly affrayed, and diſcoraged, they ſaye there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the handes of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King him ſelfe affirmed he heard, of the Nymphe Egeria, and the Muſes. To wit, that this target was ſent from heauen, for the health and preſeruation of the cittie: and therefore he ſhould keepe it carefully, and cauſe eleuen other to be caſt and made, all like vnto the ſame in facion and greatnes, to the ende, that if any would enterpriſe to ſteale it, he ſhould not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he ſaid, he was commaunded to conſe-

E crate the place to the Muſes (in the which he dyd oftentimes companie with them) and alſo the fieldes which were neere thereabouts: and likewiſe to geue the fountaine that ſprange in that place, vnto the Veſtalls profeſſed, that euery daye they might drawe water at that well, to waſhe the ſanctuarie of their temple. The ſucceſſe hereof proued his words true, for the ſicknes ceaſed incontinently. So he aſſembled all the chief craftes men then in ROME, to proue which of them would take vpõ him to make one like vnto that. Euery man deſpayred to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellenteſt workeman that was in thoſe dayes) dyd make them all ſo ſute like, that Numa him ſelfe dyd not knowe the firſt target, when they were all layed together. So he ordeined theſe prieſts Salij, to haue the cuſtodie of theſe targets, to ſee them ſafe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of a SALIAN borne in SAMO-

Whereof they were called Salij.

F THRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as ſome haue vntruely alleaged, who firſt inuẽted the manner of dauncing all armed: but they were ſo called, of their facion and manner of dauncing, and leaping. For in the moneth of Marche, they goe skipping and leaping vp and downe the cittie, with thoſe targetes on their armes, apparelled in red caſſockes without ſleues, and girded about with broade leather ſworde girdells, ſtudded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads, & ſtriking vpon their targets with ſhorte daggers, which they carie in their hands. Moreouer, all their dauncing conſiſteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making tornes aboue ground and beneath, with a ſodaine meaſure, & a maruelous force of agilitie. They call theſe targets Ancylia, bicauſe of their facion, which is not altogether compaſſe: for they are not all round as other cõmon targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the endes bowing in many foldes, and one ſo neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or els they are ſo called, bicauſe Ancon ſignifieth an elbow, vpon which they carie them. All theſe deriuations are written in the hiſtorie of Iuba, who in any caſe will haue this word Ancylia to be drawen out of the Greeke tongue. And it maye be alſo they were ſo called, bicauſe the firſt came from aboue, which the GRECIANS call Anecathen: or els for healing the ſicke, which is called Aceſis. Or els for ceaſing of the drines, which in Greke is called, Anchmõn Lyſis. Or for the ending of all diſeaſes and euills, for which cauſe the ATHENIANS call Caſtor and Pollux, Anacas: if they luſt to geue this word his deriuation from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldſmithe had for the making of theſe targets was, that the Salij vnto this daye doe make mention of him, in their ſonge, which they ſinge going through the cittie, & dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit ſome thincke they ſaye not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, auncient memorie. But Numa after he had ordeined and inſtituted theſe orders of prieſts, built his palace neere vnto the temple of Veſta, which holdeth his name Regia at this daye, to ſaye, the Kings palace. In which he remained moſt part of his life, ſtudying either to ſacrifice to the goddes, or to teache the Prieſtes what they ſhould doe, or howe with them he ſhould beſt contẽplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another houſe on the hill, which they call at this daye, Quirinall, the place whereof is yet to be ſeene. But in all theſe ſacrifices, ceremonies, and proceſſions of the Prieſtes, there were allwayes huſſhers that went before, crying to the people, kepe ſilence, and tend vpon diuine ſeruice. For they ſaye the Pythagorians thought it good, that men ſhould not worſhippe the godds, nor make prayers to them in paſſing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it mete, that men ſhould of purpoſe goe out of their houſes, to ſerue & praye vnto them. Euen ſo king Numa thought it not meete, that his ſubiects ſhould come to ſee, and heare diuine ſeruice negligently, as it were for a facion, and only to be ryd of it, as heeding an other thing: but he would haue them ſet a ſide all other buſines, and employ their thoughts & harts only vpon the principall ſeruice of religion, & deuotion towards the godds. So that during ſeruice time, he would not haue heard any noiſe, any knocking, boũſing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all artificers ſhoppes of occupation, whereof at this daye yet they ſee ſome ſignes, and tokens, remaining in their ſacrifices at ROME. For all the time the Augure beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any ſacrifice, the vergers crie alowde: Hoc age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to thoſe that are preſent, to call their wittes home, & to thincke on that which is in hand. Alſo there are many of his orders like the preceptes of the Pythagorians. For as they dyd warne men, not to ſit vpon a litle buſſhell, not to cut fire with a ſword, not to looke behinde them when they goe abroade: to ſacrifice to the celeſtiall godds in an odde number, and to the goddes of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts, they would not haue the common people to haue any knowledge or vnderſtãding. Euen ſo there are many inſtitutions of Numa, the reaſons whereof are hidden and kept ſecret: as not to offer wine to the godds of the vine neuer cut, & not to ſacrifice vnto them without meale: & to turne a turne about when they doe reuerence to the godds, & to ſit down after they haue worſhipped them. And as touching the two firſt ordinances, it ſeemeth that by them he did recõmend clemẽcy, & humanity, as being a parte of the deuotion towards the godds. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make, that worſhippe the goddes: they ſaye it repreſenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thincketh it ſhould rather come of this: for that the tẽples being ſet to the eaſt, he that worſhippeth entring into the tẽple, ſheweth his backe to the Weſt, & for this cauſe turneth towardes that parte, & afterwards returneth againe towards god: doing the whole turne, & ending the conſummation

And therfore, that we ſhould take it thankfully, & paciẽtly beare it, in what ſorte ſoeuer it pleaſed god to chaunge or alter our life. And where he cõmaunded that they ſhould ſit after they had worſhipped god: they ſayed it was a token of a good hope vnto them that prayed, that their prayers ſhould be exalted, and that their goods ſhould remaine ſafe, & ſticke by thẽ. Other ſaye, that this eaſe & ſitting, is a ſeparating thẽ frõ doing: & therfore he would they ſhould ſit in the tẽples of the godds, to ſhew they had done that which they had in hãd before, to the end to take of the godds the beginning

B of another. And it maye well be alſo, that it was referred to the thing we ſpake of a litle before. That Numa would accuſtome his people, not to ſerue the godds, nor to ſpeake to them at all, as they paſſed by, or did any other thing, or were in haſte: but would haue them praye vnto the godds when they had time & leyſure, & all other buſines at that time ſet a parte. By this good inſtruction & training them vnto religion, the cittie of ROME by litle & litle came to be ſo tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in ſuch admiratiõ: that they tooke all to be as true as the goſpell that he ſpake, though it had no more likelyhood of trothe, then tales deuiſed of pleaſure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpoſſible to him, if he would haue it. And for proofe hereof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the cittizens of ROME to come & ſuppe with him, cauſed them to be ſerued with plaine groſſe

C meate, & in very poore & homely veſſell. And when they were ſet, and beganne to fall to their meate, he caſt out words ſodainely vnto them, how the goddeſſe with whom he accõpanied, was come to ſee him euen at that inſtant, & that ſodainely the hall was richely furniſhed, & the tables couered with all ſortes of excellent fine & delicate meates. Howbeit this farte paſſed all the vanity of lying, which is foũd written of him, about his ſpeaking with Iupiter. The hill Auẽtine was not at that time inhabited, nor incloſed within the walles of ROME, but was full of ſprings & ſhadowed groues, whether cõmonly repaired to ſolace them ſelues, the two godds, Picus & Faunus, which otherwiſe might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanes: ſauing it is ſayed, that they went through all ITALIE, doing the like miracles & wõders in phiſycke, charmes & arte magike, which they reporte of thoſe the GREKIANS call Idees Dactyles.

D There they ſaye that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the ſpring both wine & honnie, where they vſed to drinke. Whẽ they ſaw that they were taken, they trãſformed thẽ ſelues into diuers forms, diſguiſing & diſfiguring their naturall ſhape, into many terrible & feareful ſights to behold. Neuertheles in the end, perceiuing they were ſo faſt, as to eſcape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, & taught him the purifying againſt lightning & thunder, which they make yet at this daye with onĩõs, heare, & pilchers. Other ſaye, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauen, with their coniuring & magicke: whereat Iupiter being offended, anſwered in choller, that he ſhould make it with heads. But Numa added ſtraight, of onĩõs: Iupiter replied, of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the cruelty of the cõmaundement. What beares? Iupiter anſwered, quicke

E hears. And Numa put to pilchers alſo. And it is reported that this was the goddeſſe Egeria, that taught Numa this ſubtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeaſed by reaſon wherof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth appeaſed, & fauorable: & this purifying was afterwards made in that ſorte. Theſe tales not onely vayne, but full of mockerie alſo, doe ſhow vs yet plainely the zeale & deuotion men had in thoſe times towards the godds: vnto which Numa through cuſtome had wõne them. And as for Numa him ſelf, they ſaye that he ſo firmely put all his hope & confidẽce in the helpe of the godds: that one daye when he was told his enemies were in armes againſt him, he did but laugh at it, & anſwered, And I doe ſacrifice. It is he (as ſome ſaye) that firſt built a temple to Faith & Terme: & which made the ROMAINES vnderſtand, that the moſt holy & greateſt othe they could make, was to ſweare by their faith,

F which they kepe yet at this daye. But Terme, which ſignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they doe ſacrifice, both publickly & priuately, vpon the limites of inheritaunces, & now they ſacrifice vnto him liue beaſts. Howbeit in old time they did ſacrifice vnto him without any bloude, through the wise institution of Numa: who declared & preached vnto them, that this god of bounds was syncere, & vpright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witnes of iustice, & a keper of peace. It was he, which in my opiniō, did first limit out the boūds of the territorie of Rome: which Romulus would neuer doe, for feare least in bounding out his owne, he should confesse that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & mearing, to him that will keepe it iustely: is a bond that brideleth power & desire. But to him that forceth not to kepe it: it is a proofe to shew his iniustice. To saye truely, the territories of Rome had no great bounds at the first beginning, & Romulus had got by cōqueste the greateste parte of it, & Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the nedie inhabitās to releue thē, & to bring them out of pouerty: (which carieth men hedlōg into mischief, & discourageth them to labour) to the end that plowing vp the said lande, they should also plowe vp the weedes of their own barrēnes, to become ciuill & gentle. For there is no exercise nor occupation in the world, which so sodainely bringeth a man, to loue & desire quietnes, as doth husbādrie & tillage: & yet to defend a mans own, there is in it corage & hardines to fight. But greedy desire, violētly to take from others, & vniustely to occupie that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbādmen. And therfore Numa hauing brought in husbandrie amōgest his subiects, as a medecine & meane to make them loue quietnes: was desirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble & gētle of condition, then to increase them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of Rome into certen parts which he called Pagos: as much to saye, as villages. And in euery one of them he ordeined controllers & visiters, which should suruey all about: & he him self somtimes went abroade in persone, cōiecturing by their labour the māners & nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent, he aduaunced them vnto honour, & gaue them countenaūce & authoritie: other which he sawe slowthfull & negligent, by rebuking & reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongest all his ordinaunces which he made, one aboue all the rest caried the praise: and that was, that he deuided his people into sundrie occupatiōs. For the cittie of Rome seemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue sayed before: and to speake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impossible to take away all factions, & to make there should be no quarrells nor contentions betwene both parts. Wherefore he considered, that when one will mingle two bodies or simples together, which for their hardnes & cōtrarie natures cannot well suffer mixture: then he breaks & beates them together, as small as may be. For, so being brought into a smaller & lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to deuide the people also into many small partes: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more easely take away the first & the greateste parte, when it should be deuided & separated thus into sundrie sorts. And this diuision he made by arts & occupatiōs: as minstrells, goldsmiths, carpinters, diers, shoemakers, tawers, tāners, bell foūders, & pot makers, & so forth through other craftes & occupations. So that he brought euery one of these into one bodie, & cōpanie by it self: & ordeined vnto euery particular mysterie or crafte, their feasts, assemblies, & seruices, which they should make vnto the godds, according to the dignitie & worthines of euery occupatiō. And by this meanes, he first tooke away all faction: that neither side sayed, nor thought any more, those are Sabynes, these are Romaines, these are of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Insomuch as this diuision was an incorporating, & an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinaūces, they did much cōmend his reforming of the law, that gaue libertie vnto fathers to sell their childrē. For he did except childrē already maried, so they were maried with their fathers consent & goodwill: iudging it to be to cruell & ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had maried a free man, should finde her self to be the wife of a bond mā. He begāne also to mende a litle the calender, not so exactly as he should haue done, nor yet altogether ignorātly. For during the raigne of Romulus, they vsed the moneths cōfusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them twenty dayes & lesse, and others fiue & thirtie dayes & more, without knowing the differēce betwene the course of the sunne & the moone: & only they obserued this rule, that there was three hūdred & three score dayes in the yere. But Numa considering the inequality stoode vpon eleuen dayes, for that the 12 reuolutiōs of the moone are ronne in 300. fiftie & foure dayes, & the reuolution of the sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled the

A the 11. dayes, wherof he made a moneth: which he placed frō 2. yeres to 2. yeres, after the moneth of February, & the ROMAINES called this moneth put betwene, Mercidinum, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correctiō that Numa made, which since hath had a farre better amēdment. He did also chaunge the order of the moneths. For Marche which before was the first, he made it now the third: & Ianuary the first, which vnder Romulus was the 11. & February the 12. & last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two, Ianuary & February. For the ROMAINES at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yere. And the ARCADIANS amongest the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yere. The ACARNANIANS haue sixe to the yere. And the EGYPTIANS had first but one moneth to their yere: & afterwards they made foure moneths for their B yere. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabite in a new coūtrie) to be neuertheles the auncientest people of the world: for that in their chronicles they reckon vp such infinite nūber of yeres, as those which counte the moneths for the yeres. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere, and not twelue: it is easely to be iudged by the name of the last, which they call at this daye Decēber. And that the moneth of Marche was also the first, maye be coniectured by this: for the fift moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the 6. Sextilis, & so the other in order following the nūbers. For if Ianuary & February had then bene the first, of necessitie the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, must haue bene named Septēber: considering also that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordeined to be the first. The second was A-C prill: so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to saye Venus, vnto whom they make open sacrifice in this moneth. And on the first daye of the same, women doe washe them selues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heades. Howbeit some other saye, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was only called Aprilis, bicause then is the chiefest force & strength of the spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seedes of plants and erbes beginne to bud & showe forth, which the word it selfe doth signifie. The moneth following next after that, is called Maye: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercurie, vnto whom the moneth is cōsecrated. *The moneth of Iune is so called also, bicause of the quality of that season, which is as the youthe of the yere. Although some will saye, that the moneth of Maye was named of this word Maiores, which signifieth as much as the elders: and the moneth of Iune, of Iuuenes, D which signifies the younger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, Nouember, & December. But Quintilis, was afterward called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Cæsar, who slew Pompeius. And Sextilis was named Augustus, Octauius Cæsars successour in the empire, who was also surnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus. But that held not longe: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recouered their auncient names againe. The two last moneths only, haue euer cōtinued their names, without chaūging or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least trāslated: the moneth of February doth signifie as much as purging, or at the least the deriuation of the word sowndeth neere it.
E In this moneth, they doe sacrifice of plantes, * & doe celebrate the feast of the Lupercales, in which there are many things agreable, and like to the sacrifices made for purification. And the first, which is Ianuary, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherefore me thinckes that Numa tooke away the moneth of Marche frō the first place, & gaue it vnto Ianuary: bicause he would haue peace preferred before warre, & ciuill things before marshall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill & polliticke. For he chaunged the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruell, & wilde: & brought it to be honest, gentle, & ciuill. For this cause they doe painte his image at this daye with two faces, the one before, and the other behinde, for thus chaunging the lines of men. And there is in Rome a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of warre: for the cu-F stome is to open them, when the Romaines haue any warres in any place, and to shut them when they be appeased. To haue them shut, it was a rare thinge to see, and happened very seldome: by reason of the greatnes of their empire, which of all sides was environned with barbarous nations, whom they were cõpelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie: & once before also in the yere when Marcus Attilius & Titus Manlius were Cõsuls. But that cõtinued not long, for it was opened again incontinẽtly, by reason of warres that came vpõ them sone after. Howbeit during the raigne of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained shut cõtinually by the space of three & forty yeres together. For all occasiõs of warres, were then vtterly dead & forgotten: bicause at ROME the people were not only through thexãple of iustice, clemẽcie, & the goodnes of the King brought to be quiet, & to loue peace: but in the citties thereabouts, there beganne a maruelous chaunge of manners & alteration of life, as if some gentle ayer had breathed on them, by some gratious & healthfull wind, blowẽ from ROME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens mindes such a harty desire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, & to serue the goddes truely: that almost through all ITALIE, there was nothing but feastes, playes, sacrifices, & bankets. The people did traffike & frequent together, without feare or daũger, & visited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the springing fountaine of Numaes wisedom many pretie brookes & streames of good & honest life had rõne ouer all ITALIE, & had watered it: & that the mildnes of his wisdom had frõ hand to hand bene dispersed through the whole world. Insomuch, as the ouer excessiue speaches the Poets accustomably doe vse, were not sufficiẽt enough to expresse the peaceable raigne of that time.

The Romains had no warres in al Numaes time.

There: spiders vveaue, their cobvvebbes daye and night in harnesses, vvhich vvont to serue for vvarre:
there: cancred rust doth fret, the steele full bright of trenchant blades, vvell vvhet in many a larre.
There: mighty speares, for lacke of vse are eaten, vvith rotten vvormes: and in that countrie there, the braying trompe dothe neuer seeme to threaten,
their quiet eares, vvith blasts of bloudy feare.
There: in that lande, no drovvsie sleepe is broken, vvith hotte alarmes, vvhich terrours doe betoken.

For during all king Numaes raigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any warres, ciuil dissention, or innouation of gouernment attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmitie or malice borne him, neither any cõspiracie once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of displeasing the godds (which visibly seemed to take him into their protectiõ) or for the reuerent regarde they had vnto his vertue, or for his prosperous & good successe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he sought to keepe men still pure, & honest, from all wickednes, & layed most open before the eyes of the whole world, a very exãple of that which Plato long time after did affirme, & saye, concerning true gouernmẽt: which was. That the only meane of true quietnes, & remedy from all euill (which euer troubleth men) was: when by some diuine ordinaunce from aboue there meteth in one person, the right maiestie of a King, & the minde of a wise philosopher, to make vertue gouernesse & ruler ouer vice. For in deede happie is such a wise man, & more happy are they, which maye heare the graue counsaill, & good lessons of such a mouthe. And there me thincks needeth no force, no cõpulsion, no threates, nor extremitie to bridle the people. For men seeing the true image of vertue in their visible prince, & in the example of his life, doe willingly growe to be wise, & of themselues doe fall into loue liking, and friendshippe together, and doe vse all temperaunce, iust dealing, and good order one toward another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe pointe of felicitie, and the most happie good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wisdome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners such a good disposition: and this, Numa aboue all other, seemed best to knowe and vnderstand. Furthermore, touching his wiues and children, there are great contrarieties amõg the historiographers. For some of them saye, he neuer maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one only daughter, and she was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrarie, that he had foure sonnes, Pompõ, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus: of euery one of the which (by succession from the father to the sonne) haue descended the noblest

There are three other writers, which doe reproue the two first: saying that they dyd write to gratifie the families, making them falsely to descend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is sayed, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the sonne of the same Martius, which persuaded him to accept the kingdome of ROME. For he went with him to ROME, to remaine there: where they dyd him the honour to receyue him into the number of the Se-

Whose death was not sodaine. For he dyed consuming by litle and litle, aswell through age, as also through a lingring disease that waited on him to his ende, as Piso hath written: and Numa at his death was litle more, then foure score yere old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funeralles, made his life yet more happie and glorious. For all the people his

The Priestes attended also on his bodie, and so dyd all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his tumbe, all bewaling and lamenting his death, with teares, sighes, and mournings. Not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their deerest kinseman, and neerest friende that had dyed before he was olde. They burnt not his bodie, bicause (as some saye) he commaunded the contrarie by his will and testament: but they made two coffines of stone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they layed his bodie, & in the other the holy bookes which he had written him selfe, much like vnto those, which they that made the lawes among the GRECIANS dyd write in tables. But bicause in D his life time he had taught the prieste, the substaunce of the whole conteined in the same: he willed the holy tables which he had written, should be buried with his bodie. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners & exercises. And he followed herein they saye, the Pythagorians, who would not put their worckes in writing, but dyd printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of persone the hidden rules and secretes of Geometrie, which had not bene worthy of them: then they sayed the goddes by manifest tokens would threaten, to reuenge such sacriledge and impietie, with some great destruction and miserie. Therefore, seeing so many things agreable, and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I easely pardone those which

E mainteine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted, and conuersant together. Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelue bookes written concerning the office of Priestes, and twelue other conteining the philosophie of the GRECIANS. And that foure hundred yeres after (in the same yere when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Bebius were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earthe, and discouered these coffines: and the liddes and couers thereof being caried awaye, they founde the one altogether voyde, hauing no manner of likelyhoode, or token of a bodie that had layen in it: and in the other they founde these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to reade them ouer, and to make the reporte of them. But he hauing perused them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he

F thought it not conuenient the matters conteined in them should be published vnto the simple people: and for that cause they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnte. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iust men, that Good men prayſed after their death. they are farre more prayſed and eſteemed after their death, then before: bicauſe that enuie doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithſtanding, the misfortunes which chaunced afterwardes vnto the fiue Kings which raigned at ROME after Numa, haue made his honour ſhine, with much more noble glorie then before. The misfortunes of Numaes ſucceſſours. For the laſt of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very olde. Hoſtilius. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treaſon. And Tullus Hoſtilius which raigned after Numa, deriding, & contemning the moſt parte of his good and holy inſtitutions, and chiefly his deuotion towardes the goddes, as a thing which made men lowly and fainte harted: dyd aſſone as euer he came to be King, turne all his ſubiects hartes to the warres. But this mad humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a ſtraunge, & moſt grieuous diſeaſe that followed him, which brought him to chaunge his minde, and dyd farre otherwiſe turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouerfearfull ſuperſtition, which dyd nothing yet reſemble the true Religion & deuotion of Numa: & beſides, he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was ſtriken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF Lycurgus with Numa.

The vertues of Numa and Lycurgus were alike, but their deeds diuers.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be ſomewhat harde to doe, that we comparing the one with the other, ſhould ſet out the difference betweene them. For in thoſe things wherein they were like of condition, their deedes doe ſhewe it ſufficiently. As in their temperaunce, their deuotion to the goddes, their wiſdome in gouerning, and their diſcreete handling of their people, by making them beleeue that the goddes had reuealed the lawes vnto them, which they eſtabliſhed. And nowe to come vnto their qualities, which are diuerſely, & ſeuerally commended in either of them. Their firſt qualitie is, that Numa accepted the Kingdome, and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receyued it, not ſeeking for it: and the other hauing it in his handes, did reſtore it againe. The one being a ſtraunger, and a priuate man: was by ſtraungers elected & choſen, their lorde & King. The other being in poſſeſſion a King, made him ſelfe againe a priuate perſone. Suer it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iuſtice: but it is a goodlier thing to eſteeme iuſtice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in ſuch reputatiō, that he was iudged worthy to be choſen a King: and vertue bred ſo noble a minde in the other, that he eſteemed not to be a King. Their ſecond qualitie is, that like as in an inſtrumēt of muſicke, the one of them did tune and wreſt vp the ſlacke ſtringes which were in SPARTA: ſo the other ſlackened, and ſet them lower,

A lower, which were to highe mounted in Rome. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. For he did not perſuade his cittizens, to plucke of their armour & eurates, nor to laye by their ſwordes: but only to leaue their golde & ſiluer, to forſake their ſofte beddes, their fine wrought tables, and other curious riche furniture, and not to leaue of the trauell of warres, to geue them ſelues only vnto feaſtes, ſacrifices, and playes. But to the contrarie, to geue vp bancketing and feaſting, & continually to take paynes in the warres, yelding their bodies to all kinde of paynes. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, eaſely perſuaded all that he would: and the other, by putting him ſelfe in daunger, and being hurte alſo, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpoſe and deſire. Numa his muſe was ſo gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his cittizens, which before were B furious and violent, were now ſo tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iuſtice. And to the contrarie, if they will compell me to number amongeſt the lawes and ordinaunces of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the Ilotes, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I muſt of force confeſſe that Numa was muche wiſer, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, conſidering that euen vnto thoſe which in deede were borne ſlaues, he gaue ſome litle taſt of honour, & ſweetnes of libertie, hauing ordained, that in the feaſtes of Saturne, they ſhould ſit downe at meate, at their maſters owne table. Some holde opinion, that this cuſtome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that thoſe, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, ſhould haue ſome pleaſure thereof to make good cheere with the firſt fruites of the ſame. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembraunce of the equalitie, C which was emõgeſt men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither maſter nor ſeruaunte, but all men were a like equall, as brethern or hinſemen. To conclude, it ſeemeth either of them tooke a direct courſe, thought beſt to them ſelues, to frame their people vnto temperaunce, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre beſt, and the other iuſtice: onles it were that men would ſaye, that for the diuerſitie of the nature or cuſtome of their people (which were almoſt contrarie in manners) they were both compelled to vſe alſo contrary and diuers meanes from other. For it was not of a fainte harte, that Numa tooke from his people the vſe of armes, and deſire to be in warres: but it was to the ende they ſhould not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus alſo ſtudie to make his people ſouldiers and warlike, to hurte others: but for feare rather that others D ſhould hurte them. And ſo, to cut of the exceſſe in the one, and to ſupply the defect of the other: they were both enforced to bring in a ſtraunge manner of gouernment, Furthermore, touching their ſeuerall kinde of gouernment, & diuiding of their people into ſtates and companies: that of Numa was maruelous meane and baſe, and framed to the liking of the meaneſt people, making a bodie of a cittie, and a people compounded together of all ſortes, as goldeſmithes, minſtrells, founders, ſhoemakers, and of all ſortes of craftes men & occupations together. But that of Lycurgus, was directly contrarie: for his was more ſeuere and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the nobility, caſting all craftes and baſe occupations vpon bondemen & ſtraungers, and putting into the handes of his cittizens the ſhield and launce, ſuffering them to exerciſe no other arte or ſcience, but the arte and diſcipline of warres, as the true miniſters of Mars: E which all their life time neuer knewe other ſcience, but only learned to obey their captaines, and to commaund their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buye and ſell, or to trafficke, free men were expreſſely forbidden: bicauſe they ſhould wholy & abſolutely be free. And all ſciences to get money was lawfull for ſlaues, and the Ilotes: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dreſſe meate, and to be a ſcullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amõgeſt his people, but only tooke away couetous deſire to be riche by warres: but otherwiſe, he did not forbid them to get goodes by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regarde to bring all to equalitie, and to be a like wealthy, but ſuffered euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuẽt pouertie, which crept in, & ſpred farre in his cittie. Which he ſhould haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequalitie F amongeſt them, and that his cittizens for ſubſtaunce were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time whẽ he ſhould haue made head againſt auarice, to haue ſtopped the miſchiefes & inconueniences, which fell out afterwards, & they were not litle. For that only was the fountaine and roote, of the moſt parte of the greateſt euills & miſchieues, which happened afterwardes in ROME. And as touching the diuiſion of goodes: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality vnto the one, was a groũd & foundation of his common wealth, which he afterwards inſtituted: and vnto other, it could not be. For this diuiſion being made not long before the time of his predeceſſour, there was no great neede to chaunge the firſt, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, & their children to be in common, both the one & the other wiſely ſought to take awaye all occaſion of iealouſie: but yet they tooke not both one courſe. For the ROMAINE husband, hauing children enough to his contentation: if another that lacked children came vnto him, to praye him to lende him his wife, he might graunte her vnto him, and it was in him to geue her altogether, or to lende her for a time, & to take her afterwardes againe. But the LACONIAN, keeping his wife in his houſe, & the mariage remaining whole & vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue children by her: naye furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did them ſelues intreat men, by whom they thought to haue a trimme broode of children, & layed them with their wiues. What difference, I praye you was betwene theſe two cuſtomes? ſauing that the cuſtome of the LACONIANS ſhewed, that the husbãds were nothing angrie, nor grieued with their wiues for thoſe things, which for ſorrowe and iealouſie doth rent the hartes of moſt maried men in the world. And that of the ROMAINES was a ſimplicitie ſomwhat more ſhamefaſt, which to couer it, was ſhadowed yet with the cloke of matrimonie, and contract of mariage: confeſſing that to vſe wife & children by halfes together, was a thing moſt intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidẽs to be maried by Numaes order, was much ſtraighter & more honorable for womanhed: & Lycurgus order hauing to much ſcope and libertie, gaue Poets occaſion to ſpeake, and to geue them ſurnames not very honeſt. As Ibycus called them Phænomeridas: to ſaye, thighe ſhowers: and Andromanes: to ſaye manhood. And Euripides ſayeth alſo of them.

Reaſon for mariages.

Numaes order for maydens the better.

Good nutbrovvne girles vvhich left, their fathers houſe at large,
and ſought for young mens companie, & tooke their vvare in charge:
And shevved their thighes all bare, the taylour did them vvrong, on eche ſide open vvere their cotes, the ſlytts vvere all to long.

And in deede to ſaye truely, the ſides of their petticotes were not ſowed beneath: ſo that as they went, they ſhewed their thighes naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth eaſely declare by theſe verſes:

The ſonge vvhich you ſhall ſinge, ſhalbe the ſonnet ſayde, by Hermionè luſty laſſe, that ſtrong and ſturdy mayde: VVhich truſt her petticote, about her midle shorte, and ſet to shevve her naked hippes, in francke and frendly ſorte.

And therefore it is ſayed, the LACON wiues were bolde, manly, & ſtowte againſt their husbands, namely the firſt. For they were wholy miſtreſſes in the houſe, and abroade: yea they had law on their ſide alſo, to vtter their mindes franckly cõcerning the chiefeſt matters. But Numa euer reſerued the honour and dignitie vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken them awaye perforce, diſpoſed them ſelues to vſe them as gently as poſſibly they could: neuertheles, he added otherwiſe thereto, great honeſty, and tooke away all curioſitie from them, and taught them ſobrietie, & did inure them to ſpeake litle. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibite them to ſpeake, although it were for things neceſſarie, onles it were in the preſence of their husbands. In ſo much as it is reported, that a woman chauncing one daye to pleade her cauſe in perſone, openly before the iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did ſend immediately vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognoſticate to the cittie. And therfore Numa thought the memorie of the naughty women, would much commend the great humilitie, gentlenes, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN hiſtoriographers doe note thoſe which were the firſt that killed any of their cittizẽs, or haue fought with their brethern, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen ſo the ROMAINES doe note that Spurius Caruilius was the firſt which forſooke his wife, two hundred & thirtie yeres after the firſt foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before.

The Lacedemonians were to manly.

The Romaine women very modeſt.

The firſt diuorce at Rome.

A fore. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalea, was the firſt which euer brawled or quarrelled with her mother in lawe called Geganía, in the time when Tarquine ſurnamed the proude raigned: ſo well and honeſtly were the orders of Numa deuiſed concerning mariage. Moreuer, the age and time of marying of maydes, which both the one and the other ordeined: doth agree with the reſt of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they ſhould be maried, till they were of good yeres, and women growen: to the ende that they knowing the company of man at ſuch time as nature requireth, it ſhould be a beginning of their pleaſure and loue; and not of griefe and hate, when ſhe ſhould be compelled vnto it before time agreable by nature, and bicauſe their bodies alſo ſhould be more ſtronge and able to beare children, and to indure the mothers painefull throwes and trauell in childe bearing, conſidering they are maried to no B other ende, but to beare children. But the Romaines to the contrarie, doe marye them at twelue yeres of age, and vnder: ſaying, that by this meanes their bodies & manners be wholy theirs, which doe marye them, being aſſured that no body els could touch them. By this reaſon it is manifeſt, that the one is more naturall, to make them ſtrong to beare children: & the other more morall, to geue them the forme & manner of conditiõs, which a man would haue them to kepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for educatiõ of childrẽ, that they ſhould be brought vp, inſtructed, & taught, vnder the ſelfe ſame maſters & gouernours, which ſhould haue an eye to make them drincke, eate, playe, and exerciſe them ſelues honeſtly, and orderly together: Numa made no more prouiſion for the ſame, then the leaſt maker of lawes that euer was, and nothing in compariſon of Lycurgus. For Numa left the parents at libertie, to vſe their C diſcretion (according vnto their couetouſnes or neceſſitie) to cauſe their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they would put them to be labourers, carpinters, founders, or minſtrells. As if they ſhould not frame the manners of children, and facion them from their cradell all to one ende: but ſhould be as it were like paſſengers in one ſhippe, which being there, ſome for one buſines, other for another purpoſe, but all to diuers endes, doe neuer medle one with another, but in a rough ſtorme or tempeſt, when euery man is affrayed of his owne life. For otherwiſe, no man careth but for him ſelfe. And other makers of lawes alſo, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath ſcaped them through ignoraunce, or ſome time through lacke of ſufficient power and authoritie. But a wiſe philoſopher, hauing receyued a realme of people newly gathered together, which dyd contrary him in nothing: whereto ſhould he D moſt plye his ſtudie and indeuour, but to cauſe children to be well brought vp, and to make young men exerciſe them ſelues, to the ende they ſhould not differ in manners, nor that they ſhould be troubleſome, by their diuers manner of bringing vp, but that they ſhould all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one ſelfe trade, and facio-ned vnder one ſelfe patterne of vertue? That good education, beſides other commodities, dyd alſo ſerue to preſerue Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their othe which they had made, had bene of ſmall effect, if he had not through inſtitution, and education (as it were) dyed in wolle the manners of children, and had not made them from their nources breſtes in manner, ſucke the Iuice and loue of his lawes, and ciuill ordinaunces. And this was of ſuche force, that for the ſpace of fiue hundred yeres & more, Lycurgus chief lawes and ordinaunces remained in full E perfection, as a deepe woded dye, which went to the bottome, and pearced into the tender wolle. Contrariwiſe, that which was Numaes chief ende and purpoſe, to continew Rome in peace and amitie, dyed by and by with him. For he was no ſoner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he ſo carefully had kept ſhut all his reigne, as if in deede he had kept in warres there, vnder locke and keye, and they filled all Italie with murder and bloude: & this his godly, holy, and iuſt gouernment which his Realme enioyed all his time, did not laſt long after, bicauſe it had not the bonde of education, and the diſcipline of children which ſhould mainteine it. Why, maye a man ſaye to me here: hath not Rome excelled ſtill, and preuailed more & more in cheualrie? This queſtion requireth a long aunſwer, and ſpecially vnto ſuch men, as place felicitie in riches, in poſſeſſions, & in the greatnes of em-F pire, rather then in the quiet ſafety, peace, & concorde of a common weale: and in clemency and iuſtice, ioyned with contentation. Neuertheles, howſoeuer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus alſo, that the Romaines, after they had chaũged the ſtate which they had of Numa, dyd ſo maruelouſly increaſe & growe mightie: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS to the contrarie, ſo ſoone as they beganne to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie and ſwaye, fell afterwards to be of ſmall accompt. So that hauing loſt the ſoueraintie & commaundemẽt ouer GREECE, they ſtoode in great hazarde alſo to be ouerthrowen for euer. But in trothe it was ſome diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere ſtraunger, the ROMAINES dyd ſeeke him, to make him King, and that he could ſo chaunge all, and rule a whole cittie as he liſted (not yet ioyned together) without neede of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be aſſiſted with the beſt of the citty, in reſiſting the cõmons of LACEDÆMON, but he could neuer otherwiſe haue kept them in peace, & made them loue together, but by his only wiſdom & iuſtice.

The ende of Numa Pompilius life.

THE LIFE OF Solon.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a litle booke that he wrote & dedicated vnto Aſclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, alleageth the wordes of one Philocles, in which he ſpeaketh againſt the common opinion of thoſe that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the ſonne of Execeſtides, a man but reaſonably to liue, although otherwiſe he was of the nobleſt and moſt auncient houſe of the cittie of ATHENS. For of his fathers ſide, he was deſcended of king Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, ſhe was coſin germaine vnto Piſiſtratus mother. For this cauſe euen from the beginning there was great friendſhippe betwene them, partely for their kinred, and partely alſo for the curteſie, and beawtie of Piſiſtratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of ſtate and gouernment: yet this ſquare bred no violent inconuenience betwene them, but they reſerued in their hartes ſtill their auncient amitie, which continued the memorie of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no ſtayed man to withſtand beawtie, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifeſt to all, aſwell by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a lawe of his owne: wherein he dyd forbid

A forbid bondmen to perfume themſelues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this lawe among honeſt matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better ſorte, and forbidding it to the baſeſt. They ſaye alſo that Piſiſtratus ſelfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he dyd ſet vp the litle image of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candell. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing ſpent his goodes in liberalitie, and deedes of curteſie, though he might eaſely haue bene relieued at diuers mens handes with money, he was yet aſhamed to take any, bicauſe he came of a houſe which was wont rather to geue and relieue others, then to take them ſelues: ſo being yet a young man, he deuiſed to trade marchaundiſe. Howbeit other ſaye, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to ſee the worlde, and to learne: then to trafficke, or gayne. For ſure he was very deſirous of knowledge, as appeareth

Solon gaue him ſelfe in youth to trade marchaūdiſe.

B manifeſtly: for that being nowe olde, he commonly vſed to ſaye this verſe:

Igrovve olde, learning ſtill.

Alſo he was not couetouſly bent, nor loued riches to much: for he ſayd in one place:

VVho ſo hath goodes, and golde enough at call, great heards of beaſtes, and flocks in many a folde, both horſe and mule, yea ſtore of corne and all,
that maye content eche man aboue the movvlde:

then he vvhich hathe, ſufficiently to feede, and clothe his corpes, vvith ſuch as god afoordes.

for to beholde the fayer and heauenly face, of ſome ſvvete vvife, vvhich is adornde vvith grace:
or els ſome childe, of beavvty fayre and bright, then hath he cauſe (in deede) of deepe delight.

And in another place alſo he ſayeth:

In deede I doe deſire, ſome vvealthe to haue at vvill:
but not vnles the ſame be got, by faithfull dealing ſtill.
For ſuer vvhoſo deſires by vvickednes to thriue:
ſhall finde that iuſtice from ſuch goodes, vvill iuſtly him depriue.

D There is no law forbiddeth an honeſt man, or gētleman, greedily to ſcrape goods together, & more then may ſuffice: & likewiſe to get ſufficient to mainteine one withall, & to defraye all needefull charges. In thoſe dayes no ſtate was diſcommended, as ſayeth Heſiodus, nor any arte or ſcience made any difference betwene men: but marchaundiſe they thought an honorable ſtate, as that which deliuered meanes, to traffike into ſtraunge & farre coūtries, to get acquaintaūce with ſtates, to procure the loue of princes, & chiefly to gather the experiēce of the world. So that there haue bene marchaūts, which heretofore haue bene foūders of great cities: as he which firſt buylt MASSILIA, after he had obteined the friēdſhippe of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riuer of Rhoſne. And they ſaye alſo, that Thales Mileſius the wiſe, did traffike marchaūdiſe, & that Hippocrates the mathematike did euē ſo: & likewiſe that Plato trauelling into Egipt,

E did beare the whole charges of his iorney, with the gaines he made of the ſale of oile he caried thither. They remember alſo, that Solon learned to be lauiſh in expence, to fare delicately, & to ſpeake wantonly of pleaſures in his Poemes, ſomwhat more licētiouſly then became the grauity of a Philoſopher: only bicauſe he was brought vp in the trade of marchaūdiſe, wherein for that men are maruelous ſubiect to great loſſes & daūgers, they ſeeke otherwiles good chere to driue theſe cares awaye, and libertie to make much of them ſelues. Yet it appeareth by theſe verſes, that Solon accompted him ſelfe rather in the number of the poore, than of the riche.

Poverty with vertue better than riches.

This Poetry at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leyſure, writing no matter of importaunce in his verſes. Afterwards he dyd ſet out many graue matters of philoſophie, and the moſt parte of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a common weale, which he dyd not for hiſtorie or memories ſake, but only of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he dyd, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinaunces in verſe, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

How Solon vſed his poetrie.

Vouchesaue ô mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth highe King:
to graunt good fortune to my lavves, and heasts in euerie thing.
And that their glorie grovve, in ſuch triumphaunt vviſe,
as maye remaine in fame for aye, vvhich liues and neuer dies.

Solon delited in morall, but not in naturall philoſophie.

He chiefly delited in morall philoſophie, which treated of gouernment & common weales: as the moſt parte of the wiſe men dyd of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophie, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes.

The clattering hayle, and ſoftly falling ſnovve
doe breede in ayer, and fall from cloudes on hye.
The dreadfull clappes, vvhich thunderbolts doe throvve,
doe come from heauen, and lightninges bright in skye.
The ſea it ſelfe by boyſterous blaſtes dothe rore

VVould be both calme and quiet for to paſſe,
as any element that euer vvas.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GRECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him a parte, all the others got the name of wiſdome, only for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. It is reported that they met on a daye all ſeuen together in the cittie of DELPHES, and another time in the cittie of CORINTHE, where Periander got them together at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glorie, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, howe certaine fiſher men of the Ile of CO, caſt their nettes into the ſea, and certaine ſtraungers paſſing by, that came from the cittie of MILETVM, did buye their draught of fiſhe at aduenture, before the net was drawen. And when they drue it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſy gold, which men ſaye, Hellen (as ſhe dyd returne from TROYE) had throwen in in that place, in memory of an aunciēt oracle ſhe called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the ſtraungers & fiſher men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwardes the two citties tooke parte of both ſides, on their cittizens behalfe. In ſo much as warres had like to haue followed betwene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia geuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they ſhould geue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. Whereupon the men of CO, ſent it firſt to Thales in the cittie of MILETVM, as being willing to graunte that vnto a priuate perſone, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſayed, he thought Bias a wiſer man than him ſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it againe vnto another, as to a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuers handes, in the ende it was brought backe againe vnto the cittie of MILETVM, and deliuered into the handes of Thales the ſeconde time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the cittie of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the cittie of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their handes, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtely it was ſent to the cittie of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt auncient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſaye in ſteade of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cuppe that king Cræſus ſent vnto the cittie of DELPHES. Other ſaye, it was a pece of Hellens three footed ſtoole of gold drawē vp in a drag net.

A plate which Bathycles left there. They make mention alſo of another priuate meeting betwext Anacharſis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharſis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, ſaying that he was a ſtraunger which came of purpoſe to ſee him, and to deſire his acquaintaunce and friēdſhippe. Solon aunſwered him, that it was better to ſeeke friēdſhippe in his owne countrie. Anacharſis replied againe: thou then that arte at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to ſhew me friendſhippe. Then Solon wondering at his bolde ready wit, enterteined him very curteouſly: and kept him a certaine time in his houſe, and made him very good cheere, at the ſelfe ſame time wherein he was moſt buſie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the ſtate thereof. Which when Anacharſis vnderſtoode, he laughed at it, to ſee that Solon B imagined with written lawes, to bridell mens couetouſnes and iniuſtice. For ſuch lawes, ſayed he, doe rightly reſemble the ſpyders cobwebbes: bicauſe they take holde of litle flies and gnattes which fall into them, but the riche and mightie will breake and ronne through them at their will. Solon anſwered him, that men doe iuſtly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, bicauſe it is to the hinderāce of either partie to breake them: & euen ſo, he dyd ſo temper his lawes, that he made his cittizens knowe, it was more for their profit to obey lawe & iuſtice, then to breake it. Neuertheles afterwardes, matters proued rather according to Anacharſis compariſon, then agreable to the hope that Solon had conceyued. Anacharſis being by happe one daye in a common aſſembly of the people at ATHENS, ſayed that he maruelled much, why in the conſultations & meetings of the GRECIANS, wiſe men C propounded matters, and fooles dyd decide them. It is ſayed moreouer, that Solon was ſomtime in the cittie of MILETVM at Thales houſe, where he ſayed that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marie to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a worde at that preſent: but within fewe dayes after he ſuborned a ſtraunger, which ſayed that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but tenne dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, What newes there? This ſtraunger whom Thales had ſchooled before, aunſwered: none other there, ſauing that they caried a young man to buriall, whom all the cittie followed, for that he was one of the greateſt mens ſonnes of the cittie, and the honeſteſt man withall, who at that preſent was out of the countrie, and had bene a long time (as they ſayed) abroade. O poore vnfortunate father, then ſayed Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard D him named, ſayed the ſtraunger, but I haue forgotten him nowe: ſauing that they all ſayed, he was a worthy wiſe man. So Solon ſtill trembling more and more for feare, at euery aunſwer of this ſtraunger: in the ende he could holde no longer, being full of trouble, but tolde his name himſelfe vnto the ſtraunger, and asked him againe, if he were not the ſonne of Solon which was buried. The very ſame, ſayed the ſtraunger. Solon with that, like a mad man ſtraight beganne to beat his head, and to ſaye, and doe, like men impacient in affliction, and ouercome with ſorowe. But Thales laughing to ſee this pageant, ſtayed him, and ſayed. Loe, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of ſuch a violence, that thou ſeeſt it hath nowe ouercome thee, although otherwiſe thou arte ſtronge, and able to wreſtle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath ſaied vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it E is but a tale, and nothing ſo. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which ſayed he had Eſops ſowle) reciteth this ſtory thus. Neuertheles it lacketh iudgement, and the corage of a man alſo, to be afrayed to get things neceſſarie, fearing the loſſe of them: for by this reckoning, he ſhould neither eſteeme honour, goodes, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to loſe them. For we ſee that vertue it ſelfe, which is the greateſt and ſweeteſt riches a man can haue, decayeth oftimes through ſicknes, or els by phiſicke, and potions. Furthermore Thales ſelfe, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, onles he would confeſſe that he neither loued friends, kynſemen, nor countrie: howbeit Thales had an adopted ſonne, called Cybiſtus, which was his ſiſters ſonne. The inſtinct of naturall loue.

This Poetry at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leyſure, writing no matter of importaunce in his verſes. Afterwards he dyd ſet out many graue matters of philoſophie, and the moſt parte of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a common weale, which he dyd not for hiſtorie or memories ſake, but only of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he dyd, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinaunces in verſe, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

How Solon vſed his poetrie.

Vouchſaue ô mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth highe King:
to graunt good fortune to my lavves, and heaſts in euerie thing.
And that their glorie grovve, in ſuch triumphaunt vviſe,
as maye remaine in fame for aye, vvhich liues and neuer dies.

He chiefly delited in morall philoſophie, which treated of gouernment & common weales: as the moſt parte of the wiſe men dyd of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophie, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes.

Solon delited in morall, but not in naturall philoſophie.

The clattering hayle, and ſoftly falling ſnovve
doe breede in ayer, and fall from cloudes on hye.
The dreadfull clappes, vvhich thunderbolts doe throvve,
doe come from heauen, and lightninges bright in skye.
The ſea it ſelfe by boyſterous blaſtes dothe rore vvhich (vvere it not prouoked ſo full ſore) VVould be both calme and quiet for to paſſe,
as any element that euer vvas.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GREECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him a parte, all the others got the name of wiſdome, only for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. It is reported that they met on a daye all ſeuen together in the cittie of DELPHES, and another time in the cittie of CORINTHE, where Periander got them together at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glorie, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, howe certaine fiſher men of the Ile of CO, caſt their nettes into the ſea, and certaine ſtraungers paſſing by, that came from the cittie of MILETVM, did buye their draught of fiſhe at aduenture, before the net was drawen. And when they drue it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſy gold, which men ſaye, Hellen (as ſhe dyd returne from TROYE) had throwen in in that place, in memory of an aunciẽt oracle ſhe called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the ſtraungers & fiſher men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwardes the two citties tooke parte of both ſides, on their cittizens behalfe. In ſo much as warres had like to haue followed betwene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia geuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they ſhould geue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. Whereupon the men of CO, ſent it firſt to Thales in the cittie of MILETVM, as being willing to graunte that vnto a priuate perſone, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſayed, he thought Bias a wiſer man than him ſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it againe vnto another, as to a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuers handes, in the ende it was brought backe againe vnto the cittie of MILETVM, and deliuered into the handes of Thales the ſeconde time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the cittie of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the cittie of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their handes, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtely it was ſent to the cittie of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt auncient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſaye in ſteade of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cuppe that king Cræſus ſent vnto the cittie of DELPHES. Other ſaye, it was a pece of

A plate which Bathycles left there. They make mention alſo of another priuate meeting betwext Anacharſis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharſis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, ſaying that he was a ſtraunger which came of purpoſe to ſee him, and to deſire his acquaintaunce and friēdſhippe. Solon aunſwered him, that it was better to ſeeke friēdſhippe in his owne countrie. Anacharſis replied againe: thou then that arte at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to ſhew me friendſhippe. Then Solon wondering at his bolde ready wit, enterteined him very curteouſly: and kept him a certaine time in his houſe, and made him very good cheere, at the ſelfe ſame time wherein he was moſt buſie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the ſtate thereof. Which when Anacharſis vnderſtoode, he laughed at it, to ſee that Solon B imagined with written lawes, to bridell mens couetouſnes and iniuſtice. For ſuch lawes, ſayed he, doe rightly reſemble the ſpyders cobwebbes: bicauſe they take holde of litle flies and gnattes which fall into them, but the riche and mightie will breake and ronne through them at their will. Solon anſwered him, that men doe iuſtly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, bicauſe it is to the hinderāce of either partie to breake them: & euen ſo, he dyd ſo temper his lawes, that he made his cittizens knowe, it was more for their profit to obey lawe & iuſtice, then to breake it. Neuertheles afterwardes, matters proued rather according to Anacharſis compariſon, then agreable to the hope that Solon had conceyued. Anacharſis being by happe one daye in a common aſſembly of the people at ATHENS, ſayed that he maruelled much, why in the conſultations & meetings of the GRECIANS, wiſe men C propounded matters, and fooles dyd decide them. It is ſayed moreouer, that Solon was ſomtime in the cittie of MILETVM at Thales houſe, where he ſayed that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marie to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a worde at that preſent: but within fewe dayes after he ſuborned a ſtraunger, which ſayed that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but tenne dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, What newes there? This ſtraunger whom Thales had ſchooled before, aunſwered: none other there, ſauing that they caried a young man to buriall, whom all the cittie followed, for that he was one of the greateſt mens ſonnes of the cittie, and the honeſteſt man withall, who at that preſent was out of the countrie, and had bene a long time (as they ſayed) abroade. O poore vnfortunate father, then ſayed Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard D him named, ſayed the ſtraunger, but I haue forgotten him nowe: ſauing that they all ſayed, he was a worthy wiſe man. So Solon ſtill trembling more and more for feare, at euery aunſwer of this ſtraunger: in the ende he could holde no longer, being full of trouble, but tolde his name him ſelfe vnto the ſtraunger, and asked him againe, if he were not the ſonne of Solon which was buried. The very ſame, ſayed the ſtraunger. Solon with that, like a mad man ſtraight beganne to beat his head, and to ſaye, and doe, like men impacient in affliction, and ouercome with ſorowe. But Thales laughing to ſee this pageant, ſtayed him, and ſayed. Loe, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of ſuch a violence, that thou ſeeſt it hath nowe ouercome thee, although otherwiſe thou arte ſtronge, and able to wreſtle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath ſaied vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it E is but a tale, and nothing ſo. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which ſayed he had Eſops ſowle) reciteth this ſtory thus. The inſtinct of naturall loue.

haue once wonne & poſſeſſed his loue, they make him euer after to be kynde and tender ouer them. So that ye ſhall ſee many times men of ſuch a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marie, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwardes are ready to dye for feare & ſorowe, when they ſee their baſtardes (that they haue gotten of their ſlaues or concubines) fall ſicke or dye, and doe vtter wordes farre vnmeete for men of noble corage. And ſome ſuch there be, that for the death of a dogge, or their horſe, are ſo out of harte, and take ſuch thought, that they are ready to goe into the grounde, they looke ſo pittifully. Other ſome are cleane contrarie, who though they haue loſt their children, forgone their friendes, or ſome gentleman deare vnto them, yet no ſorowfull worde hath commen from them, neither haue they done any vnſeemely thing: but haue paſſed the reſt of their life like wiſe, conſtant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weaknes, which breedeth theſe extreme ſorowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exerciſed, nor acquainted to fight againſt fortune with reaſon. And this is the cauſe that plucketh from them the pleaſure of that they loue and deſire, by reaſon of the continuall trouble, feare and griefe they feele, by thincking howe in time they maye be depriued of it. Nowe we muſt not arme our ſelues with pouertie, againſt the griefe of loſſe of goodes: neither with lacke of affection, againſt the loſſe of our friendes: neither with wante of mariage, againſt the death of children: but we muſt be armed with reaſon againſt misfortunes. Thus haue we ſufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS hauing nowe ſuſteined a long and troubleſome warre againſt the MEGARIANS, for the poſſeſſion of the Ile of SALAMINA: were in the ende wearie of it, and made proclamation ſtraightly commaunding vpon payne of death, that no man ſhould preſume to preferre any more to the counſaill of the cittie, the title or queſtion of the poſſeſſion of the Ile of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open ſhame, and ſeeing the moſt parte of the luſtieſt youthes deſirous ſtill of warre though their tongues were tyed for feare of the proclamation: he fayned him ſelfe to be out of his wittes, and cauſed it to be geuen out that Solon was become a foole, and ſecretly he had made certaine lamentable verſes, which he had cunned without booke, to ſinge abroade the cittie. So one daye he ranne ſodainly out of his houſe with a garland on his head, and gotte him to the market place, where the people ſtraight ſwarmed like bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the ſtone where all proclamations are vſually made, out he ſingeth theſe Elegies he had made, which beganne after this ſorte.

Proclamation vpon paine of death no man to moue the counſell for the title of Salamina.

Solon fained madnes to recouer Salamina.

I here preſent my ſelfe (an Heraulde) in this caſe, vvhich come from Salamina lande, that noble vvorthy place.
My minde in pelting proſe, ſhall neuer be expreſt,
But ſonge in verſe Heroycall, for ſo I thincke it beſt.

Solons Elegies of the Salaminians.

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and conteineth a hundred verſes, which are excellently well written. And theſe being ſonge openly by Solon at that time, his friendes incontinently prayſed them beyond meaſure, and ſpecially Piſiſtratus: and they went about perſuading the people that were preſent, to credit that he ſpake. Hereupon the matter was ſo handled amongeſt them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they beganne to followe the warres with greater furie then before, appointing Solon to be generall in the ſame. But the common tale and reporte is, that he went by ſea with Piſiſtratus vnto the temple of Venus, ſurnamed Coliade: where he founde all the women at a ſolemne feaſt and ſacrifice, which they made of cuſtome to the goddeſſe. He taking occaſion thereby, ſent from thence a truſty man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he inſtructed to fayne him ſelfe a reuolted traytour, & that he came of purpoſe to tell them, that if they would but goe with him, they might take all the chief ladyes and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a ſodaine. The MEGARIANS eaſely beleeued him, and ſhipped forthwith certaine ſouldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceyued the ſhippe vnder ſayle comming from SALAMINA, he commaunded the women to departe, and in ſteade of them he put luſty beardles ſpringalles into their apparell, and gaue them litle ſhorte daggers to conuey vnder their clothes, commaunding them to playe & daunce together vpon the ſea ſide, vntill their enemies were landed, and their ſhippe at anker: and ſo it came to paſſe. For the MEGARIANS being deceyued by that they ſawe a farre of, as ſoone as euer they came to the ſhore ſide, dyd lande in heapes,

Of the temple of Venus Coliade. Strab. lib 4. & Pauſan of the Athenians.

Solons ſtratageame.

A heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedines to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slayne euery mothers sonne. This stratageame being finely handled, & to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke sea straight, and costed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sodaine, and wanne it without much resistaunce. Other saye that it was not taken after this sorte: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first such an oracle. Solon wanne Salamina.

Thou shalt first vvinne by vovves and sacrifice, of vvhose dead bones, the dust engraued lies, the helpe of lordes and demy goddes full bright: in vvesterne soyle, Æsopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, & dyd sacrifice to Peripemus, & to Cichris, demy goddes of the countrie. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him fiue hundred men, who willingly offered them selues: & the cittie made an accorde with them, B that if they tooke the Ile of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his souldiers into diuers fisher botes, and appointed a galliot of thirtie owers to come after him, & he ankred hard by the cittie of SALAMINA, vnder the pointe which looketh towards the Ile of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chaunce heard some inckling of it, but yet knew nothing of certaintie: ranne presently in hurly burley to arme them, and manned out a shippe to descrie what it was. But they fondly comming within daunger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches fast bounde, and in their roomes put aborde in their shippe the choycest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to set their course direct vpon the cittie, and to keepe them selues as close out of sight as could be. And he him self with all the rest of his soul-
C diers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the fielde. Now whilest they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS shippe, entred the hauen, & wanne the towne. This is certainly true, & testified by that which is shewed yet at this daye. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a shippe of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the first, & by & by those that are in the shippe make a great showte, and a man armed leaping out of the shippe, ronneth showting towardes the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme lande: and hard by the same is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he sent backe againe those prisoners that he had taken (which were saued from the slaughter of the battell) without any ransome paying. Neuertheles, the MEGARIANS were sharpely bent D still, to recouer SALAMINA again. Much hurte being done & suffered on both sides: both parts in the ende made the LACEDÆMONIANS iudges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgement geuen, common reporte is, that Homers authoritie dyd Solon good seruice, bicause he did adde these verses to the number of shippes, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearsed before the iudges, as if they had bene in deede written by Homer. Great fryfe betwext the Megarians & Athenians for Salamina. Iliad. lib. 2.

Aiax that champion stovvte, did leade vvith him in charge, twvelue shippes from Salamina soyle, vvhich he had left at large, and euen those selfe same shippes, in battell did he cast and place in order for to fight, vvith enmies force at last.
In that same very place, vvhereas it seemed then E the captaines vvhich from Athens came, imbattelled had their men.

Howbeit the ATHENIANS selues thinke, it was but a tale of pleasure: and saye that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Philæus, and Euryfaces (both Aiax sonnes) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Whereupon they gaue the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTICA: and the other in a towne called MELITVM. And for due proofe thereof, they saye there is yet a certen canton or quarter of the countrie of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philæides, after the name of this Philæus, where Pisistratus was borne. And it is sayed moreouer, that Solon (bicause he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alleage that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in ME-
F GARA they burie the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denieth it, saying that the MEGARIANS dyd burie them also with their faces towards the West: alleaging moreouer, that at ATHENS euerie corse had his owne beere or coffin by it selfe, & that at MEGARA they dyd put three or foure corses together. They saye also there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which dyd greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their strife was iudged by fiue Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to saye, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypsechidas, Anaxilas, & Cleomenes. Solon vndoutedly wonne great glory & honour by this exployte, yet was he much more honoured & esteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the tẽple of Apollo, in the cittie of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be suffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS should at their pleasure abuse the sanctuarie of the oracle, & that they should ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counsell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and persuasions, proclaimed warres against the CYRRHÆIANS; as diuers other doe witnesse, and specially Aristotle, in the storie he wrote of those that wanne the Pythian games, where he ascribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuertheles Hermippus sayeth, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Æschines the Orator wrote no such thing of him: & in the chronicles of the DELPHIANS they finde, that one Alcmæon, & not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the cittie of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylons heynous offence, euer sence the yere that Megacles (gouernour of the cittie of ATHENS) dyd with fayer words handle so the confederates of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken sanctuarie within the liberties of the temple of Minerua: that he persuaded them to be wise, and to present themselues before the iudges, holding by a threede, which they should tye about the base of the image of the goddesse where she stoode, bicause they should not lose their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddesses so called (which be the images of the furies) comming downe to present themselues before the iudges, the threede brake of it self. Then Megacles, and other officers his cõpanions, layed holde on them presently, saying that it was a manifest signe that the goddesse Minerua refused to saue thẽ. So those they tooke, & all they could laye hands of, were immediately stoned to death without the cittie: the rest which tooke the altars for refuge, were slaine there also. And none were saued, but such as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the citie, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and commonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the issues of the rebelles that rose with Cylon, chaunced to rise again in credit, & growing to great authoritie, they neuer left quarrelling & fighting continually with th'offspring of Megacles. These factions were greatest & highest in Solons time: who being of authoritie, & seeing the people thus diuided in two parts, he stepped in betweene them, with the chiefest men of ATHENS, & did so persuade & intreate those whom they called the abiects & excõmunicates, that they were contented to be iudged. So three hundred of the chiefest cittizens were chosen iudges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded, & by sentẽce of the iudges, the excommunicates were condẽned. Those that were aliue, to perpetuall exile: & the bones of them that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwen out of the confines of the territorie of ATHENS. But whilest the cittie of ATHENS was occupied with these vprores, the MEGARIANS wisely caught holde of the occasion deliuered, and set vpon the ATHENIANS, tooke frõ them the hauen of NYSÆA, & recouered againe out of their handes, the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the cittie was possessed with a certen superstitious feare: for some sayed, that sprites were come againe, and straunge sightes were seene. The prognosticatours also sayed, they perceiued by their sacrifices, the cittie was defiled with some abhominable & wicked things, which were of necessitie to be purged and throwen out. Hereupon they sent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæstian, whom they reckoned the seuenth of the wise men, at the least such as will not allowe Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuoute man, and very wise in celestiall things, by inspiration from aboue: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the newe Curetes, that is to saye, Prophet: and he was thought the sonne of a Nymphe called Baltè. When he was come to ATHENS, and growen in friendshippe with Solon: he dyd helpe him much, and made his waye for establishing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their sacrifices much lighter, and of lesse

A leſſe coſte: & brought the cittizēs to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting of certaine ſeuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the moſt parte of the women obſerued in their mourning, & he ordeined certain ſacrifices which he would haue done immediately after the obſequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the reſt was, that by vſing the cittizēs vnto holines & deuotion, daylie ſacrifices, prayers vnto the godds, purging of them ſelues, & hūble offerings: he wanne mens hartes by litle & litle, to yelde them more cōfirmable to iuſtice, & to be more inclined to cōcorde & vnity. It is reported alſo that Epimenides, whē he ſaw the hauen of Munychia, & had long cōſidered of it: told thoſe about him, that men were very blinde in foreſeeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (ſayed he) knew, what hurt this hauen would bring thē: they would eate it (as they ſaye) with their teethe. It is ſayed alſo that Thales did pro-B gnoſticate ſuch a like thing, who after his deathe commaunded they ſhould burie his bodie, in ſome vile place of no reckoning, with in the territorie of the MILESIANS, ſaying that one daye there ſhould be the place of a cittie. Epimenides therfore being maruelouſly eſteemed of euery man for theſe cauſes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great preſents of money and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to geue him a boughe of the holy olyue: which they graunted him, and ſo he returned ſhortely home into CRETA. Nowe that this ſedition of Cylon was vtterly appeaſed in ATHENS, for that the excommunicates were baniſhed the countrie: the citty fell againe into their olde troubles and diſſentions about the gouernment of the common weale: & they were deuided into ſo diuers partes and factions, as there were people of ſundry places & territories within the countrie of C ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the people of the ſea coaſte. Thoſe of the mountaines, tooke the cōmon peoples parte for their liues. Thoſe of the valley, would a fewe of the beſt cittizens ſhould carie the ſwaye. The coaſte men would, that neither of thē ſhould preuaile, bicauſe they would haue had a meane gouernmēt, & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betwene the poore & riche, proceeding of their vnequalitie, was at that time very great. By reaſon whereof the cittie was in great daunger, and it ſeemed there was no waye to pacifie or take vp theſe controuerſies, vnles ſome tyraunt happened to riſe, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the cōmon people were ſo ſore indetted to the riche, that either they plowed their landes, & yelded them the ſixt parte of their croppe: (for which cauſe they were called Hectemorij and ſeruants) or els they D borowed money of them at vſurie, vpon gage of their bodies to ſerue it out. And if they were not able to paye them, then were they by the law deliuered to their creditours, who kept them as bonde men & ſlaues in their houſes, or els they ſent them into ſtraunge coūtries to be ſold: & many euen for very pouertie were forced to ſell their owne children (for there was no lawe to forbid the contrarie) or els to forſake their cittie & countrie, for the extreme cruelty & hard dealing of theſe abominable vſurers their creditours. Inſomuch as many of the luſtieſt & ſtowteſt of them, banded together in cōpanies, & incoraged one another, not to ſuffer & beare any lenger ſuch extremitie, but to chooſe them a ſtowte & truſty captaine, that might ſet them at libertie, and redeeme thoſe out of captiuity, which were iudged to be bondmen & ſeruants, for lacke of paying of their detts at their dayes appointed: & ſo to make againe a newe diuiſion of E all landes and tenements, and wholy to chaunge and turne vp the whole ſtate & gouernment. Then the wiſeſt men of the cittie, who ſawe Solon only neither partner with the riche in their oppreſſion, neither partaker with the poore in their neceſſitie: made ſute to him, that it would pleaſe him to take the matter in hande, & to appeaſe and pacifie all theſe broyles and ſedition. Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vſed a ſubtiltie, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other ſide, concerning the cōmon weale. For he ſecretly promiſed the poore to deuide the lands againe: & the riche alſo, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. Howſoeuer it fell out, it is very certain that Solon frō the beginning made it a great matter, & was very ſcrupulous to deale betwene them: fearing the couetouſnes of the one, & arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was choſen gouernour after Philōbrotus, & was made reformer of the rigour of the F lawes, & the tēperer of the ſtate & cōmō weale, by cōſent & agreemēt of both parties. The rich accepted him, bicauſe he was no begger: the poore did alſo like him, bicauſe he was an honeſt man. They ſaye moreouer, that one word & ſentēce which he ſpake (which at that preſent was Solō refuſeth to be a tyranne.

Tynnondas, and Pittacus tyrannes.

But his familier friendes aboue all rebuked him, ſaying he was to be accompted no better then a beaſt, if for feare of the name of tyranne, he would refuſe to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the moſt iuſt and honorable ſtate, if one take it vpon him that is an honeſt man. As in olde time, Tynnondas made him ſelfe King of thoſe of Negrepont, with their conſent: and as Pittacus was then preſently of thoſe of METELIN. Notwithſtanding, all theſe goodly reaſons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they ſaye he aunſwered his friendes, that principalitie and tyrannie, was in deede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, whē he was once entered into it. And in certen verſes that he wrote to Phocus, thus he ſayed:

Solons aunſwer for tyrannie.

I neither blushe, nor yet repent my ſelfe, that haue preſerude, my natiue ſoyle allvvayes, and that therein (to hourde vp trashe and pelfe) no tyrants thought, could once eclypſe my prayſe.
No might could moue, my minde to any vvronge, vvhich might beblot, the glory of my name:
for ſo I thought, to liue in honour longe, and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was choſen reformer of the ſtate, to ſtabliſh newe lawes: he was then of great countenaunce and authoritie. But he him ſelfe writeth, that many ſayed of him thus, after he had refuſed the occaſion of vſurping of this tyrannie:

Suer, Solon vvas a foole, and of a bashefull minde, that vvould refuſe the great good happe, vvhich goddes to him aſſignde.
The praye vvas in his handes, yet durſt he neuer drawve, the net therefore: but ſtoode abasht, and like a daſtarde dawve.

to be a King in Athens tovvne) him ſelfe (all quicke) haue flayen.
And eke ſubuerted quyte, his familie vvithall,
So ſvvete it is to rule the roſte, yclad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Nowe, notwithſtanding he had refuſed the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remiſſe nor ſofte therefore in gouerning, neither would he bowe for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking, that had choſen him their reformer. For where the miſchief was tollerable, he dyd not ſtraight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither dyd he ſo chaūge the ſtate, as he might haue done, leaſt if he ſhould haue attempted to turne vpſidowne the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to ſettle & ſtabliſhe the ſame againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reaſon he would perſuade his cittizens vnto, or els by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he ſaied, ſower with ſweete, & force with iuſtice. And herewith agreeth his aunſwer that he made afterwards, vnto one that asked him, if he had made the beſt lawes he could for the ATHENIANS? yea ſuer, ſayeth he, ſuch as they were to receiue. pleaſaunt

A pleasaunt, that be hatefull, finely conueying them vnder culler of pleasing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garrisons, gardes: prisones, houses. And all this came vp first by Solons inuẽtion, who called cleering of detts, Seisachtheian: in English, discharge. For the first chaunge & reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordeined that all manner of detts past should be cleere, and no bodye should aske his detter any thing for the time past. That no man should thenceforth lende money out to vsurie, vpon couenants for the bodye to be bounde, if it were not repayed. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were cõtẽted that the interest only for vsury should be moderated, without taking away the whole dett: & that Solon called this easie & gentle discharge, Seisachtheian, with crying vp the value of money. For he raised the pound of siluer, being before but three score and thirtene
B Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: so they which were to paye great summes of money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse number of peces then the dett could haue bene payed when it was borowed. And so the detters gayned much, & the creditours lost nothing. Neuertheles the more parte of them which haue written the same, saye, that this crying vp of money, was a generall discharge of all detts, conditions, & couenaunts vpon the same: whereto the very Poemes them selues, which Solon wrote, doe seeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bawkes & marcks, that separated mens lands through the countrie of ATTICA: & that now he had set at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the cittizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of payment of their dettes had bene condẽned for slaues to their creditours, he had brought many home again out of straũge
C coũtries, where they had bene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: & other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had nowe set them all at good libertie. But while he was a doing this, men saye a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruelously. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing of all detts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, and to geue it some prety preface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him selfe somewhat to certaine of his familiers whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) & tolde them how he would not medle with landes and possessions, but would only cleere and cut of all mãner of detts. These men before the proclamation came out, went presently to the money men, & borowed great summes of money of them, & layed it out straight vpon lãde. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchased, but restored not D the money they had borowed. This fowle parte of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of, & wrõgfully blamed: as if he had not only suffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong, & iniustice. Notwithstãding he cleared him self of this slaunderous reporte, losing fiue talents by his owne lawe. For it was well knowen that so much was due vnto him, & he was the first that following his owne proclamation, dyd clearely release his detters of the same. Other saye he was owing fifteene talents: and among the same, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they euer after called Solons friendes, Greocopides, cutters of detts. This lawe neither liked the one nor the other sorte. For it greatly offended the riche, for cancelling their bondes: and it much more misliked the poore, bicause all landes and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, & euery bodye a like riche and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the E LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuẽth descended of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authoritie, & made him self many friends: all which things together, dyd greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuasion then force, a good witnes thereof, the losse of his eye: preferring a lawe before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preserue a cittie long in vnion and concorde, and to make cittizens to be neither poore nor riche. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one seeking to winne no credit with his cittizẽs, but onely by his counsaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the more parte of the cittie, by his proclamation which he made: he him self doth

A good lawemaker, beginneth to doe iuſtice in him ſelfe.

Euen thoſe vvhich earſt, did beare me frendly face, and ſhake full fayer, vvhere euer I them met:

gan nowe beginne, to looke full grym of grace, and were (like foes) in force against me set.
As if I had done them, some spite or scorne, or open wrong, which were not to be borne.

Neuertheles he sayeth immediately after, that with the same authoritie and power he had, a man possibly

Could not controll, the peoples mindes:
nor still their braynes, which wrought like windes.

But shortely after, hauing a feeling of the benefit of his ordinaunce, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrell: they altogether made a common sacrifice, which they called the sacrifice of Seisachthia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the lawe, and of the whole state of the cõmon weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of state, common assemblies, voyces in election, iudgemẽts in iustice, and the bodie of the Senate. And they gaue him also full power and authoritie, to sesse and taxe any of them, to appointe the number, what time the sesse should continewe, and to keepe, confirme, and disanull at his pleasure, any of the auncient lawes and customes then in being. To beginne withall, he first tooke away all Dracons bloudy lawes, sauing for murder, and man slaughter, which were to seuere & cruell. For almost he dyd ordaine but one kinde of punishment, for all kinde of faultes and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idlenes, were iudged to dye. And pety larceny, as robbing mens horteyards, & gardens of fruite, or erbes, was as seuerely punished: as those who had committed sacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountered it pleasauntly, when he sayed: that Dracons lawes were not written with incke, but with bloud. And Draco him selfe being asked one daye, why his punishmẽts were so vnequall, as death for all kinde of faultes: he aunswered. Bicause he thought the least offence worthie so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being desirous to haue the chief offices of the cittie to remaine in riche mens handes, as already they dyd, and yet to mingle the authoritie of gouernment in such sorte, as the meaner people might beare a litle swaye, which they neuer could before: he made an estimate of the goodes of euery priuate cittizen. And those which he founde yerely worthe fiue hundred bussh ells of corne, & other liquide fruites and vpwards, he called Pentacosiomedimnes: as to saye, fiue hundred bussh ell men of reuenue. And those that had three hundred bussh ells a yere, and were able to keepe a horse of seruice, he put in the second degree, and called them knightes. They that might dispend but two hundred bussh ells a yere, were put in the thirde place, & called Zeugites. All other vnder those, were called Thetes, as ye would saye, hyerlings, or craftes men liuing of their labour: whom he dyd not admit to beare any office in the cittie, neither were they taken as free cittizens, sauing they had voyces in elections, and assemblies of the cittie, and in iudgements, where the people wholy iudged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwardes they felt it was to great purpose: for hereby the most parte of priuate quarrells and strifes that grewe among them, were in the ende layed open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgement in their causes. Furthermore, bicause his lawes were written somewhat obscurely, and might be diuersely taken and interpreted: this dyd geue a great deale more authoritie and power to the iudges. For, considering all their controuersies could not be ended, and iudged by expresse lawe: they were driuen of necessitie allwayes to ronne to the iudges, and debated their matters before them. In so muche as the iudges by this meanes came to be somewhat aboue the lawe: for they dyd euen expounde it as they would them selues. Solon selfdoth note this equall diuision of the publicke authoritie, in a place of his poesies, where he sayeth.

Solons absolute authority in the common weale.

Solon tooke awaye all Dracõs lawes.

Solon rateth euerie cittizen at a certen summe.

The darknes of the lawe increased, the authoritie of the iudge.

Suche powver haue I geuen, to common peoples hande, as might become their meane estate, with equity to stande:
and as I haue not pluckt, from them their dignitie, so haue I not to much increast, their small authoritie.
Vnto the riche likewise, I haue allowed no more,
then well might seeme (in iust conceit) sufficient for their store.

And ſo I haue for both prouided in ſuch vviſe, that neither ſhall eche other vvrong, nor ſeeme for to deſpiſe.

Yet conſidering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common ſorte of people: he ſuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence, of any poore mans caſe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurte, beaten, forced, or otherwiſe wronged: any other man that would, might lawfully ſue the offendour, and proſecute lawe againſt him. And this was a wiſe lawe ordeined of him, to accuſtome his cittizens to be ſorie one for anothers hurte, & ſo to feele it, as if any parte of his owne bodie had bene iniured. And they ſaye he made an aunſwer on a time, agreable to this law. For, being asked what cittie he thought beſt gouerned: he aunſwered. That cittie where ſuch as receyue no wronge, doe as earneſtly defend wrõg offered to other, as the very wrong & iniurie had bene done vnto them ſelues. He erected alſo the coũſaill of the Areopagites, of thoſe magiſtrates of the cittie, out of which they did yerely chooſe their gouernour: & he him ſelf had bene of that number, for that he had bene gouernour for a yere. Wherfore perceyuing now the people were growen to a ſtomake, & hawtines of minde, bicauſe they were cleare diſcharged of their detts: he ſet one vp for matters of ſtate, another counſell of an hundred choſen out of euery tribe, whereof foure hũdred of them were to conſult & debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great counſell of the people at large ſhould be aſſembled, no matters ſhould be put forth, onles it had bene before well conſidered of, & digeſted, by the counſell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordeined the higher courte ſhould haue the chiefe authoritie & power ouer all things, and chiefly to ſee the lawe executed and mainteined: ſuppoſing that the common weale being ſettled, and ſtayed with theſe two courtes (as with two ſtronge anker holdes) it ſhould be the leſſe turmoyled and troubled, and the people alſo better pacified and quieted. The moſt parte of writers holde this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counſaill of the Areopagites, as we haue ſayed, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his lawes and ordinaunces made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but allwayes ſpeaketh to the Ephetes (which were iudges of life and death) when he ſpake of murder, or of any mans death. Notwithſtanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon ſayeth thus, in theſe very words. All ſuch as haue bene baniſhed or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his laws, ſhalbe reſtored againe to their goodes and good name, except thoſe which were condemned by order of the counſaill of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open courte, for murder, and death of any man, or for aſpiring to vſurpe tyrannie. Theſe wordes to the contrarie, ſeeme to proue and teſtifie, that the counſell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was choſen reformer of the lawes. For howe could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counſell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the firſt that gaue it authoritie to iudge? onles a man will ſaye peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obſcure and darke, and would ſupply that they lacked, with expounding of the ſame by them. Thoſe which ſhalbe founde attainted and conuicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the counſaill of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernours of the cittie when this lawe ſhall come forth: ſhall ſtand condemned ſtill, and all other ſhalbe pardoned, reſtored, and ſet at libertie. Howſoeuer it is, ſure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore amongeſt the reſt of his lawes, one of them in deede was of his owne deuiſe: for the like was neuer ſtabliſhed els where. And it is that lawe, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhoneſt, who in a ciuill vprore among the cittizens, ſitteth ſtill a looker on, and a neawter, and taketh parte with neither ſide. Whereby his minde was as it ſhould appeare, that priuate men ſhould not be only carefull to put them ſelues & their cauſes in ſafety, nor yet ſhould be careles for others mens matters, or thincke it a vertue not to medle with the miſeries and miſfortunes of their countrie, but from the beginning of euery ſedition that they ſhould ioyne with thoſe that take the iuſteſt cauſe in hande, and rather to hazarde them ſelues with ſuch, then to tarie looking (without putting them ſelues in daunger) which of the two ſhould haue the victorie. There is another lawe alſo, which at the firſt ſight me thinketh is very vnhoneſt and fond. That if any man according to the lawe hath matched with a riche heire & inheritour, and of him ſelfe is impotent, and vnable to doe the office of a husband, ſhe maye lawfully lye with any whom ſhe liketh, of her husbands neareſt kinſemen. Howbeit ſome affirme, A that it is a wiſe made lawe for thoſe, which knowing them ſelues vnmeete to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetouſnes of landes, marye with riche heires and poſſeſſioners, and minde to abuſe poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of lawe: and will thincke to force and reſtraine nature. For, ſeeing the lawe ſuffereth an inheritour or poſſeſſioner thus ill beſtowed, at her pleaſure to be bolde with any of her husbands kynne: men will either leaue to purchaſe ſuch mariages, or if they be ſo careles that they will nedes marye, it ſhalbe to their extreme ſhame and ignominie, and ſo ſhall they deſeruedly paye for their greedy couetouſnes. And the lawe is well made alſo, bicauſe the wife hath not ſcope to all her husbands kynſemen, but vnto one choyce man whom ſhe liketh beſt of his houſe: to the ende that the children that ſhalbe borne, ſhalbe at the leaſt of her husbands bloude and kynred. This alſo confirmeth the ſame, B that ſuch a newe maryed wife ſhould be ſhut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that he alſo which maryeth ſuch an inheritour, ſhould of duety ſee her thryſe a moneth at the leaſt. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honeſt woman, that he loueth her, and that he eſteemeth of her. Beſides, it taketh awaye many miſlikings and diſpleaſures which oftentimes happen in ſuch caſes, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it dye not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke awaye all ioynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wiues ſhould bring their husbands but three gownes only, with ſome other litle moueables of ſmall value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they ſhould buye their husbands, or that they ſhould make marchaundiſe of mariages, C as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman ſhould marye together for iſſue, for pleaſure, and for loue, but in no caſe for money. And for proofe hereof, Dionyſius the tyranne of SICILE, one daye aunſwered his mother (which would needes be maried to a young man of SYRACVSA) in this ſorte. I haue power (ſaieth he) to breake the lawes of SYRACVSA, by hauing the Kingdome: but to force the law of nature, or to make mariage without the reaſonable compaſſe of age, that paſſeth my reache and power. So is it not tolerable, and much leſſe allowable alſo, that ſuch diſorder ſhould be in well ordered citties, that ſuch vncomely and vnfit mariages ſhould be made, betweene coples of ſo vnequall yeres: conſidering there is no meete nor neceſſary ende of ſuch matches. A wiſe gouernour of a cittie, or a iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well ſaye to an olde man that ſhould D marye with a young mayde, as the Poet ſayeth of Philoctetes:

Ah ſeely vvretche, hovv trymme a man arte thou, at theſe young yeres, for to be maryed novve?

Solon forbiddeth iointers and dowries.

Dionyſius ſaying of mariages.

And finding a young man in an olde riche womans houſe, getting his liuing by riding of her errants, and waxing fat as they ſaye the partridge doth by treading of the hennes: he maye take him from thence, to beſtowe him on ſome young mayde that ſhall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another lawe of Solons, which forbiddeth to ſpeake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touche the dead, no more than to touche holy things: and men ſhould take great heede to offende thoſe that are departed out of this world, beſides it is a token of wiſe- E dome and ciuillitie, to beware of immortall enemies. He commaunded alſo in the ſelfe ſame lawe, that no man ſhould ſpeake ill of the liuing, ſpecially in Churches, during diuine ſeruice, or in counſaill chamber of the cittie, nor in the Theaters whileſt games were a playing: vpon payne of three ſiluer *Drachmes to be payed to him that was iniured, & two to the common treaſurie. For he thought it to much ſhameles boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreouer, that ſuch lacked ciuillitie and good manners: and yet altogether to ſuppreſſe and ſmother it, he knewe it was not only a harde matter, but to ſome natures vnpoſſible. And he that maketh lawes, muſt haue regarde to the common poſſibilitie of men, if he will puniſhe litle, with profitable example, and not much without ſome profit. So was he marueloufly well thought of, for the lawe that he made touching willes and teſtaments. For before, F men might not lawfully make their heires whom they would, but the goodes came to the childrē or kynred of the teſtatour. But he leauing it at libertie, to diſpoſe their goods where they

A lawe for willes and teſtaments.

A they thought good, ſo they had no children of their owne: dyd therein preferre friendſhip before kynred, and good will and fauour before neceſſitie and conſtraínte, and ſo made euery one lorde and maſter of his owne goodes. Yet he dyd not ſimply and a like allowe all ſortes of giftes, howſoeuer they were made: but thoſe only which were made by men of ſound memorie, or by thoſe whoſe wittes fayled them not by extreme ſicknes, or through drincks, medicines, poyſonings, charmes, or other ſuch violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither yet through the intiſements and perſuaſions of women. As thincking very wiſely, there was no difference at all betweene thoſe that were euidently forced by conſtraint, and thoſe that were compaſſed and wrought by ſubornation at length to doe a thing againſt their will, taking fraude in this caſe equall with violence, and pleaſure with ſorowe, as paſſions with mad-
B nes, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to drawe and driue men from reaſon. He made another lawe alſo, in which he appointed women their times to goe abroade into the fieldes, their mourning, their feaſtes and ſacrifices, plucking from them all diſorder and wilfull libertie, which they vſed before. For he dyd forbid that they ſhould carie out of the cittie with them aboue three gownes, and to take vittells with them aboue the value of an halfe pennie, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite highe: and ſpecially he dyd forbid them to goe in the night, other then in their coche, and that a torche ſhould be caried before them. He dyd forbid them alſo at the buriall of the dead, to teare and ſpoyle themſelues with blowes, to make lamentations in verſes, to weepe at the funeralles of a ſtraunger not being their kinſeman, to ſacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to burie aboue three C gownes with the corſe, to goe to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corſe: all which or the moſt parte of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this daye. Moreouer, thoſe lawes appointe a penaltie vpon ſuch women as offend in the ſame, to be diſtrayned for, by certaine officers expreſſely named, to controll and reforme the abuſes of women, as womaniſh perſones and faynte harted, which ſuffer them ſelues to be ouercome with ſuch paſſions and fondnes in their mourning. And perceyuing that the cittie of ATHENS beganne to repleniſh daylie more and more, by mens repayring thither from all partes, and by reaſon of the great aſſured ſafetie, and libertie that they founde there: and alſo conſidering howe the greateſt parte of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffeking the ſeas, are not wonte to bring any marchaundiſe to thoſe, which can geue them nothing a-D gaine in exchaunge: he beganne to practiſe that his cittizens ſhould giue them ſelues vnto craftes and occupations, and made a lawe, that the ſonne ſhould not be bounde to relieue his father being olde, onles he had ſet him in his youth to ſome occupation. It was a wiſe parte of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a cittie where was no reſorte of ſtraungers, and had ſo great a territorie as could haue furniſhed twiſe as many people, as Euripides ſayeth, and moreouer on all ſides was enuironned with a great number of ſlaues of the ILOTES, whom it was needefull to keepe ſtill in labour and worcke continually) to haue his cittizens allwayes occupied in exerciſes of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other ſcience, but diſcharged them of all other miſerable occupations and handy craftes. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, & not things vnto lawes, when he ſawe the countrie of ATTICA ſo leane and barren, E that it could hardely bring forth to ſuſteine thoſe that tilled the grounde only, and therefore much more impoſſible to keepe ſo great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requiſite to ſet vp occupations, and to geue them countenaunce and eſtimation. Therefore he ordeined, that the counſaill of the Areopagites, ſhould haue full power, and authoritie to enquier how euery man liued in the cittie, & alſo to puniſhe ſuch as they found idle people, and dyd not labour. But this was thought to ſeuere and ſtraight a lawe which he ordeined (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlotts and ſtrumpets ſhould not be bounde to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainely ſheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but only to ſatisfie his luſt and pleaſure: and ſo ſuch an one hath his iuſt reward, and is diſapointed of the reue-F rẽce that a father ought to haue of his children, ſince through his owne faulte the birth of his childe falleth out to his reproche. Yet to ſaye truely, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many obſurdities, as they fall out ill fauoredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the facte. But he that rauisheth or forcibly taketh awaye a free woman, is only condemned to paye a hundred siluer * drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, should only paye twenty drachmes. Onles she had bene a common strumpet or curtisan: for such doe iustefy open accesse, to all that will hier them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any persone to sell his daughters or sisters, onles the father or brother had taken them, abusing them selues before mariage. Me thincketh it is farre from purpose and reason, with seueritie to punish a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to passe it ouer in another: or to set some light fine on ones head for a great faulte, and after to discharge him, as it were but a matter of sporte. Onles they will excuse it thus, that money being very harde & scante at that time in ATHENS, those fines were then very great & grieuous to paye. For in setting out the charges of offerings which should be made in sacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he setteth a busshell of corne at a siluer drachme. More he ordeined, that they which wonne any of the games at ATHENS, should paye to the common treasurie an hundred drachmes. And those that wõne any of the games Olympicall, fiue hũdred drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought a he woulfe, should haue fiue drachmes, & him one drachme for reward of a she woulfe. Whereof as Demetrius Phalerian writeth: the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordeined in the sixtenth table of his lawes mete for burnt sacrifices, it is likely he dyd rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarilie they were worth: and yet notwithstanding, the price which he setteth, is very litle in comparison of that which they are worth at this daye. Nowe it was a custome euer amongest the ATHENIANS to kill their woulfes, bicause all their coũtrie laye for pasture, & not for tillage. Some there be that saye, the tribes of the people of ATHENS haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades & manners of liuing, which they tooke them selues vnto from the beginning. For, such as gaue them selues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would saye, men of armes. Those that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to saye, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would saye, labouring men. And those that kept beastes & cattell, were called Ægicores: as much to saye, as heard men. Nowe, forasmuch as the whole prouince of ATTICA was very drye, and had great lacke of water, being not full of riuers, ronning streames, nor lakes, nor yet stored with any great nũber of springs, insomuch as they are driuen there to vse (through the most parte of the countrie) water drawen out of welles made with mens handes: he made such an order, that where there was any well within the space of an Hippicon, that euery bodye within that circuite, might come and drawe water onely at that well, for his vse and necessitie. Hippicon is the distaunce of foure furlonges, which is halfe a mile: & those that dwelt further of, should goe seeke their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged tenne yardes deepe in their grounde, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this case, they might lawfully goe to their next neighbours well, and take a pot full of water conteining six gallons, twise a daye: iudging it great reason that necessitie should be holpen, but not that idlenes should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept & obserued by those, that would set or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very skilfull in these matters. For he ordeined, that whosoeuer would plante any kynde of trees in his grounde, he should set them fiue foote a sonder one from another: but for the figge tree and olyue tree specially, that they should in any case be nine foote a sonder, bicause these two trees doe spread out their branches farre of, & they cannot stand neere other trees, but they must needes hurte them very much. For besides that they drawe awaye the same that doth nourishe the other trees, they cast also a certaine moisture & steame vpon them, that is very hurtefull & incõmodious. More he ordeined, that whosoeuer would digge a pytte or hole in his grounde, he should digge it as farre of from his neighbours pyt, as the pytte he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would set vp a hiue of bees in his grounde, he should set them at the least three hundred foote from other hiues set about him before. And of the fruites of the earth, he was contented they should transporte and sell only oyle out of the Realme to straungers, but no other fruite or graine. He ordeined that the gouernour

A uernour of the cittie ſhould yerely proclaime open curſes againſt thoſe that ſhould doe to the contrarie, or els he him ſelfe making default therein, ſhould be fined at a hundred drachmes. Drachmæ. This ordinaunce is in the firſt table of Solon lawes, and therefore we maye not altogether diſcredit thoſe which ſaye, they did forbid in the olde time that men ſhould carie figges out of the countrie of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that theſe picke thanckes, which bewraye & accuſe them that tranſported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another lawe alſo againſt the hurte that beaſtes might doe vnto men. Wherein he ordeined, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him ſhould deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tyed to a logge of timber of foure cubites longe: & this was a very good deuiſe, to make men ſafe from dogges. But he was very ſtraight in one lawe he made, that no ſtraunger might be made deni-
B zen and free man of the cittie of ATHENS, onles he were a baniſhed man for euer out of his countrie, or els that he ſhould come & dwell there with all his familie, to exerciſe ſome craſte or ſcience. Notwithſtanding, they ſaye he made not this lawe ſo much to put ſtraungers from there freedome there, as to drawe them thither, aſſuring them by this ordinaunce, they might come and be free of the cittie: and he thought moreouer, that both the one & the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of ATHENS. The one of them, for that againſt their willes they were driuen to forſake their countrie: & the other ſorte, for that aduiſedly and willingly they were contented to forſake it. This alſo was another of Solons lawes, which he ordeined for thoſe that ſhould feaſt certē dayes at the towne houſe of the cittie, at other mens coſt. For he would not allow, that one man ſhould come often to feaſts there. And if any man were Feaſts for townes men in the towne hall of Athēs.
C inuited thither to the feaſt, and dyd refuſe to come: he dyd ſet a fine on his head, as reprouing the miſerable niggardlines of the one, and the preſumptuous arrogancy of the other, to contemne & deſpiſe common order. After he had made his lawes, he dyd ſtabliſhe them to continewe for the ſpace of one hundred yeres, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, Axones. which were made more long then broade, in the which they were graueh: whereof there remaine ſome monuments yet in our time, which are to be ſeene in the towne hall of the cittie of ATHENS. Ariſtotle ſayeth, that theſe tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus alſo the Comi- Cyrbes.
call poet ſayeth in one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veſſell or panne wherein they dyd frye millet or hirſe. Howbeit others ſaye, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which conteined the ordinaunces of the ſacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the D common weale. So, all the counſels & magiſtrates together dyd ſweare, that they would kepe Solons lawes them ſelues, & alſo cauſe them to be obſerued of others throughly & particularly. Then euery one of the Theſmothetes (which were certaine officers attēdaunt on the counſell, Theſmothetes. & had ſpeciall charge to ſee the lawes obſerued) dyd ſolēnly ſweare in the open market place, neere the ſtone where the proclamations are proclaimed: and euery of them, both promiſed, & vowed openly to keepe the ſame lawes, & that if any of them dyd in any one pointe breake the ſaid ordinaunces, then they were content that ſuch offender ſhould paye to the temple of Apollo, at the cittie of DELPHES, an image of fine golde, that ſhould waye as much as him ſelf. Moreouer Solon ſeeing the diſorder of the moneths, & the mouing of the moone, which followed not the courſe of the ſunne, & vſed nót to riſe & fall when the ſunne doth, but oftetimes
E in one daye, it doth both touche & paſſe the ſunne: he was the firſt that called the chaunge of the moone, Ene caì néa, as much to ſaye, as olde and newe moone. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth paſt: & that which ſhewed it ſelf after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the firſt alſo (in my opinion) that vnderſtoode Homer rightly, when he ſayed: then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the chaunge, he called Neomenia, as much to ſaye, as the newe moneth, or the newe moone. After the twenty day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckoned not the reſt of the moneth, as increaſing, but as in the wane: & gathered it by ſeing the light of the moone decreaſing vntill the thirtie day. Now after his lawes were come abroade, & proclaimed, there came ſome daylie vnto him, which either praiſed them, or miſliked them: & prayed him either F to take awaye, or to adde ſome thing vnto them. Many againe came & asked him, howe he vnderſtoode ſome ſentēce of his lawes: & requeſted him to declare his meaning, & how it ſhould be taken. Wherefore conſidering howe it were to no purpoſe to refuſe to doe it, and againe howe it would get him much enuie & ill will to yelde thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to winde him selfe out of these bryars, and to flye the gronings, complaints, and quarrells of his cittizens. For he sayeth him selfe: A Full harde it is, all mindes content to haue,

So, to conuey him self a while out of the waye, he tooke vpon him to be master of a shippe in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for tenne yeres of the ATHENIANS to goe beyond sea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes. So went he to the seas, & the first place of his arriuall was in EGYPT, where he remained a while, as he him self sayeth. Solōs trauell.

Euen there vvhere Nylus, vvith his crooked cranckes

He went to his booke there, and dyd conferre a certaine time with Psenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wisest priestes at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearse the storie of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the same in verse, & dyd send it abroade through GRECE. At his departure out of EGYPT he went into CYPRVS, where he had great curtesy & friendshipp of one of the princes of that countrie, called Philocyprus, who was lorde of a prety litle cittie which Demophon (Theseus sonne) caused to be built vpon the riuer of Clarie, & was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren coūtrie. Whereupō Solon tolde him, it would doe better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very fayer & pleasaunt valley that laye vnderneath it, and there to make it larger & statelier then it was: which was done according to his persuasiō. And Solon self being present at it, was made ouerseer of the buildings, which he dyd helpe to deuise and order in good sorte, aswell in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence: insomuch as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other lordes of the countrie dyd followe th' example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called his cittie SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his wordes vnto Philocyprus, as followeth. Clarius fl. C AEpia called Soles.

And as for the meeting & talke betwext him & king Cræsus, I know there are that by distāce of time will proue it but a fable, & deuised of pleasure: but for my parte I will not reiect, nor cōdemne so famous an historie, receiued & approued by so many graue testimonies. Moreouer it is very agreable to Solons māners & nature, & also not vnlike to his wisedom & magnanimitie: E although in all pointes it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they haue busily noted the order and course of times which euen to this daye, many haue curiously sought to correct, & could yet neuer discusse it, nor accorde all contrarieties & manifest repugnaunces in the same. Solon at the desire & request of Cræsus, went to see him in the cittie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the selfe same taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne & bred vp on the mayne lande, & had neuer seene the sea neither farre nor neere, did imagine euery riuer that he sawe had bene the sea. So Solon passing alongest Cræsus palace, & meeting by the waye many of the lordes of his courte richely apparelled, & carying great traines of seruing men, & souldiers about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Cræsus selfe. Who was F passing richely arrayed, what for precious stones & iuells, & for riche cullered silkes, layed on with curious goldsmithes worke, & all to shewe him selfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, & Solon sawe king Cræsus in the cittie of Sardis.

A magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repayre to his presence, that he shewed no manner of signe, nor countenance of woundring, to see so great a state before him, neither had geuen out any word neere or likely to that which Cræsus looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had deliuered speaches for men of iudgement and vnderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did mislike Cræsus foolish vanitie & base minde: then Cræsus commaunded all his treasuries to be opened where his golde & siluer laye, next that they should shewe him his riche & sumptuous wardroppes, although that needed not: for to see Cræsus self, it was enough to discerne his nature & condition. After he had seene all ouer & ouer, being brought againe vnto the presence of the King: Cræsus asked him, if euer he had seene any mā more happy than him self was? Solon aūswered him, I haue: & that was one Tellus a cittizen of ATHENS, who was

B a maruelous honest man, & had left his children behind him in good estimatiō, & well to liue, & lastly, was most happy at his death, by dying honorably in the field, in defence of his coūtrie. Cræsus hearing this aunswer, beganne to iudge him a man of litle witte, or of grosse vnderstanding, bicause he did not thincke that to haue store of gold & siluer, was the only ioye & felicitie of the world, & that he would preferre the life & death of a meane & priuate man as more happy, than all the riches & power of so mightie a King. Notwithstanding all this, Cræsus yet asked him again: What other man beside Tellus he had seene happier than him self? Solon aunswered him, that he had seene Cleobis & Biton, which were both brethern, & loued one another singularly well, & their mother in such sorte: that vpon a solemne festiuall daye, when she Cleobis & Biton, happy mē.

C should goe to the tēple of Iuno in her coche drawen with oxen: bicause they taried to long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoked them selues by the necks, & drue their mothers coche in stead of the oxen, which maruelously reioyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to haue borne two such sonnes. Afterwards when they had done sacrifice to the goddesse, & made good cheere at the feast of this sacrifice, they went to bed: but they rose not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurte or sorowe, after they had receyued so much glorie & honour. Cræsus then could no lōger bridell in his pacience, but breaking out in choller, sayed vnto him: why, doest theu recken me than in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increase his heate, but aūswered him thus: O King of LYDIANS, the godds haue geuē vs GRECIANS all things in a meane;

Solon commēdeth the meane.

& amongest other things chiefly, a base & popular wisedome, not princely nor noble: which,

D considering howe mans life is subiect to infinite chaunges, doth forbid vs to trust or glorie in these worldly riches. For time bringeth daylie misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of, nor looked for. But when the goddes haue continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we thinke that man happy and blessed, and neuer before. Otherwise, if we should iudge a man happy that liueth, considering he is euer in daunger of chaūge during life: we should be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victorie before hande, that is still a fighting, & maye be ouercomen, hauing no suertie yet to carie it away. After Solon had spoken these words, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned backe againe, leauing king Cræsus offended, but nothing the wiser, nor amended. Nowe Æsope that wrote the fables, being at that time in the cittie of SARDIS, & sent for thither by the King, who entertained him very honorably: was ve-

E ry sorie to see that the King had geuen Solon no better entertainement: so by waye of aduise he said vnto him. O Solon, either we must not come to princes at all, or els we must seeke to please & content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, aunswered him: either we must not come to princes, or we must needes tell them truely, & counsell them for the best. So Cræsus made light accompt of Solon at that time. But after he had lost the battell against Cyrus, and that his cittie was taken, him self became prisoner, & was bounde fast to a gibbet, ouer a great stacke of wood, to be burnt in the sight of all the PERSIANS, & of Cyrus his enemie: he then cried out as lowde as he could, thryse together. O Solon. Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him, whether this Solon he only cried vpon in his extreme miserie, was a god or man. Cræsus kept it not secret from him, but sayed: he was one of the wise men of GRECE, whom I sent for to come vnto me know it, that the riches I poſſeſſed then, were but words & opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter ſorowe, and to preſent and remediles calamitie. Which the wiſe GRECIAN conſidering then, and foreſeeing a farre of by my doings at that time, the inſtant miſerie I ſuffer nowe: gaue me warning I ſhould marke the ende of my life, and that I ſhould not to farre preſume of my ſelfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glorie of opinion of happines, the ground ther. of being ſo ſlippery, and of ſo litle ſuertie. Theſe wordes being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wiſer than Craeſus, & ſeeing Solons ſaying confirmed by ſo notable an example: he dyd not only deliuer Craeſus from preſent perill of death, but euer after honoured him ſo long as he liued. Thus had Solon glorie, for ſauing the honour of one of theſe Kings: & the life of the other, by his graue & wiſe counſaill. But during the time of his abſence, great ſeditions roſe at ATHENS amongeſt the inhabitants, who had gotten them ſeuerall heades amongeſt them: as thoſe of the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coaſt men, Megacles, the ſonne of Alcmæon. And thoſe of the mountaines, Piſiſtratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men liuing of their hādie labour were ioyned, which were the ſtowteſt againſt the riche. So that notwithſtanding the cittie kept Solons lawes and ordinaunces, yet was there not that man but gaped for a chaunge, and deſired to ſee things in another ſtate: either parties hoping their condition would mende by chaunge, and that euery of them ſhould be better than their aduerſaries. The whole common weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arriued at ATHENS, where euery mā did honour and reuerence him, howbeit he was no more able to ſpeake alowde in open aſſembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, bicauſe his age would not ſuffer him: & therefore he ſpake with euery one of the heades of the ſeuerall factions a parte, trying if he could agree and reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Piſiſtratus ſeemed to be more willing then any of the reſt, for he was curteous, and maruelous fayer ſpoken, and ſhewed him ſelfe beſides, very good and pittiefull to the poore, and temperate alſo to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he dyd ſo finely counterfeate it, that men imagined it was more in him, than in thoſe that naturally had it in them in deede. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aſpiring no higher, and hating thoſe which would attempt to chaunge the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and would practiſe any innouation. By this arte and fine manner of his, he deceyued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him ſtraight, and ſawe the marke he ſhot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and ſought ſtill to winne him, and bring him to reaſon, ſaying oftetimes, both to him ſelfe, and to others. That who ſo could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he aſpired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedy deſire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better cittizen than he would proue. About this time begāne Theſpis to ſet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delited the people for the rarenes thereof, being not many poets yet in number, to ſtriue one againſt another for victorie, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally deſirous to heare and learne, and by reaſon of his age ſeeking to paſſe his time awaye in ſportes, in muſicke, & making good cheere more then euer he dyd: went one daye to ſee Theſpis, who played a parte him ſelfe, as the olde facion of the Poets was, and after the playe was ended, he called him to him, and asked him: if he were not aſhamed to lye ſo openly in the face of the worlde. Theſpis aunſwered him, that it was not materiall to doe or ſaye any ſuch things, conſidering all was but in ſporte. Then Solon beating the grounde with his ſtaffe he had in his hande: but if we commend lying in ſporte (q. he) we ſhall finde it afterwards in good earneſt, in all our bargaines & dealings. Shortely after Piſiſtratus hauing wounded him ſelf, and bloudied all his bodie ouer, cauſed his men to carie him in his coche into the market place, where he put the people in an vprore, & tolde them that they were his enemies that thus traiterouſly had hādled & arraied him, for that he ſtoode with them about the gouerning of the cōmon weale: inſomuch as many of thē were maruelouſly offended, & mutined by & by, crying out it was ſhamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere ſayed vnto him, O thou ſonne of Hippocrates, thou doeſt ill fauoredly coūterfeate the perſone of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou haſt whipped thy ſelf to deceiue thy cittizēs, as he did teare & ſcratch him ſelf, to deceiue his enemies. Notwithſtanding this, the common people were ſtill in vprore, being ready to take armes for Piſiſtratus: and there was a generall counſell aſſembled, in the which one Ariſton ſpake,

A ſpake, that they ſhould graunte fiftie men, to cary holberds and maſes before Piſiſtratus for garde of his perſone. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, ſtowtely inuayed againſt it: and perſuaded the people with many reaſons, like vnto theſe he wrote afterwards in verſe.

Eche one of you (ô men) in priuate actes, can playe the foxe, for ſlye and ſubtill craft: But vvhen you come, yfore (in all your factes) then are you blinde, dull vvitted and bedaft.
For pleaſaunt ſpeathe, and painted flatterie, beguile you ſtill, the vvhich you neuer ſpye.

But in the ende, ſeeing the poore people dyd tumult ſtill, taking Piſiſtratus parte, and that B the riche fled here and there, he went his waye alſo, ſaying: he had ſhewed him ſelfe wiſer than ſome, and hardier than other. Meaning, wiſer than thoſe which ſawe not Piſiſtratus reache and fetche: and hardier than they which knewe very well he dyd aſpire to be King, and yet neuertheles durſt not reſiſt him. The people went on with the motion of Ariſton, and authoriſed the ſame, touching the graunte of halberders: limiting no number, but ſuffered him to haue about him and to aſſemble, as many as he would, vntill ſuch time as he had gotten poſſeſſion of the caſtell. Then the cittie was marueloufly affrayed and amazed: and preſently Megacles, and all thoſe which were of the houſe of the Alcmeonides dyd flye. Solon, who for yeares was now at his laſt caſt, and had no man to ſticke vnto him: went notwithſtanding into C the market place, and ſpake to the cittizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaſtlines, and faynte cowardly hartes, and encouraged them not to loſe their libertie. He ſpake at that time notably, and worthie memorie, which euer after was remembred. Before ſayed he, you might more eaſely haue ſtayed this preſent tyrannie: but nowe that it is already facioned, you ſhall winne more glorie, vtterly to ſuppreſſe it. But for all his goodly reaſons, he found no man that would hearken to him, they were all ſo amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his houſe, and layed them before his gate in the middeſt of the ſtreete, ſaying. For my parte, I haue done what I can poſſible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my countrie. So from that time he betooke him ſelfe vnto his eaſe, and neuer after delt any more in matters of ſtate, or common weale. His friends dyd counſell him to flye; but all they could not perſuade him to it. For he kept his houſe, and gaue him ſelfe Solons libertie & conſtancie.
D to make verſes: in which he ſore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, ſaying:

If preſently, your burden heauy be:
yet murmure not againſt the godds therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your ſelues maye ſee, vvhich graunted haue of mightie mars the lore, to ſuch as nowe, by your direction doe holde your necks, in this ſubiection.

His friends hereupon dyd warne him, to beware of ſuch ſpeaches, and to take hede what he ſayed: leaſt if it came vnto the tyrannes eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he truſted, that he ſpake ſo boldly. He aunſwered them, in my age.
E Howbeit Piſiſtratus after he had obteined his purpoſe, ſending for him vpon his worde and faith, dyd honour and entertaine him ſo well, that Solon in the ende became one of his counſaill, and approued many things which he dyd. For Piſiſtratus him ſelfe dyd ſtraightly keepe, and cauſed his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Inſomuch as when he was called by proces into the courte of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrante: he preſented him ſelfe very modeſtly to aunſwer his accuſation, and to purge him ſelfe thereof. But his accuſer let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Piſiſtratus him ſelfe alſo dyd make newe lawes: as this. That he that had bene maymed, and made lame of any member in the A good lawe for reward of ſeruice.
warres, ſhould be mainteined all his life long, at the common charges of the cittie. The ſelfe ſame was before decreed by Therſippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perſuaſion: who dyd F preferre it to the counſell. Piſiſtratus afterwards tooke holde of the motion, and from thence forth made it a generall lawe. Theophraſtus ſayeth alſo, it was Piſiſtratus, and not Solon, that made the lawe for idlenes: which was the only cauſe that the countrie of ATTICA became more fruitefull, being better manured: and the cittie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begonne to write the ſtorie of the Iles ATLANTIDES in verſe (which he had learned of the wiſe men of the cittie of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very neceſſary for the ATHENIANS) grewe wearye, and gaue it ouer in mid waye: not for any matters or buſines that troubled him, as Plato ſayed, but only for his age, and bicauſe he feared the tediouſnes of the worke. For otherwiſe he had leyſure enough, as appeareth by his verſes where he ſayeth:

I growue olde, and yet I learne ſtill.

And in another place where he ſayeth,

Nouue Venus yeldes me ſuuete delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort ſtill:
the muſes eke, refreshe my ſprights, and much relieue my vveary vvill.
Theſe be the pointes of perfect eaſe, vvhich all mens mindes oftetimes doe pleaſe.

Plato afterwards for beawtifying of the ſtorie and fables of the Iles ATLANTIDES, was deſirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by waye of ſpeache haue broken vp a field or laye lande of his owne, or that this gifte had deſcended to him of right from Solon. He beganne to raiſe vp a ſtately fronte vnto the ſame, and encloſed it with high walles, and large ſquared courtes at the entrie thereof: ſuch was it, as neuer any other worke, fable, or poeticall inuention had euer ſo notable, or the like. But bicauſe he beganne a litle to late, he ended his life before his worke, leauing the readers more ſorowfull for that was left vnwritten, than they tooke pleaſure in that they founde written. For euen as in the cittie of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: ſo the wiſdome of Plato (amongeſt many goodly matters of his that haue come abroade) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Iles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Piſiſtratus had vſurped the tyrannie, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Epheſian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeres after. For Piſiſtratus vſurped tyrannicall power in the yere that Comias was chief gouernour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yere that Hegeſtratus was gouernour, which was the next yere after that. And where ſome ſaye, the aſhes of his bodie were after his death ſtrawed abroade through the Ile of SALAMINA: that ſeemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheles it hath bene written by many notable authours, and amongeſt others, by Ariſtotle the philoſopher.

The ende of Solons life.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS Valerius Publicola.

NOWE we haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINE people for an honour gaue that ſurname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, deſcended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeſt worckers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINES and the SABYNES that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that moſt moued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being deſcended of him, whileſt the Kings dyd rule yet at ROME, was in very great eſtimation, aſwell for his eloquence, as for his riches: vſing the one rightly and freely, for the maintenaunce of iuſtice, and the other liberally and curteouſly, for the relief of the poore. So that it was manifeſt, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publicke ſtate, he ſhould be one of the chiefeſt men of the ſame. It chaunced that king Tarquine ſurnamed the prowde, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarylie by indirect and wicked wayes, and behauing him ſelfe not like a King, but like a cruell tyrante: the people much hated and deteſted him, by reaſon of the death of Lucretia (which killed her ſelfe for that ſhe was forcibly rauiſhed by him) & ſo the whole cittie roſe and rebelled againſt him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this inſurrection and rebellion, dyd ioyne firſt with this Valerius: who dyd greately fauour and aſſiſt his enterpriſe, and did helpe him to drine out king Tarquine with all his houſe & familie. Nowe whileſt they were thincking that the people would chuſe ſome one alone to be chief ruler ouer them, in ſtead of a King: Valerius kept him ſelfe quiet, as yelding willingly vnto Brutus the firſt place, who was meeteſt for it, hauing bene the chief authour and worcker of their recouered libertie. But when they ſawe the name of Monarchie (as much to ſaye, as ſoueraintie alone) was diſpleaſaunt to the people, and that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cauſe they would rather chooſe two Conſuls: Valerius then begāne to hope, he ſhould be the ſeconde perſōne with Brutus. Howbeit this hope fayled him. For againſt Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia was choſen Cōſul with him: not bicauſe he was a man of greater vertue, or of better eſtimation than Valerius. But the noble men of the cittie fearing the practises of the Kings abroade, which sought by all the fayer & flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the cittie: dyd determine to make such an one Consul, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heauy enemie, persuading them selues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter greuously, but they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: notwithstanding he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrannes. Wherfore, he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholy gaue vp to medle in matters of state: insomuch as he gaue many occasion to thincke of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared least vpon this his misliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings side, and so bring all the cittie in an vprore, considering it stoode then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stoode in iealousie of some, would by othe be assured of the Senate, & had appointed them a daye solemnely to take their othes vpon the sacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenaunce came into the market place, and was the first that tooke his othe he would leaue nothing vndone, that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the libertie of the cittie. This othe of his maruelously reioyced the Senate, & gaue great assuraunce also to the Consuls, but specially, bicause his dedes dyd shortly after performe his wordes. For there came ambassadours to Rome which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of sweete & lowly speaches to winne the fauour of the people, with commission to vse all the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardened harts of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pryde and crueltie, & ment to aske nought but reasonable things. The Consuls thought best to geue them open audience, and to suffer them to speake to the people. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the state much, and deliuer occasion of new sturre vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more affrayed of warres, then of tyrannie. After that, there came other ambassadours also, which sayed that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer geue ouer and renounce his title to the Kingdome, and to make any more warres, but besought them only, that they would at the least deliuer him and his friends their money and goods, that they might haue wherewithall to keepe them in their banishment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeld to this request, and specially Collatinus, one of the Consuls who dyd fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a fast and resolute man, and very fierce in his harte, ranne immediately into the market place, crying out that his fellowe Consul was a traytour, and contented to graunt the tyrannes matter, and meanes to make warre vpon the cittie, where in deede they deserued not so much, as to be relieued in their exile. Hereupon the people assembled together, and the first that spake in this assembly, was a priuate man called Gaius Minutius, who speaking vnto Brutus, & to the whole assembly, sayed vnto them. O noble Consul & Senate, handle so the matter, that the tyrannes goods be rather in your custodie to make warre with them, than in theirs, to bring warre vpon your selues. Notwithstāding, the Romaines were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrannes: they should not disapoint the offered peace, with keeping backe their goodes, but rather they should throwe their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the least parte of Tarquines intent, to seeke his goodes againe: but vnder pretence of that demaund, he secretly corrupted the people, and practised treason, which his ambassadours followed, pretending only to get the Kings goodes and his fauourers together, saying, that they had already solde some parte, and some parte they kept, and sent them daylie. So as by delaying the time in this sorte with such pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and auncientest houses of the cittie: to wit, the familie of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senatours: and the familie of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senatours: all which by their mothers, were Consul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians also were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their owne sister, & had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawen to their stringe, two of the eldest of them, bicause they familiarly frequented together, being cosin germaines: whom they had intised to be of their conspiracie, allying them with the house of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might persuade them selues to rise to great honour & preferment by meanes of the Kings, rather than to trust

A to truſt to their fathers willfull hardnes. For they called his ſeueritie to the wicked, hardnes: for that he would neuer pardone any. Furthermore Brutus had fayned him ſelfe mad, and a foole of long time for ſafety of his life, bicauſe the tyrannes ſhould not put him to death: ſo that the name of Brutus only remained. After theſe two young men had geuen their conſent to be of the confederacie, and had ſpoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bounde one to another, with a great and horrible othe, drincking the bloude of a man, and ſhaking hands in his bowells, whom they would ſacrifice. This matter agreed vpon betweene them, they met together to put their ſacrifice in execution, in the houſe of the Aquilians. They had fittely pickt out a darcke place in the houſe to doe this ſacrifice in, & where almoſt no bodye came: yet it happened by chaunce, that one of the ſeruants of the houſe called Vin-
B dicius, had hidden him ſelfe there, vnknowing to the traytours, and of no ſet purpoſe, to ſpye and ſee what they dyd, or that he had any manner of inckling thereof before: but falling by chaunce vpon the matter, euen as the traytours came into that place with a countenaunce to doe ſome ſecret thing of importaunce, fearing to be ſeene, he kept him ſelfe cloſe, and laye behinde a coffer that was there, ſo that he ſawe all that was done, and what they ſayed and determined. The concluſion of their counſell in the ende was this, that they would kill both the Conſuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertiſing the ſame, which they gaue vnto his ambaſſadours, being lodged in the houſe of the Aquilians, & were preſent at this concluſion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out alſo as ſecretly as he could, being maruelouſly troubled in minde, & at a maze howe to deale in this matter.
C For he thought it daungerous (as it was in deede) to goe and accuſe the two ſonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of ſo wicked and deteſtable a treaſon, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other ſide alſo, he thought this was a ſecret, not to be imparted to any priuate perſone, and not poſſible for him to conceale it, that was bounde in duety to reueale it. So he reſolued at the laſt to goe to Valerius to bewraye this treaſon, of a ſpeciall affection to this man, by reaſon of his gentle and curteous vſing of men, geuing eaſy acceſſe and audience vnto any that came to ſpeake with him, and ſpecially for that he diſdained not to heare poore mens cauſes. Vindicius being gone to ſpeake with him, and hauing told him the whole conſpiracy before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was a-D baſhed and fearefull withall: whereupon he ſtayed him leaſt he ſhould ſlippe awaye, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watche the doore, that no bodie went in nor out vnto him. And willed his brother alſo, that he ſhould goe and beſet the Kings palace round about, to intercept theſe letters if it were poſſible, and to ſee that none of their ſeruants fled. Valerius ſelfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friendes and people that wayted on him, went ſtraight vnto the houſe of the Aquilians, who by chaunce were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he founde the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambaſſadours laye. Whileſt he was thus occupied, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ranne home immediately, and founde Valerius cõming out at their gate. So they vould haue taken thoſe letters from him by force, and ſtrong hande. But Valerius and his company dyd reſiſt them, and moreouer hudded
E them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought them (doe what they could) into the market place. The like was done alſo in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius founde other letters alſo wrapt vp in certaine fardells for their more ſafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings ſeruaunts he founde there. There the Conſuls hauing cauſed ſilence to be made, Valerius ſent home to his houſe for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Conſuls: then the traytours were openly accuſed, and their letters redde, and they had not the face to aunſwer one worde. All that were preſent, being amazed, honge downe their heades, and behelde the grounde, and not a man durſt once open his mouth to ſpeake, excepting a fewe, who to gratifie Brutus, beganne to ſay that they ſhould baniſhe them: and Collatinus alſo gaue them ſome hope, bicauſe he fell to weeping, F and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his ſonnes by their names: come on (ſayed he) Titus, and thou Valerius, why doe you not aunſwer to that you are accuſed of? and hauing ſpoken thryſe vnto them to aunſwer, when he ſawe they ſtoode

mute,and ſayed nothing: he turned him to the ſergeants,and ſayed vnto them. They are now in your handes,doe iuſtice.So ſoone as he had ſpoken theſe wordes, the ſergeants layed holde immediately vpon the two young men,and tearing their clothes of their backs, bounde their hands behinde them, and then whipped them with roddes: which was ſuch a pittiefull ſight to all the people,that they could not finde in their hartes to behold it, but turned them ſelues another waye,bicauſe they would not ſee it.But contrariwiſe,they ſaye that their owne father had neuer his eye of them,neither dyd chaunge his auſtere and fierce countenaunce,with any pittie or naturall affection towards them, but ſtedfaſtly dyd beholde the puniſhement of his owne children,vntill they were layed flat on the grounde,and both their heads ſtriken of with an axe before him. When they were executed,Brutus roſe from the benche, and left the execution of the reſt vnto his fellowe Conſul. This was ſuch an acte, as men cannot ſufficiently prayſe, nor reproue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde ſo quiet, or els the greatnes of his miſerie that tooke awaye the feeling of his ſorowe: whereof neither the one nor the other was any ſmall matter, but paſſing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuinenes, and ſomtime beaſtly brutiſhnes. But it is better the iudgement of men ſhould commend his fame,then that the affection of men by their iudgemēts ſhould diminiſhe his vertue. For the Romaines holde opinion, it was not ſo great an acte done of Romulus firſt to build Rome: as it was for Brutus to recouer Rome,and the beſt libertie thereof,and to renewe the auncient gouernment of the ſame. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wounder, and a great while without ſpeaking to ſee what was done. The Aquilians ſtraight grew bold, for that they ſawe the other Conſull Collatinus proceede gently, and mildly againſt them: and ſo made petition they might haue time geuen them to aunſwer to the articles they were accuſed of, and that they might haue their ſlaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their handes,bicauſe there was no reaſon he ſhould remaine with their accuſers. The Conſul ſeemed willing to yeld thereto,and was ready to breake vp the aſſembly thereupon. But Valerius ſayed, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the aſſembly that attended vpon his perſone) and ſtayed the people beſides for departing awaye, leaſt they ſhould negligently let thoſe eſcape that had ſo wickedly ſought to betraye their countrie. Vntill he him ſelfe had layed handes vpon them, calling vpon Brutus to aſſiſt him, with open exclamation againſt Collatinus,that he dyd not behaue him ſelfe like a iuſt and true man, ſeeing his fellowe Brutus was forced for iuſtice ſake to ſee his owne ſonnes put to death: and he in contrary manner, to pleaſe a fewe women,ſought to let goe manifeſt traitours,and open enemies to their countrie.The Conſul being offended herewith,commaunded they ſhould bring awaye the bondman Vindicius. So the ſergeants making waye through the preaſe, layed handes vpon him to bring him awaye with them,and beganne to ſtrike at them which offered to reſiſt them. But Valerius friends ſtept out before them,and put them by.The people ſhowted ſtraight,& cried out for Brutus: who with this noyſe returned againe into the market place, and after ſilence made him,he ſpake in this wiſe.For mine own children,I alone haue bene their ſufficiēt iudg, to ſee them haue the law according to their deſeruings: the reſt I haue left freely to the iudgment of the people. Wherefore (ſayed he) if any man be diſpoſed to ſpeake, let him ſtand vp,and perſuade the people as he thinketh beſt.Then there needed no more wordes, but only to hearken what the people cried: who with one voyce & conſent condemned them,& cried execution,& accordingly they had their heades ſtriken of.Now was Conſull Collatinus long before had in ſome ſuſpition, as allied to the Kings,and diſliked for his ſurname, bicauſe he was called Tarquinius: who perceyuing him ſelfe in this caſe much hated and miſtruſted of the people, voluntarely yelded vp his Conſulſhippe, and departed the cittie. The people aſſembling then them ſelues, to place a ſucceſſour in his roome: they choſe Valerius in his roome,without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull trauaill and diligence beſtowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had well deſerued alſo ſome recompence,cauſed him not only to be manumiſed by the whole graunte of the people, but made him a free man of the cittie beſides: and he was the firſt bondman manumiſed, that was made cittizen of Rome, with permiſſion alſo to geue his voyce in all elections of officers, in any

A in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumiſed, to geue their voyces alſo in elections, as other cittizens dyd: and vnto this daye the perfect manumiſing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free man. Theſe things thus paſſed ouer, the goodes of the Kings were geuen to the ſpoyle of the people, and their palaces were raſed and ouerthrowen. Nowe amongeſt other lands, the goodlieſt parte of the field of Mars was belõging vnto king Tarquine: the ſame they conſecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, & not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The ſheaues being yet in ſhocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the wheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherefore they threwe both corne &

B ſheaues into the riuer, & trees alſo which they had hewen downe & rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, ſhould be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. Theſe ſheaues thus throwẽ into the riuer, were caried down by the ſtreame not farre from thence, vnto a forde and ſhallowe place of the water, where they firſt dyd ſtaye, and dyd let the other which came after, that it could goe no further: there theſe heapes gathered together, and laye ſo cloſe one to another, that they beganne to ſincke and ſettle faſt in the water. Afterwards the ſtreame of the riuer brought downe continually ſuch mudde & grauell, that it euer increaſed the heape of corne more and more in ſuche ſorte, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather ſoftly preſſing and driuing it together, dyd firme and harden it, and made it growe ſo to lande. Thus this heape riſing ſtill in greatnes and

C firmenes, by reaſon that all that came downe the riuer ſtayed there, it grewe in the ende, and by time to ſpread ſo farre, that at this daye it is called the holy Ilande in Rome: in which are many goodly temples of diuers goddes, and ſundry walkes about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betweene the two bridges. Yet ſome write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was conſecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwardes, when one of the Veſtall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitie and bowntie of hers, they dyd graunte her in recompẽſe many priuiledges, and dyd her great honour beſides. As amongeſt others, it was ordeined, that her word & witnes ſhould ſtand good, & be allowed, in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge, neuer womã beſides her ſelf dyd enioye.

Whereof the holy Iland came in Rome, that lieth betweene both bridges.

D By ſpeciall grace of the people alſo, it was graunted her, that ſhe might marie if ſhe thought it good: but yet ſhe would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the reporte how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being paſt hope of euer entring into his Kingdome againe, went yet vnto the Thvscans for ſuccour, which were very glad of him: and ſo they leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his Kingdome againe. The Conſuls alſo hearing thereof, went out with their armie againſt him. Both the armies preſented them ſelues in battell raye, one againſt another, in the holy places conſecrated to the goddes: wherof the one was called the wodde Arſia, and the other the meadowe Æſuuia. And as both armies beganne to geue charge vpon eche other, Aruns the eldeſt ſonne of king Tarquine, and the Conſul Brutus encoũtered together, not by chaunce, but ſought for of ſet purpoſe to exe-

Aruns & Brutus encountered, and ſlue eche other.

E cute the deadly fode and malice they dyd beare eache other. The one, as againſt a tyrante and enemie of the libertie of his countrie: the other, as againſt him that had bene chief authour & worker of their exile and expulſion. So they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, ſo ſoone as they had ſpyed eche other, with more fury then reaſon, and fought ſo deſperately together, that they both fell ſtarke dead to the ground. The firſt onſet of the battell being ſo cruell, the end thereof was no leſſe bloudy: vntill both the armies hauing receyued and done like damage to eche other, were parted by a maruelous great tempeſt that fell vpon them. Nowe was Valerius maruelouſly perplexed, for that he knewe not which of them wanne the field that daye: ſeeing his ſouldiers as ſorowfull for the great loſſe of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the ſlaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to viewe the multitude of the ſlaine

F bodies of either ſide, the number was ſo equall in fight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which ſide fell out the greateſt ſlaughter: ſo that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perſuaded in their opinion, that they had rather loſt then wõne, coniecturing a farre of the fall of their enemies. The night being come, ſuch things fell out, as maye be looked for after ſo terrible a battell. For when both campes were all layed to reſt, they ſaye the wodde wherein they laye incamped, quaked and trembled: and they heard a voyce ſaye, that onely one man more was ſlaine on the THVSCANS ſide, than on the ROMAINES parte. Out of doubt this was ſome voyce frō heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupō gaue a ſhrill ſhowte, as thoſe whoſe hartes receyued a newe quickening ſpirite or corage. The THVSCANS on the contrarie parte were ſo affrayed, that the moſt parte of them ſtole out of the campe, & ſcattered here and there: & there remained behind about the number of fiue thouſand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke priſoners euery one, and had the ſpoile of their campe. The carkaſſes were viewed afterwards, & they found that there were ſlaine in that battell, eleuen thouſand and three hundred of the THVSCANS: and of the ROMAINES, ſo many ſauing one. This battell was fought (as they ſaye) the laſt daye of Februarie, and the Conſul Valerius triumphed, being the firſt of the Conſuls that euer entered into ROME triumphing vpon a charet drawen with foure horſes, which ſight the people found honorable & goodly to beholde, & were not offended withall (as ſome ſeeme to reporte) nor yet dyd enuy him for that he beganne it. For if it had bene ſo, that cuſtome had not bene followed with ſo good acceptatiō, nor had cōtinued ſo many yeres as it dyd afterwards. They much commended alſo the honour he dyd to his fellowe Conſul Brutus, in ſetting out his funeralles & obſequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praiſe. They did ſo like & pleaſe the ROMAINES, that they haue euer ſince continued that cuſtome at the buriall of any noble man, or great perſonage, that he is openly praiſed at his buriall, by the worthieſt man that liueth among them. They reporte this funerall oration is farre more auncient then the firſt, that was made in GRECE in the like caſe: onles they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praiſing the dead at their funeralls, was firſt of all inſtituted by Solon. But they dyd moſt enuye Valerius, and beare him grudge, bicauſe Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their libertie) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twiſe, that they ſhould appoint Valerius fellowe Conſul with him. This man in contrariwiſe (ſayed the people) taking vpon him alone the rule & ſoueraintie, ſheweth plainely he will not be Brutus ſucceſſour in his Conſulſhippe, but Tarquinius ſelf in the Kingdome. For to great purpoſe was it to praiſe Brutus in wordes, & to followe Tarquinius in deedes: hauing borne before him ſelfe only all the maſes, the axes and the roddes, when he cometh abroade out of his owne houſe, which is farre greater, and more ſtately, then the Kings palace which he him ſelf ouerthrewe. And to ſaye truely, Valerius dwelt in a houſe a litle to ſumptuouſly built & ſeated, vpon the hāging of the hill called mount Velia: & bicauſe it ſtoode highe, it ouerlooked all the market place, ſo that any man might eaſely ſee from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it: but when he came out of his houſe, it was a maruelous pompe and ſtate to ſee him come downe from ſo highe a place, & with a traine after him, that caried the maieſtie of a Kings courte. But herein Valerius left a noble example, ſhewing howe much it importeth a noble man & magiſtrate, ruling weighty cauſes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receyue free ſpeache in ſteade of flatteries, & playne trothe in place of lyes. For, being enformed by ſome of his frieds how the people miſliked & complained of it, he ſtoode not in his owne conceit, neither was angrie with them: but forthwith ſet a worlde of workmen vpon it, earely in the morning before breake of daye, & cōmaunded them to plucke down his houſe, & to raſe it to the ground. Inſomuch as the next day following, whē the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, & ſawe this great ſodaine ruine, they much commended the noble acte & minde of Valerius, in doing that he dyd: but ſo were they angrie, and ſorie both, to ſee ſo fayer and ſtately a buylt houſe (which was an ornament to the cittie) ouerthrowen vpon a ſodaine. Much like in compariſon to a man, whom through ſpite and enuie they had vniuſtly put to death: and to ſee their chief magiſtrate alſo like a ſtraunger and a vacabonde, compelled to ſeeke his lodging in another mans houſe. For his friends receyued him into their houſes, vntill ſuch time as the people had geuen him a place, where they dyd build him a newe houſe, farre more orderly, and nothing ſo ſtately and curious as the firſt was, and it was in the ſame place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus ſtandeth at this daye. Now bicauſe he would not only reforme

A reforme his perſone, but the office of his Conſulſhippe, & alſo would frame him ſelfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before he ſeemed vnto them to be feareſull, he put awaye the carying of the axes from the roddes, which the ſergeants vſed to beare before the Conſul. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were aſſembled, he cauſed the roddes to be borne downewardes, as in token of reuerence of the ſoueraine maieſtie of the people: which all the magiſtrates obſerue yet at this daye. Nowe in all this humble ſhowe and lowlines of his, he dyd not ſo much imbaſe his dignitie and greatnes, which the common people thought him to haue at the firſt: as he dyd thereby cut of enuie from him, winning againe as much true authoritie, as in ſemblaunce he would ſeeme to haue loſt. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to ſubmit them
B ſelues vnto him: inſomuch as vpon this occaſion he was ſurnamed Publicola, as much to ſaye, as the people pleaſer. Which ſurname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth alſo writing the reſt of his life, will vſe no other name: for he was contented to ſuffer any man that would, to offer him ſelfe to aske the Conſulſhippe in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kynde of man they would ioyne fellowe Conſul with him, and fearing leaſt through enuie or ignoraunce, the party might thwart his purpoſe and meaning: employed his ſole power and authoritie whileſt he ruled alone, vpon highe and noble attempts. For firſt of all he ſupplied vp the number of Senatours that were greatly decayed, bicauſe king Tarquine had put ſome of them to death not long before, and other alſo had bene lately ſlaine in the warres: in whoſe places he had choſen newe Senatours, to the number of a hundred three C ſcore and foure. After that, he made newe decrees and lawes, which greatly dyd aduaunce the authoritie of the people. The firſt lawe gaue libertie to all offendours, condemned by iudgement of the Conſuls, to appeale vnto the people. The ſecõd, that no man vpon payne of death ſhould take vpon him the exerciſe of any office, vnles he had come vnto it by the gifte of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore cittizens of ROME ſhould paye no more cuſtome, nor any impoſt whatſoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to geue him ſelfe to ſome craſte or occupation, when he ſawe his trauaill ſhould not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the law that he made againſt thoſe that diſobeyed the Conſuls, it was founde to be ſo fauorable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the riche & great men. For the offendours & breakers of that lawe, were con-D demned to paye for a penaltie, the value of fiue oxen, and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, tenne oboles, and of an oxe, a hundred oboles. For in thoſe dayes, the ROMAINES had no ſtore of coined mony, otherwiſe, they lacked no ſheepe, nor other rother beaſts. Hereof it came, that to this daye they call their riches or ſubſtaunce, Peculium, bicauſe Pecus ſignifieth ſheepe and muttons. And in the olde time the ſtampe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: & ſome of them called their children Bubulci, which ſignifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to ſaye goateheards: and others Porcij, as you would ſaye, ſwineheardes. Nowe though in all his other lawes, he was very fauorable & temperate toward the people: yet in that moderation, ſomtimes he dyd ſet grieuous paynes & puniſhements. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accuſation, that dyd aſpire to the Kingdome, & he dyd ſet the E murderer free of all puniſhement: ſo he brought forth manifeſt proofe, that the parry ſlaine, had practiſed to make him ſelfe King. As being impoſſible a man ſhould pretend ſo greata matter, and no man ſhould finde it: and contrariwiſe being poſſible, albeit he were ſpyed, that otherwiſe he might attempt it, by making him ſelfe ſo ſtrong, that he needed not paſſe for the law. In this caſe he gaue euery man libertie by ſuch acte or meane, to preuent him if he could of diſcretion: who by ſtrength otherwiſe ſought to aſpire to reigne. They greatly commended him alſo for the lawe that he made touching the treaſure. For being very neceſſarie that euerie priuate cittizen ſhould according to his abilitie, be contributer to the charges and maintenaunce of the warres: he him ſelf would neither take ſuch collection into his charge, nor ſuffer any man of his to medle with the ſame, nor yet that it ſhould be layed in any priuate F mans houſe, but he dyd ordeine that Saturnes tẽple ſhould be the treaſurie thereof. This order they keepe to this preſent daye. Furthermore, he graũted the people to chuſe two young men Queſtores of the ſame, as you would ſaye the treaſurers, to take the charge of this money:

and the two firſt which were choſen, were Publius Veturius, and Marcus Minutius, who gathered great ſummes of money together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirtie thouſand perſones which had payed ſubſidie, not reckoning in this accompt, orphanes, nor widowes, which were excepted from all payments. After he had eſtabliſhed all theſe things, he cauſed Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be choſen fellowe Conſul with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, he gaue the vpper hande, and commaunded they ſhould carie before him the roddes, which were the ſignes of the chief magiſtrate: and euer ſince they haue geuen this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they choſe againe in his place Marcius Horatius, who held out the Conſulſhippe with Publicola the reſt of the yere. Nowe about that time king Tarquine remained in the coũtrie of THVSCANE, where he prepared a ſecõde armie againſt the ROMAINES, & there fell out a maruelous ſtraunge thing thereupon. For when he raigned king of ROME, he had almoſt made an ende of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receyued, or vpon any fantaſy it is not knowen) to ſet vp a coche of earth baked by a potter, in the higheſt place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certaine THVSCAN workemen of the cittie of VEIES: but whileſt they were in hand with the worcke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the worckemen had formed this coche, and that they had put it into the fournes to bake it, it fell out contrarie to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worcke put into the fournes. For the earth dyd not ſhut and cloſe together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moiſture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it dyd ſwell to ſuch a bignes, and grewe ſo harde and ſtrong withall, that they were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the fournes to get it out. The ſootheſayers dyd expounde this, that it was a celeſtiall token from aboue, and promiſed great proſperitie and increaſe of power vnto thoſe, that ſhould enioye this coche. Whereupon the VEIANS reſolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demaunded it, but aunſwered that it dyd belong vnto king Tarquine, and not vnto thoſe that had baniſhed him. Not many dayes after, there was a ſolemne feaſt of games for running of horſes in the cittie of VEIES, where they dyd alſo many other notable actes, worthy ſight according to their cuſtome. But after the game was played, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie as they dyd vſe at that time, brought his coche and horſes fayer and ſoftely out of the ſhowe place: and ſodainely the horſe being affrayed vpon no preſent cauſe or occaſion ſeene, whether it was by chaunce, or by ſome ſecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coche to the cittie of ROME. The coche driuer dyd what he could poſſible at the firſt to ſtaye them, by holding in the raynes, by clapping them on the backs, and ſpeaking gently to them: but in the ende, perceyuing he could doe no good, and that they would haue their ſwynge, he gaue place to their furie, & they neuer linne ronning, till they brought him neere to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrewe him and his coche, not farre from the gate called at this preſent, Ratumena. The VEIANS woundering much at this matter, and being affrayed withall: were contented the workmen ſhould deliuer their coche made of earth vnto the ROMAINES. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the firſt (which was the ſonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made againſt the SABYNES, that he would buyld it. And Tarquine the prowde, being the ſonne of him that made this vowe dyd buyld it: howbeit he dyd not conſecrate it, bicauſe he was driuen out of his Kingdome before he had finiſhed it. When this temple was built and throughly finiſhed, & ſet forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruelouſly deſirous to haue the honour of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content himſelfe with all thoſe honours that he had receyued in peace, for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obteined & well deſerued, but further that he would ſeeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing dyd pertaine vnto him: they then dyd egge Horatius, & perſuaded him to make ſute for the ſame. Occaſion fell out at that time, that Publicola muſt haue the leading of the ROMAINES armie into the field: in the meane time, while Publicola was abſent, it was procured that the people gaue their voyces to Horatius, to conſecrate the temple, knowing they could not ſo well haue brought it to paſſe he being preſent. ſaye,

A saye, the Consuls drewe lotts betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to leade the armie against his will, and vpon Horatius to consecrate this temple, which maye be coniectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication thereof. For all the people being assembled together in the Capitoll with great silence, on the fifteenth daye of the moneth of September, which is about the newe moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius hauing done all the ceremonies needefull in suche a case, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vse was euen to vtter the solemne wordes of dedication: Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing stoode a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to speake, beganne to say alowde in this wise. My lorde Consul, your sonne is dead of a sicknes in the campe. This made all the assembly sorie to heare it, but it nothing amased
B Horatius, who spake only this muche. Cast his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to ende his consecration. This was but a deuise and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, only to make Horatius leaue of his consecration. Horatius in this shewed him selfe a maruelous resolute man, were it that he streight founde his deuise, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the sodainenes of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in consecrating of the second temple. For this first which Tarquine had built and Horatius consecrated, was consumed by fyer in the ciuill warres: and the second was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus set vp the superscription of the dedication, bicause Sylla dyed before he could dedicate it. The second temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumultes which were at ROME, vn-
C der Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Vespasian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboue other: to see his worke perfited and finished before his death, and not ouerthrowen as it was immediately after his death. Wherein he dyd farre passe the happines of Sylla, who dyed before he could dedicate that he had built: and thother deceased before he sawe his worcke ouerthrowen. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the first temple, cost Tarquinius fortie thousand Pondos of siluer. And to gyld only the temple which we see nowe in our time, they saye all the goodes and substaunce that the richest cittizen of ROME then had, will come nothing neere vnto it: for it cost aboue twelue thousand talents. The pillers of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of mar-
D bell, called pentlike marbell, and they were squared parpine, as thicke as long: these I sawe at ATHENS. But afterwardes they were cut againe, and polished in ROME, by which doing they got not so much grace, as they lost proportion: for they were made to slender, and left naked of their first beawtie. Nowe he that would wounder at the stately buylding of the Capitoll, if he came afterwardes vnto the palace Domitian, and dyd but see some galerie, porche, hall, or hotte house, or his concubines chambers: he would saye (in my opinion) as the poet Epicharmus sayed of a prodigall man.

How oft Iupiter Capitolins temple was burnt and buils againe.

How much was spent in building the Capitoll.

It is a fault, and folly both in thee to lashe out giftes, and prodigall rewardes: For fonde delights, without all rule that be,
E regarding not what happens afterwardes.

So might they iustly saye of Domitian. Thou art not liberall, nor deuoute vnto the goddes: but it is a vice thou hast to loue to buyld, and desirest (as they saye of olde Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold, and precious stones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battell wherein he lost his sonne (that was slaine by Brutus in fighting together hande to hande) went to the cittie of CLVSIVM, vnto king Clarus Porsena: the mightiest prince that raigned at that time in all ITALIE, and was both noble and a curteous prince. Porsena promised him ayde: & first of all he sent to ROME to summone the cit-
F tizens to receiue their King againe. But the ROMANES refusing the summones, he sent forthwith an Heraulde to proclaime open warres against them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwardes immediatly with a great armie. Publicola nowe being absent, was chosen Consul the second time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, bicause he would exceede king Porsena in greatnes of minde, he begāne to buyld a cittie called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre frō ROME: & hauing walled it about to his maruelous charge, he sent thither seuen hundred cittizens to dwell there, to shewe that he made litle accompt of this warre. Howbeit Porsena at his coming dyd geue suche a lustie assault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the souldiers which kept the same: who flying towards ROME, were pursued so harde with the enemies, that with them they had entered the towne, had not Publicola made a saly out to resist them. Who beganne a hotte skirmishe harde by the riuer of Tyber, & there sought to haue stayed the enemies to follow any further: which being the greater number, dyd ouerlaye the ROMAINES, & dyd hurte Publicola very sore in this skirmishe, so as he was caried away into the cittie in his souldiers armes. And euē so was the other Cōsul Lucretius hurte in like case: which so discoraged & frayed the ROMAINES, that they all tooke thē to their legges, & fled towards the cittie. The enemies pursued them at their heeles as farre as the wodden bridge: so that the cittie was in maruelous hazarde of taking vpon the sodaine. But Horatius Cocles, & Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble young men of the cittie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, & made head against the enemie. This Horatius was surnamed Cocles (as much to saye, as one eye) bicause he had lost one of them in the warres. Howbeit other writers saye, it was bicause of his flat nose which was so soncke into his head, that they sawe nothing to parte his eyes, but that the eye browes dyd meete together: by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tōgue they called him (as they saye) Cocles. But howsoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to shew his face against the enemie, & to kepe the bridge, vntill such time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he saw they had done that, armed as he was, & hurte in the hippe with a pike of the THVSCANS, he leaped into the riuer of Tyber, and saued him selfe by swimming vnto the other side. Publicola woundring at this manly acte of his, persuaded the ROMAINES straight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him so much as he spent in a daye: & afterwards also he caused the common treasury to geue him as much lande as he could compasse about with his plowe in a daye. Furthermore he made his image of brasse to be set vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Nowe whilest king Porsena was hottely bent, very straightly to besiege ROME, there beganne a famine among the ROMAINES: & to encrease the daunger, there came a newe armie out of THVSCANE, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waste, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being chosen Consul, then the third time, thought he should neede to doe no more to resist Porsena bruely, but to be quiet only, & to looke well to the safe keeping of the cittie. Howbeit spying his oportunity, he secretly stole out of ROME with a power, & did set vpon the THVSCANS that destroyed the countrie about: & ouerthrew & slue of them, fiue thousand men. As for the historie of Mutius, many doe diuersely reporte it: but I will write it in such sorte, as I thincke shall best agree with the trothe. This Mutius was a worthie man in all respects, but specially for the warres. He deuising howe he might come to kill king Porsena, disguised him selfe in THVSCANS apparell, and speaking Thuscan very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings chayer, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durst not aske which was he, least he should be discouered, but drue his sworde at aduenture, & slewe him whom he tooke to be King. Vpon that they layed holde on him, & examined him. And a panne full of fire being brought for the King that entēded to doe sacrifice vnto the goddes, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whilest the flesh of his hand dyd frye of, he neuer chaunged hewe nor contenaunce: the King woundering to see so straunge a sight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he him selfe dyd deliuer him his sworde againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they saye afterwardes, he had geuen him the surname of Scæuola, as much to saye, as left handed, and told him in taking of it, Thou couldest not Porsena for feare haue ouercomed me, but nowe through curtesy thou hast wonne me. Therefore for goodwill I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force, nor extremitie could haue made me vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINES dispersed through thy campe, all which are prepared with like

The noble acte of Mutius Scæuola.

How Mutius came by the name of Scæuola.

A like mindes to followe that I haue begonne, only gaping for oportunitie to put it in practise. The lot fell on me to be the firſt to breake the Iſe of this enterpriſe: & yet I am not ſorie my hande fayled, to kill ſo worthie a man, that deſerueth rather to be a friend, then an enemie vnto the Romaines. Porſena hearing this, did beleeue it, & euer after he gaue the more willing eare to thoſe that treated with him of peace: not ſo much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the Romaines noble minde and great corage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scæuola: howbeit Athenodorus, ſurnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octauia, Auguſtus ſiſter, ſayeth that he was alſo called Opſig onus. But Publicola taking king Porſena not to be ſo daũgerous an enemie to Rome, as he ſhould be a profitable friẽd & allie to the ſame: let him vnderſtand, that he was cõtẽted to

B make him iudge of the controuerſie betweene them & Tarquine. Whom he dyd many times prouoke to come & haue his cauſe heard before king Porſena, where he would iuſtifie to his face, that he was the naughtieſt & moſt wicked man of the world, & that he was iuſtly driuen out of his countrie. Tarquine ſharpely aunſwered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porſena leaſt of all other, for that hauing promiſed him to put him againe in his Kingdom, he was nowe gone from his worde, and had chaunged his minde. Porſena was very angrie with this aunſwer, iudging this a manifeſt token that his cauſe was ill. Wherefore Porſena being ſolicited againe by his owne ſonne Aruns, who loued the Romaines, dyd eaſely graunte them peace vpon condition: that they ſhould redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the countrie of Thvscan, with the priſoners alſo which they had taken in

C this warre, & in liew thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the Romaines, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the Romaines deliuered him oſtages, tenne of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of the cittie, & ſo many of their daughters: emõg which, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porſena brake his armie, & withdrewe his ſtrength, truſting to the peace cõcluded. The Romaines daughters deliuered for oſtages, came downe to the riuers ſide to waſhe them, in a quiet place where the ſtreame ranne but gently, without any force or ſwiftnes at all. When they were there, and ſaw they had no garde about them, nor any came that waye, nor yet any botes going vp nor down the ſtreame: they had a deſire to ſwime ouer the riuer, which rãne with a ſwift ſtreame, & was maruelous deepe. Some ſaye, that one Clælia ſwamme the riuer vpon her horſe backe, & that ſhe did imbolden

D & incorage the other to ſwimme hard by her horſe ſide: & recouering the other bancke, and being paſt all daunger, they went & preſented them ſelues before Publicola the Conſul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the parte they had played, but was maruelous ſorie, fearing leaſt men would iudge him leſſe carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porſena: & that he might ſuſpect the boldnes of theſe maidens, was but a crafty ſlight deuiſed of the Romaines. Therefore he tooke them all againe, & ſent them immediatly vnto king Porſena. Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he layed an ambuſhe for them, that had the conduction of them. Who ſo ſoone as they were paſte the riuer, did ſhew them ſelues, & brake vpon the Romaines: they being farre fewer in number than the other, did yet very ſtowtely defend them ſelues. Now whileſt they were in earneſt fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and

E three of her fathers ſeruants, eſcaped through the middeſt of them, and ſaued them ſelues. The reſidue of the virgines remained in the middeſt among their ſwordes, in great daunger of their liues. Aruns king Porſenas ſonne aduertiſed hereof, ranne thither incõtinently to the reſcue: but when he came, the enemies fled, and the Romaines held on their iorney to redeliuer their oſtages. Porſena ſeeing them againe, asked which of them it was that beganne firſt to paſſe the riuer, and had encouraged the other to followe her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clælia. He looked vpon her very earneſtly, and with a pleaſaunt countenaunce, and commaunded they ſhould bring him one of his beſt horſe in the ſtable, and the richeſt furniture he had for the ſame, and ſo he gaue it vnto her. Thoſe which holde opinion that none but Clælia paſſed the riuer a horſe backe, doe alledge this to proue

F their opinion true. Other doe denie it, ſaying that this Thvscan king, did onely honour her noble courage. Howſoeuer it was, they ſee her image a horſe backe in the holy ſtreete, as they goe to the palace: & ſome ſaye it is the ſtatue of Valeria, other of Clælia. After Porſena had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking vp his campe, he ſhewed his noble minde vnto them in many other things, and ſpecially in that he commaunded his ſouldiers they ſhould carie nothing but their armour and weapon only, leauing his campe full of corne, vittells, and other kynde of goodes. From whence this cuſtome came, that at this daye when they make open ſale of any thing belonging to the common weale, the ſergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porſenas goodes, and taken of thankefullnes and perpetuall memorie of his bowntie and liberalitie towards them. Further, Porſenas image ſtandeth adioyning to the palace where the Senate is vſed to be kept, which is made of great antike worke. Afterwardes the SABYNES inuading the ROMAINES territorie with a great force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then choſen Conſul, with one Poſthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of weight and importaunce paſſed by Publicolaes counſell and authoritie, who was preſent at any thing that was done: and by whoſe meanes Marcus his brother, wanne two great battells, in the laſt whereof he ſlewe thirteene thouſand of his enemies, not loſing one of his owne men. For which his victories, beſides the honour of triumphe he had, the people alſo at their owne charges, built him a houſe, in the ſtreete of mounte Palatine, and graunted him moreouer that his doore ſhould open outwards into the ſtreete, where all others mens doores dyd open inwards into their houſe: ſignifying by graunte of this honour and priuiledge, that he ſhould allwayes haue benefit by the common weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houſes in olde time, dyd all open outwards after that facion, & they doe cõiecture it by the comedies that are played. Where thoſe that would goe out of their houſes, dyd firſt knocke at their doores, and make a noyſe within the houſe, leaſt in opening their doore vpon a ſodaine, they might ouerthrowe or hurte him that taried at the ſtreete doore, or paſſed by the waye: who hearing the noyſe, had warning ſtraight to auoyde the daunger. The next yere after that, Publicola was choſen Conſul the fourth time, bicauſe they ſtoode in great doubt that the SABYNES and LATINES would ioyne together to make warres vpon them: beſides all this, there was a certaine ſuperſtitious feare ranne through the cittie, of ſome ill happe toward it, bicauſe moſt parte of the women with childe were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking ſome one limme or other, & all of them came before their time. Wherfore Publicola looking in ſome of Sybillaes bookes, made priuate ſacrifice vnto Pluto, & did ſet vp againe ſome feaſtes & ſolemne games that were left of, & had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the oracle of Apollo. Theſe meanes hauing a litle reioyced the cittie with good hope, bicauſe they thought that the anger of the goddes had bene appeaſed: Publicola then begãne to prouide for the daũgers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, & made great preparation to inuade them. Nowe there was at that time amongeſt the SABYNES, a great riche man called Appius Clauſius, very ſtrong and actiue of bodie, & otherwiſe a man of great reputation & eloquence, aboue all the reſt of his countrie men: but notwithſtãding, he was much enuied, and could not auoyde it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to ſtaye thoſe intended warres againſt the ROMAINES. Whereupon, many which before tooke occaſion to murmure againſt him, dyd nowe much more increaſe the ſame: with ſaying he ſought to mainteine the power of the ROMAINES, that afterwards by their ayde he might make him ſelfe tyranne & King of the countrie. The common people gaue eaſy eare vnto ſuch ſpeaches, & Appius perceyuing well enough how the ſouldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine, & accuſe him. Wherefore being well backed & ſtoode to by his kynſemen, friends, and followers, he practiſed to make a ſturre among the SABYNES, which was the cauſe of ſtaying the warres againſt the ROMAINES. Publicola, alſo for his parte was very diligẽt, not only to vnderſtãd the originall cauſe of his ſedition, but to feede on further & increaſe the ſame, hauing gotten men meete for the purpoſe, which caried Appius ſuch a meſſage from him. That Publicola knewe very well he was a iuſt man, and one that would not be reuenged of his cittizens, to the generall hurte of his countrie, although the iniuries he receyued at their hands, deliuered him iuſt occaſion to doe it: neuertheles if he had any deſire to prouide for his ſafety and to repaire to ROME, leauing them which cauſeles wiſhed him ſo muche euill, they would both openly and priuately receyue him with that due honour which his ver-

For at their firſt coming, he made them all and their families free cittizens, & aſſigned vnto euery perſone of them two iugera of lande, (which cõteined one acre, one roode, eleuen pole, & 69. partes of a pole) by the riuer of Tyber:

Appius Clauſius goeth to dwel at Rome.

B & vnto Appius ſelf he gaue him 25. iugera (to wit, 16. acres & 4. pole, 16. acres & a halfe, 4. pole & 76. partes of a pole) & receiued him into the nũber of the Senatours. And thus came he firſt vnto the gouernment of the common weale in ROME, where he did ſo wiſely behaue him ſelf, that in the end he came to be the chiefeſt man of dignitie & authoritie in ROME, ſo long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the familie of the Claudians, deſcẽding frõ him: which for honour, and worthines, gaue no place to the nobleſt familie in ROME. But nowe the ſedition amongeſt the SABYNES being pacified, by the departure of thoſe that were gone to ROME: the ſeditious gouernours would not ſuffer thoſe that remained to liue in peace, but ſtill cried out, it were to much ſhame for them, that Clauſius being a fugitiue, and become an enemie, ſhould honour their enemies abroade, that being preſent durſt not ſhewe ſo much at

The familie of the Claudians.

C home, and that the ROMAINES ſhould ſcape vnreuenged, who had done them ſuch apparant wronges. So they raiſed great force and power, and went and encamped with their armie neere the cittie of FIDENES, and layed an ambuſhe harde by ROME, in certen hidden and hollowe places, where they put a two thouſand choyce footemen, very well armed, and dyd appoint the next morning to ſend certaine light horſe men to runne and praye to ROME gates: commaunding them, that when the ROMAINES came out of the cittie to charge them, they ſhould ſeeme leyſurely to retire, vntill they had drawen them within daunger of their ambuſh. Publicola receyuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuie ambuſhe, and ſo deuided his armie in two partes: for he gaue his ſonne in lawe Poſthumius Balbus, three thouſand footemen,

D whom he ſent awaye by night, commaunding them the ſame night to take the hilles, in the bottome whereof the SABYNES were layed in ambuſhe. Lucretius, fellowe Conſull with Publicola, hauing the lighteſt and luſtieſt men of the cittie, was appointed to make head againſt the vaũtcurriers of the SABYNES, that minded to approche the gates. And Publicola with the reſt of the armie, marched a great compaſſe about to incloſe his enemies behinde. The next morning betimes, by chaunce it was a thick miſte, & at that preſent time Poſthumius coming down from the hilles, with great ſhowtes, charged them that laye in ambuſh. Lucretius on the other ſide, ſet vpon the light horſemen of the SABYNES: & Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all ſides the SABYNES enterpriſe had very ill ſucceſſe, for they had the worſt in euery place, & the ROMAINES killed them flying, without any turning againe to make reſiſtance. Thus the

E place which gaue them hope of beſt ſafety, turned moſt to their deadly ouerthrowe. For euery one of their companies ſuppoſing the other had bene whole & vnbroken, when a charge was geuen vpon them, dyd ſtraight breake, & neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemie. For they that were in the campe, ranne toward them which laye in ambuſhe: & thoſe which were in ambuſhe on the contrarie ſide, ranne towards them that were in cãpe. So that in flying, the one met with the other, and founde thoſe, towards whom they were flying to haue bene ſafe, to ſtand in as much neede of helpe as them ſelues. That which ſaued ſome that were not ſlaine, was the cittie of FIDENES, which was neere the campe, and ſpecially ſaued thoſe which fled thither. But ſuch as came ſhorte of the cittie, and could not in time recouer it, were all ſlaine in the fielde, or taken priſoners. As for the glorie of this ho-

F norable victorie, albeit the ROMAINES were wonte to aſcribe all ſuche great notable matters to the ſpeciall prouidence and grace of the goddes, yet at that time notwithſtanding they dyd iudge, that this happy ſucceſſe fell out by the wiſe foreſight and valliantnes of the captaine. For euery man that had ſerued in this iorney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their handes, lame, and blinde, and as a man might ſaye, bounde hande and feete to kill them at their pleaſure. The people were maruelouſly enriched by this victorie, aſwell for the ſpoile, as for the ranſome of the priſoners that they had gotten. Nowe Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernment of the cittie to thoſe, which were choſen Conſuls for the yere following: dyed incontinently, hauing liued as honorably and vertuouſly all the dayes of his life, as any man liuing might doe. The people then tooke order for his funeralles, that the charges thereof ſhould be defrayed by the cittie, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene ſtill debters vnto him for the noble ſeruice he had done vnto the ſtate and common weale whileſt he liued. Therefore towardes his funeralle charges, euery cittizen gaue a pece of money called a Quatrine. The women alſo for their parte, to honour his funeralles, agreed among them ſelues to mourne a whole yere in blackes for him, which was a great and honorable memoriall. He was buried alſo by expreſſe order of the people, within the cittie, in the ſtreate called Velia: and they graunted priuiledge alſo vnto all his poſteritie, to be buried in the ſelfe ſame place. Howbeit they doe no more burie any of his there. But when any dye, they bring the corſe vnto this place, and one holding a torche burning in his hande, doth put it vnder the place, and take it ſtraight awaye againe, to ſhewe that they haue libertie to burie him there, but that they willingly refuſe this honour: and this done, they carie the corſe awaye againe.

NOW E preſently to compare theſe two perſonages together, it ſeemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not founde in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the ſame is, that the one hath bene a witnes, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the ſentence that Solon ſpake to king Cræſus, touching Tellus felicitie & happines, might haue better bene applied vnto Publicola, than to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, bicauſe he dyed honorably, he had liued vertuouſly, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon ſpeaketh nothing of his excellencie, or vertue, in any of his poemes: neither dyd he euer beare any honorable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowme after his death. Whereas Publicola ſo long as he liued, was allwayes the chief man amongeſt the ROMAINES, of credit and authoritie: and afterwards ſince his death, certaine of the nobleſt families, and moſt auncient houſes of ROME, in theſe our dayes, as the Publicoles, the Meſſales, and Publicola happie.

A & the VALERIANS for six hundred yeres continuance, doe referre the glorie of the nobilitie & auncietie of their house vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slaine by his enemies, fighting valliantly like a worthy honest man. But Publicola died after he had slaine his enemies: which is farre more great good happe, then to be slaine. For after he as generall had honorably serued his country in the warres, & had left them conquerers, hauing in his life time receyued all honours & triumphes due vnto his seruice: he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted & esteemed, most happy & blessed. Also in wishing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his prayse, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuaunce of mans life, by saying:

Let not my death vvithout lamenting passe, B but rather let my friendes bevvayle the same:
VVhose grieuous teares, and cries of out alas, maye ofte resound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsefolkes, but the whole cittie also, and many a thousand persone besides, dyd bitterly bewayle the losse of him. For all the women of ROME dyd mourne for him in blacks, and dyd most pittiefully lament his death, as euery one of them had lost either father, brother, or husband.

True it is, that I couet goodes to haue:
but yet so got, as maye me not deprave.

Solon sayeth this, bicause vengeance followed ill gotten good. And Publicola tooke great C heede, not only to get his goodes most iustly, but had regarde that those which he had; he spent most honestly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iustly reputed the wisest man, we must needes confesse also that Publicola was the happiest. For what the one desired for the greatest and most perfect good, a man can haue in this worlde: the other hath wonne it, kept it, and vsed it all his life time, vntill the hower of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done like vnto Solon, shewing him self a perfect example and looking glasse, where men maye see howe to gouerne a popular state: when he made his Consulshippe voyde of all pride & stately shewe, and became him self affable, curteous, and beloued of euerie bodie. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes. As when he ordeined, that the people only should haue authoritie to choose and create, all common officers and magistrates, D and that they might appeale from any iudge to the people: as Solon when he suffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. In deede Publicola dyd not create any newe Senate, as Solon dyd: but he dyd augment the first number, with as many persones almost as there were before. He dyd also first erect the office of Quæstores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Bicause the chiefest magistrate, if he were an honest man, should not for so light an occasion be taken, from the care of better and more weightie affayers: and if he were wickedly geuen and ill disposed, that he should haue no such meane or occasion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treasure of the cittie in his handes, and to commaund what he lyst. Moreouer in hating the tyrānes, Publicola therein was farre more sharpe & terrible. For Solon in his lawes punished him that went about to make him selfe tyranne, yet after E he was conuicted thereof by lawe: but Publicola ordeined that they should kill him, before the lawe dyd passe on him, that sought to be King. And where Solon iustly, and truely vaunteth him self, that being offered to be King & Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole consent of the cittizens: yet he dyd notwithstanding refuse it. This vaunte and glorie is as due vnto Publicola: who finding the dignitie of a Consul tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauorable [illegible] people, not taking vpon him all the authoritie he might lawfully haue done. And it seemeth that Solon knewe before him, what was the true and direct waye to gouerne a common weale vprightly. For he sayeth in one place:

Publicola erected the office of Quæstores.

Both great and small of powver, the better vvill obaye:
if vve to litle or to much, vpon them doe not laye.

F The discharging of dettes was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie. For litle preuayleth lawe to make equalitie among cittizens, when dettes doe hinder the poore people to enioye the benefit thereof. And where it seemeth that they haue most liber-tie, as in that they maye be choſen iudges and officers to ſpeake their opinion in the counſell, A and geue their voyces alſo: there in deede are they moſt bounde and ſubiect, bicauſe they doe but obaye the rich, in all they doe commaund. But yet in this acte there is a thinge more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly diſcharging of dettes, was wont to breede great tumultes, and ſeditions in common weales. And Solon hauing vſed it in a very good time (as the phiſitian ventring a daungerous medecine) dyd appeaſe the ſedition already begonne, and did vtterly quenche through his glorie, and the common opinion they had of his wiſdome and vertue, all the infamie and accuſation that might haue growen of that acte.

As for their firſt entrie into the gouernment, Solons beginning was farre more noble. For he went before, and followed not another: and him ſelfe alone without any others helpe, dyd put in execution the beſt, and more parte of all his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes B ende and death much more glorious and happie. For Solon before he dyed, ſawe all his comon wealthe ouerthrowen: but Publicolaes common weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broyle of ciuill warres beganne againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wodden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his waye im-mediatly out of the cittie of Athens. Publicola abiding continually in Rome gouerning the ſtate, dyd throughly ſtabliſhe & confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wiſely forſeene Piſiſtratus practiſes, aſpiring to make him ſelfe King: he could neuer let him for all that, but was him ſelfe ouercome and oppreſſed with the tyrannie he ſawe ſtabliſhed in his owne ſight, and in diſpight of him. Where Publicola ouerthrewe and dyd put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly ſtabliſhed: his vertue and de- C ſire being equall with Solons, & hauing had beſides fortune fauorable, and ſufficient power to execute, his vertuous and well diſpoſed minde. But as for warres and marſhall deedes, there is no compariſon to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plataeian, doth not attribute the warres of the Megarians vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being generall of an armie, and fighting him ſelfe in perſone, hath wonne many great battells. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernment, Solon neuer durſt preſent him ſelf openly to perſuade the enterpriſe of Salamina, but vnder a counterfeat madnes, and as a foole to make ſporte.
Where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, ſhewed him ſelfe without diſſimulation, an open enemie to Tarquine, and afterwardes he reuealed all the whole conſpiracie.
And when he had bene the only cauſe and autor of puniſhing the traitours, he dyd not only D driue out of Rome the tyrannes ſelues in perſone, but tooke from them alſo all hope of returne againe. Who hauing allwayes thus nobly & valliantly behaued him ſelf, without ſhrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly corage, or open reſiſtaunce: dyd yet ſhewe him ſelfe diſcreete, where wiſedome was requiſite, or reaſon and perſuaſion neede-full. As when he conningly wanne king Porſena, who was a dredfull enemie vnto him, and in-uincible by force: whom he handled in ſuch good ſorte, that he made him his friend. Perad-uenture ſome might ſtand in this and ſaye: that Solon recouered the Ile of Salamina vnto the Athenians, which they would haue loſt. Publicola to the contrarie, reſtored the lands vnto Porſena againe, which the Romaines had conquered before, within the countrie of Thvscan. But the times in which theſe things were done, are allwayes to be conſidered of. E A politicke precept. For a wiſe gouernour of a Realme, and politicke man, doth gouerne diuerſely according to the occaſions offred, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale. And many times, in letting goe one thing, he ſaueth the whole: and in loſing a litle, he gayneth much. As Publicola dyd: who loſing a litle pece of another mans countrie which they had vſurped, ſaued by that meanes all that was aſſuredly his owne. And whereas the Romaines thought he ſhould doe very much for them, to ſaue their cittie only: he got them moreouer, all the goodes that were in their enemies cãpe, which dyd beſiege them. And in making his enemie iudge of his quar-rell, he wãne the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly haue geuen to haue ouercome, and haue ſentence paſſe of his ſide. For the King their enemie dyd not only make peace with them, but dyd alſo leaue them all his furniture, prouiſion, and munition for the F warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and iuſtice, which the great wiſedome of this Conſul perſuaded Porſena to beleeue to be, in all the other Romaines.

Themiſtocles.

A THEMISTOCLES parentage dyd litle aduaunce his glorie: for his father Neocles was of ſmall reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, & tribe of Leontis: of his mother an allien or ſtraunger: as theſe verſes doe witneſſe, Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia, and yet this highe good happe I haue, that into Grecia: I haue brought forth a ſonne, Themiſtocles by name, the glorie of the Greekiſhe bloods, and man of greateſt fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the countrie of CARIA: and they doe not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpé. And B Neanthes ſayeth furthermore, that ſhe was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefeſt cittie of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cauſe when the ſtraungers dyd aſſemble at Cynoſargos (a place of exerciſe without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themiſtocles perſuaded diuers youthes of the moſt honourable houſes, to goe down with him, & to annointe them ſelues at Cynoſargos, conningly thereby taking away the differēce betwene the right & alien ſorte. But ſetting a parte all theſe circumſtaunces, he was no doubt allied vnto the houſe of the Lycomedians: for Themiſtocles cauſed the chappell of this familie, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be buylt vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides ſayeth, he dyd ſet it forth and enriche it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confeſſe it, that euen from C his childhood they dyd perceyue he was geuen to be very whotte headed, ſturring, wiſe, and of good ſpirite, and enterpriſing of him ſelfe to doe great things, and borne to rule weighty cauſes. For at ſuch dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to playe, he neuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they allwayes founde him conning ſome oration without booke, or making it alone by him ſelfe, and the ground of his matter was euer comonly, either to defend, or accuſe ſome of his companions. Whereupon his ſchoolemaſter obſeruing him, ofte ſayed vnto him: ſuer ſome great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boye, for it cannot be choſen but that one daye thou ſhalt doe ſome notable good thing, or ſome extreme miſchief. Therefore when they went about to teache him any A thing, only to checke his nature, or to facion him with good manner and ciuilitie, or to ſtudie any matter for pleaſure or honeſt paſtime: he would ſlowly and careleſly learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning ſtate: they ſawe he would beate at it maruelouſly, and would vnderſtande more then any could of his age and cariage, truſting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cauſe, that being mocked afterwardes by ſome that had ſtudied humanitie, and other liberall ſciences, he was driuen for reuenge and his owne defence, to aunſwer with great and ſtowte wordes, ſaying, that in deede he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to playe of a pſalterion: but if they dyd put a cittie into his handes that was of ſmall name, weake, and litle, he knewe wayes enough how to make it noble, ſtronge, and great. Neuertheles, Steſimbrotus writeth, how he went to Ana- B Themiſtocles was Anaxagoras & Meliſſus ſcholler. xagoras ſchoole, and that vnder Meliſſus he ſtudied naturall philoſophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great hede vnto the time. For Meliſſus was captaine of the SAMIANS againſt Pericles, at what time he dyd laye ſeige vnto the cittie of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themiſtocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne houſe. Therefore we haue better reaſon and occaſion to beleeue thoſe that write, Mneſiphilus Phrearian. Themiſtocles dyd determine to followe Mneſiphilus Phrearian. For he was no profeſſed Orator, nor naturall philoſopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profeſſion of that What wiſedome was in olde time. which then they called wiſedome. Which was no other thing, but a certen knowledge to handle great cauſes, and an indeuour to haue a good wit and iudgment in matters of ſtate and gouernment: which profeſſion beginning in Solon, dyd continue, and was taken vp from man C to man, as a ſecte of philoſophie. But thoſe that came ſithence, haue mingled it with arte of ſpeache, and by litle and litle haue tranſlated the exerciſe of deedes, vnto bare and curious

Notwithſtanding, when Themiſtocles beganne to medle with the gouernment of the common weale, he followed much Mneſiphilus. In the firſt parte of his youth, his behauiour and doings Themiſtocles youthe. were very light and vnconſtant, as one caried awaye with a raſhe head, and without any order or diſcretion: by reaſon whereof his manners & conditions ſeemed maruelouſly to chaunge, and oftimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as him ſelf dyd afterwards confeſſe by ſaying: that a ragged colte oftimes proues a good horſe, ſpecially if he be well ridden, and broken as he ſhould be. Other tales which ſome will ſeeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As D that his father dyd diſinherite him, and that his mother for very care and ſorowe ſhe tooke to ſee the lewde life of her ſonne, dyd kill her ſelf. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being deſirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, dyd goe and ſhewe him all alongeſt the ſea ſhore, the ſhippewracks and ribbes of olde gallyes caſt here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and ſayed to him: thus the people vſe their gouernours, when they can ſerue no lenger. Howſoeuer it was, it is moſt true that Themiſtocles earneſtly gaue him ſelf to ſtate, and was ſodainely taken with deſire of glorie. For euen at his firſt entrie, bicauſe he would ſet foote before the prowdeſt, he ſtoode at pyke againſt the greateſt and mightieſt per-who euer encountered him, and was ſtill his aduerſarie oppoſite. Yet it ſeemeth the euil will E he conceyued toward him, came of a very light cauſe. For they both loued Steſilaus, that was borne in the cittie of TEOS, as Ariſton the philoſopher writeth. And after this iealouſie was kindled betweene them, they allwayes tooke contrary parte one againſt another, not only in their priuate likings, but alſo in the gouernment of the cõmon weale. Yet I am perſuaded, that the difference of their manners & conditions, did much encreaſe the grudge and diſcorde be-one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ſerue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary would doe, would ſaye, & counſaill allwayes for the moſt benefit & cõmoditie of the commõ weale: was oftetimes enforced to reſiſt Themiſtocles, & diſapoint his ambition, being euer buſilie mouing the people, to take ſome new matter in hande. For they reporte of F Themiſtocles ambition. him, that he was ſo inflamed with deſire of glorie, & to enterpriſe great matters, that being but a very yoõg man at the battell of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthines of captaine

A captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battell: he was found many times solitarilie there alone deuising with him self: besides, they saye he could then take no rest in the night, neither would goe to playes in the daye time, nor would keepe companie with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that woūdred to see him so in his muses, and chaunged, and asked him what he ayled: that Miltiades victorie would not let him sleepe, bicause other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daylie studied howe to preuent them, and how to see to the safetie of GREECE, & before occasion offered, he did exercise his cittie in feats of warre, foreseeing what should followe after. Wherefore, where the cittizēs of ATHENS before dyd vse to B deuide among them selues the reuenue of their mines of siluer, which were in a parte of ATTICA called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & persuade them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among them selues, & employe the money of the same in making of gallyes, to make warres against the ÆGINETES. For their warres of all GREECE were most cruell, bicause they were lords of the sea, & had so great a nūber of shippes. This persuasion drue the cittizens more easely to Themistocles minde, than the threatning them with king Darius, or the Persians would haue done: who were farre from them, & not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunitie taken of the hatred & iealousie betwene the ATHENIANS & the ÆGINETES, made the people to agree, of the said money to make an hundred gallyes, with which they fought against king Xerxes, & did C ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wanne the cittizēs by degrees to bende their force to sea, declaring vnto them, howe by lande they were scant able to make heade against their equalles, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defende them selues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to cōmaund all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, & passing sea men, as Plato sayeth, where before they were stowte & valliant souldiers by lande. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teethe afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, & had brought them to the bāke & the ower: & so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this sea seruice to passe, whether thereby he dyd ouerthrow the iustice of the comō weale or not, I leaue that D to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preseruation of all GREECE stoode at that time vpō the sea, & that the gallyes only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe: Xerxes him self is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought thereof. For his armie by lāde being yet whole, & vnset on, when he saw his armie by sea broken, dispersed, & souncke, he fled straight vpon it, confessing as it were that he was nowe to weake to deale any more with the GREECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenant in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GREECIANS should not followe him, then for any hope he had to ouercome thē. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, & carefull to looke to his things: for he dyd spende liberally, & loued ofte to make sacrifices, & honorably to receyue & entertaine straūgers: wherefore he had good reason to be carefull to get, to defraye
E his charges. Other to the cōtrary, blame him much, that he was to nere, & miserable: for some saye, he would sell presents of meate that were geuen him. He dyd aske one Philides ona time, which had a brede of mares, a colte of gifte: who denying him flatly, he was so angrie, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wodde, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him vnderstande, that he would shortly set strife & quarrel betwext him, & his neareſt kinsemen & familliar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a youg man, & scantly knowen, he earnestly intreated one Epicles, borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at that time the conningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come & teache his arte at his house: and all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him F playe, should aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yere when he went vnto the feast & assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would nedes keepe open house for all commers, haue his tents richely furnished, & a great traine of seruants & all other furniture, only to conſtone, which he founde there by chaunce, or purpoſely brought thither for that purpoſe, where there was very good harber for ſhippes, and fit places alſo to lye in. Theſe were the wordes, that the IONIANS ſhould take the GREECIANS partes being their founders and aunceſters, & ſuch as fought for their libertie: or at the leaſt they ſhould trouble the armie of the barbarous people, & doe them all the miſchief they could, when the GREECIANS ſhould come to fight with them. By theſe words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their parte, or at the leaſt he ſhould make the barbarous people iealous & miſtruſtfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermoſt parte of the prouince of DORICA, into the countrie of PHOCIDA, burning & deſtroying the townes & citties of the PHOCIANS: the other GREECIANS laye ſtill & ſuffered the inuaſion, notwithſtanding the ATHENIANS did requeſt them to mete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to ſaue the countrie of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they wēt by ſea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearkē to it in no wiſe, & all was bicauſe they were deſirous they ſhould drawe to the ſtraite of PELOPONNESVS, and there they ſhould aſſemble the whole ſtrength and power of GREECE within the barre of the ſame, & make a ſtrong ſubſtantiall walle from the one ſea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angrie at this deuiſe, & were half diſcoraged & out of harte, to ſee thē ſelues thus forſakē and caſt of, by the reſt of the GREECIANS. For it was out of all ſpeache that they alone ſhould fight againſt ſo many thouſands of enemies: & therefore their only remedy was, to leaue their cittie: & to get them to the ſea. The people were very vnwilling to liſten hereūto, making their reckoning it was nedeles to be carefull to ouercome, or to ſaue them ſelues, hauing once forſaken the tēples of their godds, & the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themiſtocles ſeeing that neither reaſon, nor mans perſuaſion could bring the people to like his opinion: he beganne to frame a deuiſe (as men doe vſe ſomtimes in tragedies) & to threaten the ATHENIANS with ſignes from heauen, with oracles & aunſwers from the goddes. And the occaſion of Mineruaes draggō ſerued his turne for a celeſtiall ſigne & token, which by good fortune dyd not appeare in thoſe dayes in the tēple as it was wont to doe: & the prieſts found the ſacrifices which were daylie offered to him, whole & vntouched by any. Wherefore being enformed by Themiſtocles what they ſhould doe, they ſpred a brute abroade amongeſt the people, that the goddeſſe Minerua, the protectour & defendour of the cittie, had forſaken it, pointing them the waye vnto the ſea. And againe he wanne them by a prophecie, which cōmaunded them to ſaue them ſelues in walles of wodd: ſaying, that the walles of wodd dyd ſignifie nothing els but ſhippes. And for this cauſe he ſaied, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miſerable nor vnfortunate, bicauſe it ſhould geue the name of a moſt happy victorie which the GREECIANS ſhould get there. And ſo at the laſt they following his counſell, he made this decree, that they ſhould leaue the cittie of ATHENS to the cuſtodie of the goddeſſe Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all thoſe which were of age to carie any weapon ſhould get thē to the gallyes: & for the reſt, that euery man ſhould ſee his wife, children, & bondmen placed in ſome ſuer place as well as he could. After this decree was paſt & authoriſed by the people, the moſt parte of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wiues & litle children, into the cittie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS receyued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they ſhould be entertained of the cōmon charge, allowing them a pece, two obulos of their money a daye, & ſuffered the young children to gather fruite whereſoeuer they founde it: & furthermore dyd hier ſchoolemaſters at the charge of the cōmon wealth, to bring them vp at ſchoole. He that was the pēner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no comō money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Ariſtotle ſayeth) furniſhed euery ſouldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a crafte deuiſed of Themiſtocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas tergat (on the which Meduſus heade was grauen) had bene loſt, & was not found with the image of the goddeſſe: and faining to ſeeke for it, he ranſacked euery corner of the gallyes, and founde a great deale of ſiluer which priuate perſones had hidden amongeſt their fardells. This money was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the ſouldiers that were ſhipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of neceſſary things. When time came that they were

A to departe the hauen, & that all the cittie of ATHENS had taken ſea: one waye it was a pittie to beholde them. Another waye it made all ſortes to wounder, that conſidered the boldnes and corage of thoſe men, which before ſent awaye their fathers, and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at the teares, cries, ſherikes, & imbraſings of their wiues, their children, & departures, but ſtowtly and reſolutely helde on their courſe to SALAMINA. Notwithſtanding, there were many olde cittizens left ſtill of neceſſitie in ATHENS, bicauſe they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which ſturred many with compaſſion toward them. There was beſides, a certen pittie that made mens harts to yerne, when they ſaw the poore doggs, beaſts, & cattell ronne vp & downe bleating, mowing, and howling out alowde after their maſters, in token of ſorowe, when they dyd imbarke. Amongeſt theſe, there goeth a ſtraunge tale of Xan-

B thippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for ſorowe his maſter had left him behinde him, dyd caſt him ſelf after into the ſea, & ſwimming ſtill by the galleys ſide wherein his maſter was, he helde on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where ſo ſone as the poore curre lãded, his breath fayled him, & dyed preſently. They ſaye, at this daye the place called the doggs graue, is the very place where he was buried. Theſe were ſtraũge acts of Themiſtocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS ſory for the abſence of Ariſtides, and fearing leaſt of ſpyte he taking parte with the barbarous nation, might haue bene the ruine & diſtruction of the ſtate of GREECE, being baniſhed fiue yeres alſo before the warres, by Themiſtocles procurement: that he dyd ſet forth a decree, that all thoſe which had bene baniſhed for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to ſaye, & to geue counſell to the cittizens in thoſe things, which they thought beſt for the preſeruation of

C GREECE. And alſo where Eurybiades, being generall of the GREECIANS whole army by ſea, for the worthines of the cittie of SPARTA, but otherwiſe a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any caſe departe from thence, & retire into the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by lande aſſembled: that Themiſtocles withſtood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time alſo it was, that Themiſtocles made ſo notable aunſwers, which ſpecially are noted, & gathered together. For when Eurybiades ſayed one day vnto him. Themiſtocles, thoſe that at playes & games doe riſe before the company, are whiſtled at. It is true, ſaid Themiſtocles: but thoſe that tarie laſt ſo, doe neuer winne any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a ſtaffe in his hande lift it vp, as though he would haue ſtriken him. Strike & thou wilt, ſaid he, ſo thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades woũdring to ſee him ſo pacíẽt, ſuffered him

D then to ſaye what he would. Then Themiſtocles beganne to bring him to reaſon: but one that ſtoode by ſayed vnto him. Themiſtocles, for a man that hath neither cittie nor houſe, it is an ill parte to will others that haue, to forſake all. Themiſtocles turning to him, replied. We haue willingly forſaken our houſes and walles, ſayed he, cowardly beaſte that thou arte, bicauſe we would not become ſlaues for feare to loſe things, that haue neither ſoule nor life. And yet our cittie I tell thee is the greateſt of all GREECE: for it is a fleete of two hundred galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to ſaue you if you liſt. But if you will needes goe your wayes, & forſake vs the ſeconde time: you ſhall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free cittie, & haue poſſeſſed againe as much good land, as that they haue already loſt. Theſe wordes made Eurybiades preſently thincke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would

E not goe, and that they would forſake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reaſon againſt Themiſtocles opinion: he could not but aunſwer him. Alas, and muſt you my maſters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleue? In deede you haue a ſworde, but you lacke a harte. Some write, that whileſt Themiſtocles was talking thus from his galley, they ſpyed an owle flying on the right hande of the ſhippes, which came to light on one of the maſtes of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GREECIANS dyd agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by ſea. But when the fleete of their enemies ſhippes ſhewed on the coaſtes of ATTICA, harde by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any bodie could ſee, and that king Xerxes him ſelfe was come in perſone with all his army by lande, to campe by the ſea ſide: ſo that his whole power both by lande

F and ſea might be ſeene in ſight: then the GREECIANS had forgotten all Themiſtocles goodly perſuaſions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANS, conſidering how they might recouer the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they dyd growe very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be ſhorte, it was concluded that they ſhould ſayle awaye the next night following,&the maſters of the ſhippes had order geuen them to make all things readie for them to departe. Themiſtocles perceyuing their determination, he was maruelous angry in his minde, that the GREECIANS would thus diſperſe them ſelues a ſonder, repairing euery man to his owne cittie, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place,& the ſtraight of the arme of the ſea,where they laye in harber together,did offer them: and ſo he bethought him ſelfe howe this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practiſe of one Sicinus came into his minde, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken priſoner before in the warres, loued Themiſtocles very well, and was ſchoolemaſter to his children. This Sicinus he ſecretly ſent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertiſe him that Themiſtocles (generall of the ATHENIANS) was very deſirous to become his maieſties ſeruaunte, and that he dyd let him vnderſtand betimes, that the GREECIANS were determined to flye: and therefore that he wiſhed him not to let them ſcape, but to ſet vpon them, whileſt they were troubled and affrayed,and farre from their army by lande, to the ende that vpon a ſodaine he might ouerthrowe their whole power by ſea. Xerxes ſuppoſing this intelligence came from a man that wiſhed him well, receyued the meſſenger with great ioye, and thereupon gaue preſent order to his captaines by ſea, that they ſhould imbarke their men into the other ſhippes at better leyſure, and that preſently they ſhould put out with all poſſible ſpeede, two hundred ſayle to followe the GREECIANS in the taile, to ſhut vp the foreland of the ſtraite, and to compaſſe the Iles all about, that not one of his enemies ſhippes ſhould ſcape: and ſo it fell out. Then Ariſtides (Lyſimachus ſonne) being the firſt that perceyued it, went to Themiſtocles tente, though he was his enemie, and through his only meanes had bene baniſhed before,as ye haue heard: and calling him out,told him how they were enuironned. Themiſtocles, who knewe well enough the goodnes of this man, being very glad he came at that time to ſeeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicie he had vſed by the meſſage of Sicinus, praying him to put to his helpe to ſtaye the GREECIANS, and to procure with him, conſidering his worde had more authoritie among them, that they would fight within the ſtraight of SALAMINA. Ariſtides commending his great wiſdome, went to deale with the captaines of the other gallyes, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credit that he ſayed, vntill ſuch time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine,who being ſtolen out of the hoſte of the barbarous army, brought certen newes, that the ſtraight out of doubt was ſhut vp. So that beſides the neceſſitie which dyd vrge them, the ſpight which the GREECIANS conceyued thereof,dyd prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of daye, king Xerxes placed him ſelfe on a maruelous ſteepe highe hill,from whence he might deſcerne his whole flete, and the ordering of his army by ſea, aboue the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrowe waye or channell betwext the Ile of SALAMINA,and the coaſt of ATTICA: or as Aceſtodorus ſayeth, vpon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the pointe which they commonly call the hornes. There Xerxes ſet vp a throne of golde, and had about him many ſecretaries, to write all that was done in the battell. But as Themiſtocles was ſacrificing vnto the goddes in his galley that was admiral,they brought to him three young priſoners, fayer of complexion, richely arrayed with gold and iuells,whom they ſayed were the children of Sandaucé the kings ſiſter,and of prince Autarctus. So ſoone as Euphrantides the ſoothſayer had ſeene them, and at their arriuall obſerued there roſe a great bright flame out of the ſacrifice, and at the very ſelfe ſame inſtant that one on his right hand had ſneeſed: he tooke Themiſtocles by the hand, and willed him to ſacrifice all thoſe three priſoners vnto the god Bacchus, ſurnamed Omeſtes, as much to ſaye,as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GREECIANS ſhould not only be ſaued,but they ſhould haue the victorie ouer their enemies. Themiſtocles woundred much, to heare ſo ſtraunge and terrible a commaundement of the ſoothſayer. Neuertheles, the comon ſorte following his cuſtome,which is,to promiſe ſafety ſoner in the greateſt daungers,& moſt deſperate caſes,by ſtraunge & vnreaſonable, rather then by reaſonable and ordinary meanes: they beganne to call vpon the god with one voyce,and bringing the three priſoners neere vnto the altar,they compelled him to performe the ſacrifice in that ſorte as the ſoothſayer had appointed.

Themiſtocles ſtratageame, by the which he wanne the battell at Salamina.

Themiſtocles & Ariſtides conſent together to geue battell.

A appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the shippes of the barbarous nauie: Æschylus the poet, in a tragedie which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainely the trothe, sayeth thus:

King Xerxes had, a thousand shippes I knowve, amongest the vvhich, tvvo hundred vvere (I trovve) and seuen: vvhich all the rest dyd ouersayle vvith svvifter course. This is vvithouten fayle.

Xerxes king of Persia had a thousand ships.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in euery one of the which there were eightene souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no
B lesse skill & wisedom choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the hower was come, that of ordinarie custome the sea winde arose, and brought in a rough tyde within the channell, which dyd not hurt the GRÆCIAN gallyes, being made lowe and snugge, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallyes, being highe cargged, heauie, & not yare of steredge, and made them lye sidelong to the GREECIANS, who fiercely set vpon them hauing allwayes an eye to Themistocles direction, that best foresawe their aduãtage. At the same time, Ariamenes, Xerxes admirall, a man of great valure and worthiest of the Kings brethern, be stowed arrowes and dartes as it were from the walles of a castell, charging the gallye of Aminias Decelian, and Sosicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grappled with him, and fiercely entring the same, was by them valliantly receyued vpon their pikes, and thrust ouer borde into C the sea. Whose bodie floting amongest other shippewracks ARTEMISIA knowing, caused to be caried to king Xerxes. Nowe whilest this battell stoode in these termes, they saye that there appeared a great flame in the element, toward the cittie of ELEVSIN, and that a lowde voyce was heard through all the plaine of THRIASIA vnto the sea, as if there had bene a nũber of men together, that had songe out alowde, the holy songe of Iacchus. And it seemed by litle and litle, that there rose a clowde in the ayer from those which sange: that left the land, & came & lighted on the gallyes in the sea. Other affirmed, that they sawe armed men, which did reache out their hands from the Ile of ÆGINA, towards the GREECIAN gallyes: & they thought they were the ÆACIDES, for whose helpe they all prayed before the battell was begonne. The first man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemies shippes, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a D gallye: who hauing takẽ very rich furniture & flagges, did afterwards cõsecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would saye victorious. The other GREECIANS in the fronte being equall in nũber with the barbarous shipps, by reason of the straightnes of the arme of the sea wherein they fought, & so straightned as they could not fight but by one & one, where by the BARBARIANS disorderly layed one another abourde, that they did hinder them selues with their ouer multitude: & in the end were so sore pressed vpon by the GREECIANS, that they were cõstrayned to flye by night, after they had fought & mainteined battell, vntil it was very darke. So the GRÆCIANS wanne that glorious & famous victorie: of the which maye truly be affirmed that, as Simonides sayeth:

The Grecians victorie of the Persians nauy by sea.

VVas neuer yet, nor Greeke nor Barbarous crevv that could by sea, so many men subdevv: E Nor that obteind, so famous victorie in any fight, against their enemie.

Thus was the victorie wonne through the valliantnes and corage of those that fought that battell, but especially through Themistocles great policie and wisdome. After this battell Xerxes being mad for his losse, thought to fill vp the arme of the sea, and to passe his armie by lande, vpon a bridge, into the Ile of SALAMINA. Themistocles, bicause he would feele Aristides opinion, tolde him as they were talking together, that he thought best to goe and occupie the straight of HELLESPONT with the armie by sea, to breake the bridge of shippes which Xerxes had caused to be made: to the ende, said he, that we maye take ASIA into EVROPE. Aristides liked not this opinion. for we haue (said he) fought all this while against this barbarous
F King, who thought but to playe with vs: But if we shut him within GREECE, and bring him to fight of necessitie to saue his life: such an enemie that commaundeth so great an armie, will no more stand still as a looker on, and set at his ease vnder his golden pauilion, to see the pastime of the battell, but will proue euerie waye, and be him ſelfe in euery place at all aſſayes to ſaue him ſelf from ſuch a ſtraight & daunger. Thus with politicke care & foreſight, he maye eaſely amend his former faulte committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he ſhall ſee his life and Kingdome both depend vpon it. Therefore Themiſtocles, I would thincke not beſt to breake his bridge at all, which he hath cauſed to be made: but rather if we could, to build another to it, to driue him out of EVROPE as ſone as we could. Themiſtocles then replied: Seeing you thincke this were good to be done, we muſt all laye our heades together, to deuiſe, how he maye be forced to come out aſſone as we could. They breaking of with this reſolutiō, Themiſtocles ſent immediately one of the Kings enuches, called Arſaces, that was one of the gromes of his chāber, whom he found out amōgeſt the priſoners, & by him he ſent this meſſage vnto the King. That the GREECIANS hauing wōne the battell of him by ſea, had decreed in their counſell, how they would goe to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to breake the bridge of ſhippes he had cauſed to be made there. Whereof he thought good to aduertiſe him, for the goodwil he did beare him, and to the ende he might bethincke him betimes, to get him away to the ſea within his own dominion, and ſo paſſe backe againe into ASIA as ſone as he could; whileſt he gaue order to his allies and cōfederates, to ſtaye following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderſtading theſe newes, was ſo affrayed, that he hoyſed away with all poſſible ſpeede. The further foreſight and great wiſdome of Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, in marine cauſes, dyd manifeſtly appeare afterwards in the battell the GREECIANS fought before the cittie of PLATEA, againſt Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenante: who hauing but a ſmall power of the King his ſoueraines there, dyd yet put the GREECIANS to great diſtreſſe, and in hazard to haue loſt all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the cittie of ÆGINA wanne the fame for valliantnes aboue the reſt: & of priuate men, among the GRECIANS, Themiſtocles was iudged the worthieſt man: although it was ſore againſt their willes, bicauſe they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and hauing ſworne vpon the altar of their ſacrifices, that they would geue their voyces after their conſciences, to thoſe they thought had beſt deſerued it: euery one gaue him ſelfe the firſt place for worthines, and the ſeconde vnto Themiſtocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS caried him into SPARTA, where they iudged the honour and dignitie to their admirall Eurybiades: but the wiſedome and pollicie they attributed to Themiſtocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue braunche, and the goodlieſt coche that was in their cittie: and moreouer they ſent three hundred of their luſty youthes to accompany him, and conducte him out of their countrie. They ſaye, at the next feaſtes and aſſembly of the playes Olympicall that were made after this victorie: when Themiſtocles was once come into the ſhowe place where theſe games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all caſt their eyes on him, ſhewing him to the ſtraungers which knewe him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their handes dyd witneſſe howe much they eſteemed him. Whereat he him ſelfe tooke ſo great delite, that he confeſſed to his familiar friends, he then dyd reape the fruite and benefit of his ſundry and painefull ſeruices he had taken in hande, for the preſeruation of GREECE: ſo ambitious was he of nature, & couetous of honour, as we maye eaſely perceyue by certen of his dedes and notable ſayings they haue noted of him. For being choſen admirall of ATHENS he neuer diſpatched any cauſes priuate or publicke, howſoeuer they fell out, vntill the very daye of his departure, and taking ſhippe: and all bicauſe that men ſeeing him ryd much buſines at once, and to ſpeake with ſo many perſones together, they ſhould eſteeme him to be the notabler man, & of the greater authoritie. Another time he walked vpon the ſandes by the ſea ſide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the ſea had caſt vp vpon the ſhore: and ſeing ſome of them that had on ſtill their chaynes of golde, and bracelets, he paſſed by on his waye, but ſhewed them yet to his familiar friende that followed him, and ſayed vnto him: take thou thoſe, for thou art not Themiſtocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boye, and at that time dyd ſcornefully behaue him ſelfe vnto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he ſawe him in authoritie came to ſee him, he ſayed. O my young ſonne, and friend: we are both euen at one time (but to late) growen wiſe. He ſayed the ATHENIANS dyd not eſteeme

Themiſtocles ſtratageame.

Themiſtocles honored aboue all the Grecians.

Themiſtocles ambition noted.

Themiſtocles ſayings.

A eſteeme of him in time of peace: but when any ſtorme of warres were towardes, and they ſtoode in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as they ronne to the ſhadowe of a plane tree, vpon any ſodaine raine: and after fayer weather come againe, they cut awaye then the braunches, and bowghes thereof. There was a man borne in the Ile of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, dyd caſt him in the teethe, that it was not for his worthines, but for the noble cittie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne ſuch glorie. Thou ſayeſt true ſayed he: but neither ſhould I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou alſo if thou haddeſt bene an ATHENIAN. An other time one of the captaines of the cittie, hauing done good ſeruice vnto the common weale, made boaſt before Themiſtocles, and compared his ſeruice equall with his. Themiſtocles to aunſwer him, A prety tale of Themiſtocles.

B tolde him a prety tale. That the working daye brawled on a time with the holy daye, repining againſt her, that he laboured for his liuing continually, and howe ſhe dyd nothing but fill her bellie, and ſpende that they had gotten. Thou haſt reaſon ſayed the holy daye. But if I had not bene before thee, thou haddeſt not bene here nowe. And ſo, if I had not bene then: where had you my maſters bene nowe? His owne ſonne was a litle to ſawſie with his mother, and with him alſo, bearing him ſelf ouer boldely of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereupō being merely diſpoſed, he would ſaye that his ſonne could doe more then any mā in all GREECE. For, ſayeth he, the ATHENIANS commaunde the GRÆCIANS, I commaunde the ATHENIANS, my wife commaundeth me, and my ſonne commaundeth her. Moreouer bicauſe he would be ſingular by him ſelfe aboue all other men: hauing a pece of lande he Themiſtocles ſaying of his ſonne.

C would ſell, he willed the crier to proclaime open ſale of it in the market place, and with all he ſhould adde vnto the ſale, that his lande laye by a good neighbour. An other time, two men being ſuters to his daughter, he preferred the honeſter before the richer, ſaying: he had rather haue to his ſonne in lawe a man that lacked goodes, then goodes to lacke a man. Theſe were Themiſtocles pleaſaunt conceites and aunſwers. But after he had done all theſe things we haue ſpoken of before, he tooke in hande to buylde againe the cittie and walles of ATHENS, and dyd corrupt the officers of LACEDÆMONIA with money, to the end Themiſtocles buyld againe the walles of the cittie of Athens.

D they ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other ſaye when he had deceyued them by this ſubtiltie, he went vnto SPARTA as ambaſſadour, ſent thither of purpoſe vpon the complaintes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS dyd incloſe their cittie againe with walles, who were accuſed vnto the counſaill of SPARTA, by an orator called Poliarchus, who was ſent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpoſe to proſecute this matter againſt the ATHENIANS. Themiſtocles ſtowtely denied it to them, and prayed them for better vnderſtanding of the trothe, they would ſende ſome of their men thither to ſee it. This was but a fetche only to winne by this delaye, the ATHENIANS A ſubtile fetche of Themiſtocles.

E ſo muche more time to rayſe vp their walles, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould keepe as oſtages for ſuertie of his perſone, thoſe they ſhould ſend to ATHENS, to bring backe the reporte thereof: and ſo it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being informed of the trothe as it was, dyd him no hurte, but diſſembling the miſliking they had to be thus abuſed by him, ſent him awaye ſafe and ſounde. Afterwardes he made them alſo mende and fortifie the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing conſidered the ſituation of the place, and all to incline The hauen of Pirea fortified.

F the cittie to the ſea. Wherein he dyd directly contrary to all the counſell of the auncient kings of ATHENS: who ſeeking (as they ſaye) to withdrawe their people from the ſea, and to accuſtome them to liue vpon the lande, by planting, ſowing, and plowing their groundes, dyd deuiſe and geue out abroade, the fable they tell of the goddeſſe Pallas. And that is this, how ſhe contending with Neptune about the patronage of the country of ATHENS, brought forth and ſhewed to the iudges the olyue tree, by meanes whereof ſhe preuayled, and obteined the preheminence. Euen ſo Themiſtocles dyd not ioyne the hauen of PIRÆA, vnto the cittie of ATHENS, as the comicall poet Ariſtophanes ſayeth: but rather ioyned the cittie vnto the hauen PIRÆA, and the lande vnto the ſea. By this meanes he made the people ſtrong againſt the nobilitie, and brought the communaltie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reaſon the rule and authoritie fell into the handes of ſaylers, mariners, pilottes, ſhippemaſters, and ſuch kinde of ſeafaring men: ſo as the pulpet where all the oracles were made, ſtoode in the market place of PNYX, and dyd looke towardes the ſea. But the thirtie tyrannes that came in afterwardes, dyd remoue it, and turne it towardes the lande: holding opinion to be ſtrong by ſea, was it that dyd mainteine the authoritie of the popular ſtate. And that contrariwiſe they which liue by the labour and toyle of the earthe, doe more willingly like the gouernment of Nobilitie. Themiſtocles called to minde another matter alſo of greater importance, to make the cittie of ATHENS of a greater power by ſea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GRÆCIANS wintered in the hauen of PAGASES: he ſayed one daye in an open aſſembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was not to be tolde openly. The people willed him then to imparte it to Ariſtides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it ſpeedely. Themiſtocles then tolde Ariſtides: the thing he had conſidered of, was to burne the Arcenal where the GRÆCIANS nauy laye, and to ſet on fire all their ſhippes. Ariſtides hearing his purpoſe, returned to the people, and tolde them: howe nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniuſt, then that which Themiſtocles had deuiſed. The ATHENIANS then willed Ariſtides it ſhould be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the counſell of the Amphictyons (that is the generall counſaill of all the ſtates of GRÆCE aſſembled) howe the townes and citties of GRÆCE which had not bene parties with the GRÆCIANS to the league, againſt the barbarous people, ſhould be put of wholy from this counſaill. Themiſtocles dowting of the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANS alſo ſhould by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might doe what they would in this counſell: he ſpake ſo conſideratly for the citties which they would haue thus diſcharged, that he made the petitioners in the aſſembly vtterly to chaunge their opinion. Declaring, howe there were but one and thirtie citties compriſed only the league, and yet that ſome of them were very weake and ſmall: and howe it were no reaſon, that reiecting all the reſt of GREECE, the greateſt authoritie of this counſaill ſhould fall into the handes of two or three of the chiefeſt citties alone. For this cauſe chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS dyd euer beare him extreme hatred, and dyd ſet vp Cimon all they could, to be allwayes aduerſary oppoſite vnto him, and as it were to bearde him in all matters of ſtate, and the gouernment of ATHENS. They procured him beſides, the ill will and diſpleaſure of all the friendes and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went ſayling ſtill to and fro alongeſt the Iles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the ſame. And this is to be knowen by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would haue had money) and by the aunſwer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, howe he had brought them two mightie goddes: Loue, and Force. And they aunſwered him againe, that they alſo had two great goddeſſes, which kept them from geuing of him any money: Pouertie, and Impoſſibilitie. And to make this good alſo: Timocreon the Rhodian poet galled him to the quicke, when he ſharpely taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were baniſhed: and howe for couetouſnes of money he had betrayed, and forſaken, his hoſte and friende. The verſes wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effecte.

VVho liſt commend vvorthy Pauſanias, Xanthippus or good Leotychides, yet ſhall I ſeeme but light thereof to paſſe, compared vvith valliant Ariſtides.
For yet vvas naye, the like in Athens tovvne, nor neuer ſhall come none of like renovvne.
Themiſtocles by right and due deſerte, is hated of Latona, for his lyes, and for he bare a traitrous vvicked harte, vvho like a vvretche, & nigard did deuiſe, for ſmall revvardes, his hoſt Timocreon to holde, out of his countrie Ialiſon.

He

A He tooke for bribe (vniustly yet therevvhile)
of redy coyne three talents fayre and bright, revvoking such as pleased him, from exile and banishing full many a vvorthy vvight.
Or putting them to death, vvithout cause tolde, he gat thereby, great heapes of coyne and golde.
But in the ende (ô right reuvvarde for such) this bribing vvretch, vvas forced for to holde, a tipling hovvthe, most like a clovvne or snvvhe, at holy feastes and pastimes manifold, B vvhich vvere amongest the people in those dayes Isthmicians folke, dyd vse the like allvvayes.
And there he serued, his gests vvith cold meat still, vvhilest they that tasted of his cookerie, gan vvrishe that they (to ease their vveary vvill) had neuer liued to see the treccherie, of false Themistocles, and that he might no longer liue, vvhich vvrought them such despight.

After this, he dyd more openly blase him to the worlde, when he was banished and condemned: in a songe that had beginning thus.

C O Muse, let these my verses be dispersd, throughout all Grece, since they deserue no lesse:
and since the truthe vvhich is in them rehearst, deserueth fame, vvhom no man should suppresse.

They saye the cause was, why this Timocreon was banished: the friendshippe which he had with the Barbarous people, and for geuing them intelligence. Whereof Themistocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themistocles him selfe was accused afterwards of the same faulte, Timocreon then made these verses following against him.

Timocreon vvas not vvithout his pheere, vvhich did conferre vvith Medes priuely, D Since others no, the selfe same blame might beare, no foxes lurke in dennes as vvell as I.

Besides these verses, Themistocles owne cittizens for the ill will they bare him, were contented to heare him ill spoken of. Therefore while he sought wayes, to redresse all this: he was driuen to vse such meane, which more increased their hatred toward him. For in his orations to the people, he dyd ofte remember them of the good seruice he had done them: and perceyuing howe they were offended withall, he was driuen to saye. Why, are ye weary so ofte to receyue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he surnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Aristobule, as much to saye, as the good counseller: meaning thereby, howe he had geuen graue and wise counsell, both vnto E his cittie, and to all the rest of the Grecians. He built this temple also neere his house, in a place called Melita, where the hangemen doe cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throwe the ragges and halters endes of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by lawe. There was also in our dayes in the temple of Diana Aristobule, a litle image of Themistocles, which shewed plainely, that he was not only wise, and of a noble minde, but also of a great maiestie and countenaunce in face. In the ende, the Athenians banished him Athens for fiue yeres, bicause they would plucke downe his ouergreat corage and authoritie, as they dyd vse to serue those, whose greatnes they thought to be more, then common equalitie that ought to be among cittizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, called Ostracismon, was no punishment for any faulte committed, but a mitigation and taking F away of the enuie of the people, which delited to plucke downe their stomaks that to much seemed to exceede in greatnes: and by this meanes they tooke awaye the poyson of his malice, with diminishing his glorie and honour. So Themistocles being banished Athens, went to dwell in Argos. In this meane season, Pausanias trecchery fell out, which gaue his enemies occasion to lye heauie on his backe. But he which became his accuser, & was partener of the treason, was one called Leobotes (Alcmeons sonne) borne in a village called Agravla. Besides this, the Spartans also dyd sit on his skirtes, & charged him sorely. For Pausanias neuer before reuealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although he was his very familliar friende. But after he sawe Themistocles was banished, and dyd take his exile very vnpaciently: then Pausanias was bolde to open his treason to him, to procure him to take his parte, and shewed him the letters the king of Persia had written to him, and all to sturre him vp against the Græcians, as against vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themistocles shooke him of, and tolde him plainely he would be no partener of his treason. Notwithstanding, he neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor discouered the practise he intended: hoping either he would haue geuen it ouer, or that shortely it would appeare by some other meane, considering he so fondly aspired to things of great daunger, and without purpose or possibilite. After Pausanias was condemned, and had suffered paynes of death for the same: they found amongest his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themistocles to be very sore suspected. Whereupon the Lacedæmonians on the one side cried out of him: and his enemies and ill willers at Athens accused him on th'other side. To the which he made aunswer by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people, it was not likely that he (who sought all the waies to rule, and was not borne to serue, neither had any minde thereto) would euer haue thought in his heade, to sell his owne libertie, and the Græcians also vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, sent to apprehende him, and to bring him before the states of all Græce, to be iudged by that counsaill. Whereof Themistocles hauing intelligence in time, he dyd conuey him selfe into the Ile of Corphv, bicause the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certen pleasure in time paste he had done them. For they being at sute and strife with the Corinthians, he tooke vp the matter betweene them, and gaue iudgement on their side, & condemned the Corinthians to paye them twety talents damages: and did set downe an order, that they should occupie the Ile of Levcade in cõmon together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, aswell of the one cittie, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whether being followed by the Athenians, & the Lacedæmonians, he was compelled to venter him selfe vpon a doubtfull and very daungerous hope. For he went to yelde him selfe into the hands of Admetus, king of the Molossians. Who hauing heretofore made certen requestes vnto the Athenians, and being shamefully denied them by meanes of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefest height and authoritie) the King was maruelously offended with him: and it was a clere case in deede, that if he could then haue layed handes on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the present miserie of his exile, he thought he might lesse feare the Kings olde quarrell and displeasure, then the freshe hate & enuie of his contriemen. Whereupon he went vnto king Admetus, trusting to his mercie, and became an humble suter to him in a straunge extraordinarie sorte. For he tooke the Kings litle young sonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappell: which humble manner of suinge the Molossians take to be most effectuall, and such as they dare not denie, nor refuse. Some saye that Queene Phthia her selfe, the Kings wife, dyd enforme him of this their country custome and manner, & brought her litle sonne also neere vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Admetus him selfe that taught & shewed him this inforcing manner of petition, only for a cloke to excuse him selfe to those that should come to demaunde Themistocles of him: that by duetie of religion he was so straightly bounde & restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In this meane time, Epicrates Acharnian founde the meanes secretly to conuey Themistocles wife and children out of Athens, & dyd send them priuelie vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused, & put to death, vpon Cimons accusation & motion, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring those matters I knowe not howe, or making as though Themistocles had not remembred him selfe, doth saye, that Themistocles sayled into Sicile, where he sought to mary Hierons daughter, the tyranne of Syracvsa: promising him if he would let him haue her, he would

The manner of supplicatiõ among the Molossians.

A would affure him to conquer all GRECE for him, and to bring them vnder his obedience. But Hieron refuſing this offer, Themiſtocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophraſtus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron hauing ſent certain running horſes to the feaſt of games Olympicall, & hauing ſet vp a maruelous riche and ſumptuous tent there: Themiſtocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they ſhould teare the tyrannes tente in peces, and not to ſuffer his horſes to ronne with other ſwifte and light horſes, and to cary away the price in thoſe holy games. Thucydides againe declareth, howe he went vnto the other ſea, and imbarked in the cittie of PYDNE, being knowen of neuer a man in the ſhippe, vntill ſuch time as the winde beganne to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chaunce dyd beſiege at that time, where being afeard
B to be ſet on lande, he was forced to bewraye him ſelf to the maſter of the ſhippe, & the maſters mate, and wrought them, what with fayer wordes and what with threates (by ſaying he would accuſe them to the ATHENIANS, that they dyd not ignorantly receiue him in, but hiered for money) ſo as he compelled them to ſayle on further, and to cary him into ASIA. As for his goodes, his friendes ſaued the moſt parte of them, and ſent them into ASIA to him. But for thoſe that came to light, and were confiſcate vnto the ſtate: Theopompus writeth, they dyd amounte to the value of one hundred talents. And Theophraſtus ſayeth, but to foure ſcore talents only. So that all his goodes was not worth three talents, when he beganne to gouerne the ſtate of the common weale. when he came vnto the cittie of CVMA, he perceyued that all the coaſtes by ſea were layed for him to apprehende him, and that he had many ſpyalls
C vpon him: among the which, theſe were two ſpeciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that ſought their gayne any waye they could. For the king of PERSIA had proclaymed by ſound of trũpet, two hundred talẽts to him that brought him Themiſtocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆGES, where no liuing bodie knewe him, but his hoſt only, called Nicogenes: who was the richeſt man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knewe all the noble men of authoritie that were about the king of PERSIA. Themiſtocles continued hidden certen dayes in his houſe: in which time, on a night after the feaſt of a ſacrifice, one Olbius, ſchoolemaſter to Nicogenes children, by ſome ſecret working of the goddes, ſodainely fell beſides him ſelfe, and beganne to ſinge theſe verſes out alowde.

Themiſtocles dreame.

The next night following, Themiſtocles being faſt aſleepe in his bed, dreamed that a ſnake wounde it ſelfe round about his bellie, and glided vpwardes to his necke, vntill it touched his face, and ſodainely then it became an eagle, and imbraced him with his winges: and ſo at length dyd lifte him vp into the ayer, and caried him a maruelous waye of, vntill he thought he ſawe a golden rodde (ſuche as Heraulde vſe to carie in their handes) whereupon the eagle dyd ſet him, and ſo was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought him ſelfe in. The trothe was, Nicogenes had this deuiſe in his heade, howe he might bring him ſafe to E the king of PERSIAES courte. The Barbarous nations for the moſt parte (and ſpecially the PERSIANS) are of a very ſtraunge nature, and maruelous iealous ouer their women, and that not onely of their wiues, but alſo of their bonde women, and concubines: which they keepe ſo ſtraightly locked vp, that no man euer ſeeth them abroade at any time, but are allwayes like houſedoues kept within doores. And when they haue any occaſion to goe into the country, they are caried in cloſe coches couered all about, that no man can looke into them. Themiſtocles was conueyed into one of theſe coches dreſt after this manner, and had warned his men to aunſwer thoſe they met by the waye, that asked whom they caried: howe it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the countrie of IONIA, which they caried to the courte for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampſacenian ſaye, he went thither after the F death of Xerxes, and ſpake with his ſonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he ſpake with him ſelfe. Yet notwithſtanding it appeareth that Thucydides wordes doe beſt agree with the chronicles & tables, recording the ſucceſſion of times, although they be of no great certaintie. Themiſtocles being come nowe to the ſwordes poinse (as it were) and to the extremitie of his daunger: dyd firſt preſent him ſelfe vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thouſand footemen, and ſayed vnto him. Syr, I am a GRECIAN borne, and deſire to ſpeake with the King: I haue matters of importance to open to his maieſtie, and ſuch as I knowe he will thanckefully receyue. Artabanus aunſwered him in this manner. My friend ſyr ſtraunger, the lawes and cuſtomes of men are diuers, and ſome take one thing for honeſt, others ſome another thing: but it is moſt honeſty for all men, to keepe and obſerue the lawes and manners of their owne countrie. For you GRECIANS haue the name to loue libertie, and equalitie aboue all things: & for vs, amongeſt all the goodly lawes and cuſtomes we haue, we eſteeme this aboue the reſt: to reuerence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and ſtate. Wherefore, if thou wilt facion thy ſelfe after our manner to honour the King, thou mayeſt both ſee him, and ſpeake with him: but if thou haue another minde with thee, then muſt thou of neceſſitie vſe ſome third perſone for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrie: the King neuer geueth audience to any man, that hath not firſt honoured him. Themiſtocles hearing what he ſayed, aunſwered him againe. My lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the deſire I haue to aduaunce his glorie and power, is the only cauſe of my preſent repaire vnto his courte: therefore I meane not only to obey your lawes (ſince it hath ſo pleaſed the goddes to rayſe vp the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatnes) but will cauſe many other people alſo to honour the King, more then there doe at this preſent. Therefore let there be no ſtaye, but that my ſelfe in perſone maye deliuer to the King that I haue to ſaye vnto him. Well, ſayed Artabanus: whom then ſhall we ſaye thou arte? For by thy ſpeache it ſeemeth, thou art a man of no meane ſtate and condition. Themiſtocles aunſwered him: as for that Artabanus, none ſhall knowe before the King him ſelfe. Thus doth Phanias reporte it. But Eratoſthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: howe Themiſtocles had acceſſe vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themiſtocles being brought to his preſence, after he had preſented his humble duety and reuerence to him, ſtoode on his feete, and ſayed neuer a worde, vntill the King commaũded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he aunſwered. Maye it pleaſe your maieſtie, ô noble King: I am Themiſtocles the Athenian, a baniſhed man out of my countrie by the GRECIANS, who humbly repayreth to your highnes, knowing I haue done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perſuade my ſelf I haue done them farre more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS backe they dyd not follow you, whẽ the ſtate of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, and my natiue country from daunger, and that I knew I ſtoode then in good ſtate to pleaſure you. Nowe for me, I finde all mens good willes agreable, to my preſent miſery and calamitie: for I come determined, moſt humbly to thancke your highnes, for any grace and fauour you ſhall ſhewe me, & alſo to craue humble pardone, if your maieſty be yet offended with me. And therfore licence me (moſt noble King) to beſeche you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witneſſes of the pleaſures I haue done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace vſe my harde fortune, as a good occaſion to ſhewe your honorable vertue, rather then to ſatisfie the paſſion of your heate and choller. For in ſauing my life, your maieſtie ſaueth an humble ſuter that put him ſelfe to your mercie: and in putting me to death, you ſhall ryd away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Hauing ſpoken thus theſe words, he ſayed further. That the goddes, by diuers ſignes and tokens had procured him, to come to ſubmit him ſelfe vnto him, and tolde the King what viſion he had ſeene in his dreame in Nicogenes houſe: and declared alſo the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he ſhould goe vnto him that was called as a god, and howe he thought it was the perſone of his maieſtie, bicauſe that god and he in trothe were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him ſpeake, gaue him then no preſent aunſwer againe, notwithſtanding he maruelouſly wondred at his great wiſedome and boldenes. But afterwardes amongeſt his familiars the King ſayed, he thought him ſelfe very happy to mete with the good fortune of Themiſtocles comming to him: and ſo beſought his great god Arimanius, that he would allwayes ſend his enemies ſuch mindes, as to baniſhe the greateſt, & wiſeſt men amongeſt them.

A It is reported also he did sacrifice vnto the goddes, to geue them thankes therefore, and disposed him selfe presently to be merry, Insomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middest of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioye: I haue Themistocles the Athenian. The next morning the King hauing sent for the chiefest lordes of his courte, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnes at all, specially when he sawe the souldiers warding at the courte gates, geue him ill countenaunce and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderstoode his name. Moreouer, Roxanes, one of the captaines as Themistocles passed by him going to the King (who was set in his chayer of state, and euery man keeping silence) softely sighing, sayed vnto him. O thou Greekish serpent, subtill and malicious: the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hether. Neuertheles when he came to the King, & had

B once againe made him a very humble and lowe reuerence: the King saluted him, & spake very curteously to him, saying. I am nowe your detter of two hundred talents, for presenting your self. It is good reason I should deliuer you the money promised him that should haue brought you: but I geue you a further warrante, be bolde I charge you, & speake your minde freely, saye what you thinke of the state of GRECE. Themistocles then aunswered him. That mens wordes did properly resemble the stories and imagery in a pece of arras: for both in the one & in the other, the goodly images of either of them are seene, when they are vnfolded and layed open. Contrariwise they appeare not, but are lost, when they are shut vp, & close folded: whereupon he sayed to the King, he must nedes require some further time of aunswer. The King liked his comparison passingly well, & willed him to appointe his owne time. Themistocles asked a yere:

C in which time hauing pretily learned the Persian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King himselfe without any interpreter. So, suche as were no courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GRECE. But bicause the chaunge & alteration of the courte fell out great at that time, the noble men imagined he had bene so bolde to comon with the King of them also. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, & afterwardes murmured much against him. For in deede the king dyd honour Themistocles aboue all other straũgers whatsoeuer they were. On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him see his mother, with whom he grewe familliar: and by the kings owne commaundement he was to heare the disputations of the wise men of PERSIA touching secret philosophie, which they call magike. Demaratus the LACEDÆMONIAN being at that time in the courte of PERSIA, the king willing him to aske

D what gifte he would. He besought the king to graũt him this fauour: to licẽce him to goe vp & down the cittie of SARDIS, with his royall hat on his head, as the kings of PERSIA doe. Mithropaustes, the kings cosin, taking him by the hãd, sayed vnto him. Demaratus, the kings hatte thou demaundest, and if it were on thy heade, it would couer but litle wit: Naye though Iupiter dyd geue thee his lightning in thy hande, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the king gaue him so sharpe a repulse for his vnreasonable request, & was so angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgeuen him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a suter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the reporte goeth, that the kings successours which haue bene since that time, vnder whom the PERSIANS haue had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great

E state or personage of GRECE into their seruice, they wrote vnto him, and promised him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept vp to great countenaunce and authoritie, & followed with great traines of suters after him by reason of his greatnes: seing him self one daye very honorably serued at his table, & with all sortes of daintie meates, he turned him to his childrẽ, & sayed vnto them. My sonnes, we should haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The most writers doe agree, that he had giuen him the reuenue of 3. cities for his allowance of bread, wine & vittailes: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, & MYVNTA. But Neãthes Cyzicenũs, & Phanias, doe adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, & PALESCEPSIA: the one to defraye his charges of apparell, & the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themistocles going into

F the lowe countries towards the sea, to take order against the practises of the GRECIANS: there was a PERSIAN lord called Epixies (gouernour of highe PHRYGIA) that had layed a traine to kill him (hauing of long time hiered certaine murderers of PISIDIA to doe it) so soone as he should come into a towne of his gouernment, called the Lyons head. But as he slept on a daye A in his house in the after none, the mother of the goddes appeared vnto him, and sayed, Themistocles, goe not to the Lyons heade, for feare thou mete with the Lyon: and for this warning, I doe aske thy daughter Mnesiptolema for my seruante. Themistocles waking sodainely out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddesse, and turning out of the highe waye, fetched another compasse about. Afterwardes hauing passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beastes which caried his tente, fell by the waye, vnfortunatly in a riuer, and all his arras and tapestry hangings being throughly wet, his seruaunts were driuen to laye them out a drying by moone light. The Pisidians that laye in wayte, and could not discerne by moone light that they were hangings layed out to drye, thought it had bene the very tente Themistocles selfe dyd lye in: whereupon they went vnto it with their swordes B drawen in their handes, hoping to haue taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and beganne to lifte vp a pece of the hangings: some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watche) perceyuing them, ranne vpon them, and tooke them. So Themistocles hauing escaped this daunger, wondred greately at the fauour of the goddesse which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the cittie of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesiptolema prioresse of the same. As he passed by the cittie of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to visite the temples, and offerings that had bene geuen there. So he sawe an image of a mayden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the goddes, being two yeardes highe, which they called the Hydrophora: as much to saye, as the water carier. And it was a statue, which him selfe had heretofore dedica- C ted, and caused to be made, with the fines of those that had payed forfeytures, for stealing or turning awaye the water course at ATHENS, at suche time as he was master surueyer of the water workes and conduites there. Wherfore, whether Themistocles was sory to see this goodly image a prisoner in the handes of the Barbarous people, or that he would showe vnto the ATHENIANS the greatnes of his credit and authoritie through all the Kings dominions: he spake to the gouernour of LYDIA, & prayed him for his sake that he would send this image againe to ATHENS. But this Barbarous gouernour was very angry with his requeste, and tolde him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistocles beganne to be afeard, & was driuen to seeke to the gouernours women and concubines, whom he got for money to intreate him, and so made fayre weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he tooke D better garde of him selfe in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuy of the Barbarous people. For he progressed not vp and downe ASIA, as Theopompus writeth, but laye a long time in the cittie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioying the Kings gratious giftes bestowed on him: where he was honoured & reuerenced for one of the greateste persones of PERSIA, whileste the King was els where occupied in the affayres of the highe prouinces of ASIA, and had no leysure to thincke vpon those of GRECE. But when newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour & assistance of the ATHENIANS, & that the GRECIANS gallyes dyd scowre the seas euen vnto the Ile of CYPRVS, & vnto the coastes of CILICIA, & that Cimon had all the sea in subiection: that made him then to bende all his thoughts howe to resist the GRECIANS, that their greatnes might not turne to his hurte. Then commissions went out E to leauy men, to assemble captaines, & to dispatche postes vnto Themistocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, straightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he should faithfully keepe his promise he had made to him. But he, to shewe that he neither maliced his cittizens, nor was moued with the desire of greatnes and authoritie he might haue growen vnto in those warres, or els for that he thought the Kings expectation would proue to a greater matter, then he could ende or wade through, considering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongest the rest had maruelous good fortune, and that it should be a reproche to him to stayne the glorie of so many noble actes, so many triumphes, and so great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wise resolution with him selfe, to make suche an ende of his life, as the F fame thereof deserued. For he made a solemne sacrifice vnto the goddes, and feasted at the same all his friends. And, after he had taken his leaue of them all, he drancke bulles bloude,

A as moſt men thincke (or as other ſaye) poyſon, which diſpatcheth a man in foure and twenty howers, and ſo ended his dayes in the cittie of MAGNESIA, after he had liued threeſcore and fiue yeres, and the moſt parte of them allwayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the king of PERSIA vnderſtanding the cauſe and manner of his deathe, dyd more eſteeme him afterwards, then he dyd before, and that euer after he continued to vſe his friends and familliars in very good ſorte. For he left children behinde him, which he had of Archippa (Lyſanders daughter) of the towne of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, Polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the philoſopher maketh mention, ſaying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwiſe that there was no goodnes in him. His other ſonnes that were elder, as Neocles, dyed being bitten with a horſe: and as for Diocles another ſonne, his grandfather Lyſander dyd a- Themiſtocles children.

B dopt him for his ſonne. He had many daughters, of the which Mneſiptolema (which he had by a ſeconde wife) was maried vnto her halfe brother Artheptolis, for they were not both of one venter. An other called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of CHIO. Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN. And Nicomacha, vnto Pharſicles, Themiſtocles nephue: vnto whom her brethern dyd mary her within the cittie of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharſicles dyd bring vp ASIA, which was the youngeſt of all his daughters. Furthermore, his ſumptuous tumbe ſtandeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocides writeth of his bones, in a booke he made to his friendes, is not to be credited, which was: that the ATHENIANS hauing founde the aſhes of his bones, dyd caſt them vp into the ayer, as a deuiſe to ſturre vp the noble men againſt the people. And Themiſtocles tumbe and relickes.

C Phylarchus in his hiſtorie (much like vnto the fayned ſubtilties of a tragedie) bringeth in I can not tell what Neocles, and Demopolis, for Themiſtocles ſonnes, to moue the readers with compaſſion. Howbeit no man is ſo ſimple, but will iudge it ſtraight a very fayning and deuiſe. Diodorus the coſmographer alſo, in a booke he hath written of tumbes and monuments ſayeth, by coniecture, rather then of any certen knowledge: that alongeſt the hauen of PIRAEA, coming towardes the head of Alcimus, there is a forelande in forme of an elbowe, within the which when they haue doubled the pointe, the ſea is allwayes calme, and there they finde a great and long foundation or baſe, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an altar, and that is (ſayeth he) Themiſtocles tumbe. And he ſuppoſeth that Plato the comicall poet doth witneſſe it in theſe verſes.

D Thy graue is ſet and plaſt, comodiouſly, Where paſſengers and marchants that come by Maye viſite thee, and where it maye regarde, All ſuch as ſeeke that porte to be their warde.
Somtimes alſo it maye reioyce to ſee,
The bloudy fights, vpon the ſea that be.

Honour donne to Themiſtocles after his death.

And furthermore, thoſe of MAGNESIA dyd inſtitute certen honours vnto the iſſue of Themiſtocles, which continew yet vnto this daye. And in my time, another Themiſtocles alſo of ATHENS dyd enioy the ſame honours, with whom I was familliarly conuerſante in the houſe of Ammonius the philoſopher.

The ende of Themiſtocles life.

THE LIFE OF Furius Camillus.

AMONGEST many great matters which are ſpoken of this Furius Camillus, this ſeemeth moſt ſtraunge and wonderfull aboue the reſt. That he hauing borne the chiefeſt offices of charge in his countrie, and hauing done many notable and worthy deedes in the ſame: as one that was choſen fiue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had wonne him ſelfe the name & title of the ſeconde founder of Rome, and yet neuer came to be Conſul. But the only cauſe thereof was, that the common weale of Rome ſtoode then in ſuch ſtate and ſorte. The people were then at diſſention with the Senate. They would chuſe no more Conſuls, but other kynde of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares: theſe dyd all things with like power & authoritie as the Conſuls, yet were they nothing ſo odious vnto the people, by reaſon of the number that was of them. For it was ſome hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the ſmall number of nobilitie, that the gouernment of the ſtate being put into ſixe, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eaſier, and tollerabler. Nowe Camillus being at that time in his beſt credit and authoritie, and in the prime and glorie of his doings, dyd not deſire to be made Conſul without the good-will of the people, although whileſt he was in authoritie, there were many times Conſuls created. But to all other offices and dignities, he was called, and choſen. He behaued him ſelfe in ſuch ſorte, that when he was alone, he made his authoritie comon to other: and when he had companions & aſſociates, the glorie of all redounded to him ſelf alone. The cauſe whereof, was his modeſtie on the one ſide, for he commaunded euer without enuie: and his great wiſedome and ſufficiencie on the other ſide, for the which all others willingly gaue him place, and yelded to him. The houſe of the Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the firſt that beganne to ſet him ſelf forwards. For in a great battell which was fought againſt the Æques and Volſces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Poſthumius Tubertus, was the firſt that riding out of the army, aduaunced him ſelfe, and gaue the charge. And being ronne into the thighe at that time with a ſtaffe broken vpon his thighe, he plucked the trunchen out, and retired not for all that: but geuing chardge againe vpon the ſtowteſt of the enemies, he fought it out ſo valliantly to the encoraging of other, that he was the chief cauſe they turned their backes. Whereupon, to requite his ſeruice done at that time (beſides other honours

A honours they dyd him) they made him Censor: an office at that time of great preheminence & dignitie. In his office of Censorshippe, he dyd two notable acts. The one very honest: when he brought men that were not maried, to marie the women whom the warres had left widows, which were in nũber many. To this he got them partly by persuasion, & partly by threatnings, to set roũd fines vpõ their heads that refused. The other very necessary: in that he brought the orphanes to be cõtributories, vnto taxes, & subsidies, which before payed nothing. The cause thereof was, the continuall warres, about the which the common weale susteined great charges: but specially about the siege of the citie of the VEIANS (which some call VENETANIANS) that was a very sore burden to thẽ at that time. For it was the capitall cittie of all THVSCAN, the which for store of armour, & nũber of souldiers, was nothing inferiour vnto the cittie of Rome.

The cittie of Veies besieged.

B For the VEIANS being growẽ to stomake & corage in time, by reason of their wealth & prosperitie, & for the sundry great battells they had fought against the ROMAINES, that contẽded with them for glory and empire: now it fell so out, that they finding them selues weakened by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receyued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacokes brauery, & ambition, to byd them battell any more in the fielde. Howbeit the inhabitants of the cittie of VEIES hauing raised the walles, & made very great high rãpers, beganne to fortifie them selues, & made good prouision for armour & munition, besides store of corne, shotte, & other necessary things: they valliantly, & without feare of any thing, defended the siege of the ROMAINES, that cõtinued long time, & was no lesse hard & painefull vnto thẽ that did besiege, then it was vnto those that were besieged. For where the ROMAINES were wõt

C before time to keepe their houses in the winter season, and the field only in the sommer time: that was the first time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to buylde fortes, and to intrenche their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countrie, and to winter abroade as they were wont to lye in the campe in sommer. Nowe this siege had continued seuen whole yeres together. The captaines were burdened that they dyd not their dueties, nor stoode manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were discharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to followe the siege. Among those, Camillus was one, whom then the seconde time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithstanding dyd nothing then in that siege, bicause it was his happe by lot, to make warres vpon the PHALERIANS, and the CAPENATES. These people whilest the ROMAINES were occupied other where, had

D inuaded their countrie, and done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THVSCANS. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowen a great number of them in the fielde, had the rest in chase, and draue them to take their cittie, and dyd shut them vp within their owne walles. The chaunce that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCAN warres were greatest, dyd maruelously amate the ROMAINES, being no lesse wounderfull, then the most straunge and vncredible thing that could be tolde by man. For they could not finde out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall grounde: considering it was in the later end of Autumne, and sommer was ended, and that there had not bene much rayne, nor notable sowthewinds. And although there are many lakes, many brooks & riuers, many springs, and other waters in ITALIE: yet some of them dried vp altogether, other ranne but faintely

The wonderfull ouerflowing of the lake Albanus.

E by reason of the drought, and all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be commonly in sommer) very lowe, and there was scante any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwise, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whether out of him selfe, being enuironned all about with hilles and mountaines, and where the earthe is good: beganne to swell, and rise to euery mans sight, without any cause at all (but secret and hidden vnto the goddes alone) and went allwayes increasing alongest those hilles sides, vntill suche time as it came to be euen with the height of the highest mountaine, gathering vpwardes still without any waues or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poore shepeheardes and heardemen, keeping their cattell thereaboutes, maruelously affrayed. But at the lengthe when the earthe and weight of one of the hilles (which kepte in the lake as a walle,

F from running ouer into the felde) beganne to breake by reason of the waight, and great quantitie of water, that ranne straight with a maruelous extreme force and violence ouer all the arrable landes and groundes planted with trees, and so tooke his course into the sea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wounderfully affrayed, and iudged that it was some signe and prognostication of some wounderfull thing to come. And there was no other newes currante in the campe, which laye at siege of the cittie of VEIES: insomuch as the very brute of it flewe ouer the walles of the cittie, vnto them that were besieged. And as it happeneth very ofte in long sieges, that those which lye in campe doe oftentimes talke with them that are besieged: there was a ROMAINE who fell acquainted, and commonly vsed to talke familiarly with one of the cittie, who could tell of many olde & straunge things done and happened, and was very skillfull aboue any other in the cittie, in the arte of diuination, or soothesaying. The ROMAINE then tolde him one daye the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANVS, and perceyuing that the other after he had heard him, was as mery as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their siege: he tolde him further, that this wounderfull chaunce was not only happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more straunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common weale had but harde succesſe, yet he would procure that his owne priuate matters might prosper well with him. The VEIAN aunswered him, he would heare them with a goodwill, & gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard some great secret. So the ROMAINE training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his waye, vntill he sawe he was a good distance of from the gates of the cittie, he sodainely cought holde on him, and by strong hand caried him awaye with him, and with helpe of other souldiers which came ronning out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The VEIAN seeing him self thus forciblie vsed, and knowing also that fatall desteny cannot be auoyded, beganne to declare vnto the ROMAINES, the auncient oracles and prophecies touching the fortune of their cittie: by which it was reported vnto them, that the cittie of VEIES should neuer be taken, vntill the enemie had causeſ the water of the lake ALBANVS (which should breake out) to be brought backe againe, and to turne it some other waye from thence, that it should not fall into the sea. This was caried vnto the Senate at ROME, to be consulted of in counsail: and there it was determined they should send to the oracle of Apollo, at the cittie of DELPHES, and aske him what they should doe therein. So thither were sent great and notable men, Cossus Licinius, Valerius Politus, and Fabius Ambustus: who hauing ended their iorney by sea, and receyued aunswer of that they demaunded, returned home againe, and amongest other oracles they brought one that sayed thus. That through negligence they had omitted some auncient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the Latines. And another willed them, that they should by all possible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANVS that it fell not into the sea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be droncke vp in the middest of the fields. When these oracles were vnderstanded, the priests prepared all things for diuine seruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth yere of the warres against the VEIANS, put of all those which dyd beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horse men, Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hande with any thing, he made a vowe vnto the goddes, that if it pleased them to graunte a happy ende of these warres, in honour of them he would celebrate great playes, and buyld a temple vnto the goddesse which the ROMAINES call Matuta: which seemeth to be her whom we call Leucothea, considering the ceremonies done in these sacrifices. For they cause a chamber mayde to enter into her temple, & there they boxe her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, and doe embrace their brothers children rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chaunced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all these vowes and prayers made, he entred with his army into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he ouerthrewe in a great battell, together with the CAPENATES also, which came to ayde them. From thence he went to the siege of the cittie of VEIES, where perceyuing to take it by assaulte, was not to be wonne without great daunger: he beganne to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and with all

A all ſo deepe, that the enemies could perceyue nothing. Nowe when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an aſſaulte to the walles in all places alike about the cittie at one inſtante, to bring out all the inhabitants of the cittie to man the walles. Whileſt they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence: Camillus ſouldiers entred ſecretly through the mines within the caſtell, harde by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Churche of all the cittie, and whereunto the cittizens had moſt deuotion. They ſaye that euen at that preſent time the generall of the THVSCANS dyd ſacrifice vnto the goddes, & that his ſoothesayer hauing conſidered the intrells of the beaſtes offered vp in ſacrifice, cried out alowde, that the goddes gaue the victorie vnto him, which ſhould happen to come vpon them in this ſacrifice. The ROMAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped
B out, crying, and making noyſe with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were ſo aſtonied, that they fled vpon it, and ſo the ROMAINES tooke the intrells, and caried them vnto Camillus. And theſe be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the cittie, and ſeeing from the toppe of the caſtell the infinite goodes & riches within the cittie, which the ſouldiers ſpoyled & made hauoke of, he wept for very pittie. And when thoſe that were about him tolde him he was a happy man: he lift vp his handes vnto heauen, and made this prayer. O mightie god Iupiter, and you ô goddes, which ſee and iudge mens good and ill worckes: you knowe right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cauſe offered vs) begonne this warre, but iuſtly, and by compulſion, to be reuenged of a cittie our enemie, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to conteruayle this our great good C proſperitie, and victorie, ſome bitter aduerſitie and ouerthrowe be predeſtined vnto vs: I beſeeche you then (moſt mercifull goddes) in ſparing our cittie of ROME, and this her army, you will (with as litle hurte as maye be) let it all fall and light vpon my perſone alone. And as he had ſpoken theſe wordes, and was turning on his right hande (according to the manner of the ROMAINES after they haue prayed vnto the goddes) he fell downe flat before them all. The ſtanders by taking this fall for an ill token, were ſomwhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he tolde them that the thing he requeſted of the goddes was happened vnto him. And that was, a litle hurte, in exchaunge of a great good fortune. So the whole cittie being ſpoyled and rifled, he was alſo deſirous to carie Iunos image to ROME, to accompliſhe the vowe he had made. And hauing ſent for worckemen for this purpoſe, he dyd
D ſacrifice firſt vnto the goddeſſe, beſeching her to accept well of the ROMAINES good will, & that ſhe would willingly vowcheſafe to come and dwell with the other goddes, who had the protection of the cittie of ROME. Some ſaye, that the image aunſwered, ſhe was contenred. But Liuius writeth that Camillus made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the aſſiſtants aunſwered ſhe was contented, and would goe with a goodwill. Yet they which doe affirme, it was the image ſelfe that ſpake, doe fauour this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of ROME: the which, from ſo baſe and meane beginning had impoſſibly attained vnto ſo highe glorie and power as it had, without the ſingular fauour of the goddes, and that hath manifeſtly appeared vnto the world, by ſundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth alſo ſuch other like wonders. As, that images haue heretofore let fall E droppes of ſwet from them: that they haue bene heard to ſighe: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certen ſignes with their eyes, as we finde written in many auncient ſtories. And we could our ſelues alſo tell ſuch like wonders, which we haue heard men of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for ſuch matters, it is as daungerous to geue to much credit to them, as alſo to diſcredit them to much, by reaſon of the weaknes of mans nature, which hath no certen boundes, nor can rule it ſelf, but ronneth ſomtimes after vanitie and ſuperſtition, and otherwhile alſo diſpiſeth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, & not to goe to farre in this, as in all other things beſides, it is the beſt. Nowe Camillus, whether his late enterpriſe performed, in winning a cittie that ſtoode out with ROME, & helde ſiege with them tenne yeres to-F gether, had put him into an ouerweninge or conceipt of him ſelfe: or that the wordes of the people, which dyd bleſſe and prayſe him, had made him looke highe, and preſume vpon him ſelfe, more then became the modeſtie of a ciuill magiſtrate, and gouernour of the common

weale,& one that was ſubiect to the lawe:he ſhewed a ſtately triumphe,ſet forth with all riche furniture,& ſpecially for that him ſelf was caried through Rome vpon his triumphant charret drawen with foure fayer white courſers. This, neuer captaine nor generall before him durſt vndertake to doe, neither any euer after him attẽpted it: for they thinke it is a ſacred cariage, and only mete for the King,and father of the goddes.This bred him much enuy amongeſt the cittizẽs,which had not bene acquainted with ſo great ſtatelynes. There was another occaſion alſo that made them miſlike him much:which was,bicauſe he ſtood againſt the lawe put forth that they ſhould deuide the cittie of Rome. For the Tribunes of the people dyd ſet out an Edict,that the Senate & people of Rome ſhould be deuided into two partes: and that thoſe on whom the lotte ſhould fall, ſhould abide ſtill in Rome, and the other ſhould goe dwell in the newe wonne cittie of Veies. Theſe were the reaſons to perſuade this: that both the one and the other ſorte ſhould be richer then they were before,& ſhould more eaſely keepe their lands and goodes from the inuaſion of their enemies,by meanes of theſe two great citties.The people which were multiplied nowe into great numbers, & had ſerued duetifully & dauẽgerouſly, thought it the beſt waye in the worlde:Therefore they ſtill cried out,and thronged with great tumulte,about their pulpit for orations, praying that this lawe might be put vnto the voyces of the people.But the whole Senate,and wiſeſt cittizens among them,iudging this motion of the Tribunes would be the deſtruction,and not the diuiſion of the cittie of Rome: could in no wiſe abide it ſhould goe any further.Whereupon they went & prayed Camillus helpe:who fearing to bring it to the pointe,whether the lawe ſhould paſſe or no,dyd allwayes ſeeke new occaſions and letts,ſtill to delaye & put of the matter,& ſtaye the confirmation of this lawe. For theſe cauſes, he was hated of the common people But the originall & apparant cauſe of the peoples ill will towards him,was for taking from them the tenth parte of their ſpoyles: and it was not altogether without ſome reaſon, and to ſaye truely the people dyd him much wrong to beare him ſuch malice for that.For before he went to the cittie of Veies, he made a ſolẽne vowe to offer the tenth parte vnto the goddes,of the ſpoyles of the cittie,if he wãne the ſame. But when it was taken and ſacked,whether it was that he was lothe to trouble the cittizens, or hauing a worlde of buſines in his head, that he eaſely forgate his vowe: he ſuffered the ſouldiers to deuide the ſpoyle amongeſt them,& to take the benefit to them ſelues. Shortely after he was diſcharged of his charge, he dyd enforme the Senate of his vowe. Furthermore, the ſootheſayers made reporte at that very time,howe they knew by certaine ſignes and tokens of their ſacrifices,that the goddes were offended for ſomwhat, and howe they muſt of neceſſitie be pacified againe.Whereupon the Senate preſently made an order,where it was vnpoſſible euery man ſhould bring in againe the ſelfe ſame things he had gotten, to make a newe diuiſion of euery mans ſhare: that euery one therefore vpon his othe ſhould preſent the tenthe parte of his gaynes he had gotten by that bootie.There was great trouble about it.They were driuen to vſe great extremitie to the poore ſouldiers(which had traueled ſore,and taken great paynes in the warres) to make them to reſtore backe ſuch a coloppe out of their gaine, and the rather bicauſe many of them had already ſpent it euery penney: and for this trouble,they all cried out with open mouth againſt Camillus. But he being ſet vp,and not knowing otherwiſe howe to excuſe him ſelfe, was forced to bring forth as cold and as vnreaſonable an excuſe as he could make, which was: forſoothe he had forgotten his vowe he had made. The people notwithſtanding were eger ſtill againſt him,ſaying: howe he had vowed then to offer the tenth parte of the enemies goodes to the goddes, and that nowe he would performe it with the tenthes of the cittizens goodes. Neuertheles, euery man hauing brought that he ſhould for his parte: it was thought good they ſhould cauſe a maſſie cuppe of golde to be made, to ſend to the temple of Apollo at Delphes. And ſmall ſtore of golde being in the cittie of Rome, as the officers of the cittie were ſerching vp and downe to get it: the women of Rome of their owne voluntary willes without motion, agreed among them ſelues, that they would departe with all the iuells they had, towardes the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof,to honour them withall: the Senate ordeined that they ſhould be prayſed openly with funerall orations at their buriall,as they dyd vſe at honorable and noble mens obſequies. For before that lawe, it was not the

A the manner to prayſe women openly at their funeralles. Nowe there were appointed three of the nobleſt men of the cittie to goe to carie this offering, & they ſent them out in a galley well manned, ſtored alſo with good mariners, & trimly ſet forth in all triumphing manner: howbeit both in ſtorme, & calme weather, they were in daunger of their liues. For after that they had ſcaped drowning very narrowly by tempeſt, when the winde was downe againe, they fell into another daunger, which they eſcaped alſo beyond all hope. For harde by the Iles of ÆOLVS, the gallyes of the LIPARIANS fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the LIPARIANS ſawe they made no reſiſtance, & intreated them, holding vp their hands: they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only faſtened their gallye vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the ſhore, they declared they were pirates, & offered to make porte ſale of the men &
B goodes, as if they had bene a lawfull priſe: & had ſolde them in deede, had not the wiſedome & authoritie of Timeſitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the cittie, and had great a doe to perſuade them to let them goe. And he dyd not ſo leaue them, but ſent out certaine of his owne ſhippes to accompanie them in their iorney, who dyd helpe them to goe and performe their offering. For which curteſie of his, the ROMAINES afterwardes dyd him great honour at ROME, according to his well deſeruing. The Tribunes of the people beganne nowe to ſet a foote againe the lawe for the deuiding of the inhabitans of ROME vnto the cittie of VEIES. But the warres of the FALISCES fell out happely at that time, wherby the noble men dyd chooſe ſuch officers as they would. So they choſe Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the ſouldiers, and fiue other to aſſiſte him, the ſeruice in that caſe requiring a generall, C that caried both authoritie & reputation among them, as an olde experienced ſouldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMAINES armie, where he layed ſiege vnto the cittie of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, vitteled and ſtored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no ſmall attempt to winne this cittie, and that it would not be done in a ſhorte time: he pollitikely ſought (whatſoeuer came of it) to keepe his coũtrimẽ occupied about ſome thing, & to ſtaye them for going home, leaſt by repayring to ROME, they ſhould haue many occaſions to rebell, & raiſe ſome ciuill diſſention. For the ROMAINES dyd wiſely vſe this remedie: to diſperſe abroade like good phiſicians, the humours which troubled the quiet ſtate of their cõmon weale at home. But the FALERIANS truſting in the ſituation of D their cittie, which was very ſtrong in all partes, made ſo litle accompt of the ſiege: that thoſe which kept not watche vpon the walles, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the cittie, without any weapon about them, and their children went to ſchoole, the ſchoolemaſter alſo would commonly leade them abroade out of the cittie a walking, to playe and paſſe the time by the towne walles. For the whole cittie had one common ſchoolemaſter, as the GRECIANS alſo haue, which doe bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, bicauſe one maye be familiarly acquainted with an other. This ſchoolemaſter ſpying his time to doe the FALERIANS a ſhrewd turne, dyd accuſtomably take all his ſcholers out of the cittie with him, to playe, not farre from the walles at the beginning, & afterwards brought them into the cittie againe, after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroade thus once E or twiſe, he trayned them out euery daye a litle further, to make them to be bolde, perſuading them there was no daunger. But at the length, one daye hauing gotten all the cittizẽs children with him, he led them within the watche of the ROMAINES campe, & there deliuered all his ſcholers into their handes, & prayed them they would bring him vnto their generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he begãne to tell him that he was ſchoolemaſter vnto all theſe children, neuertheles that he dyd more eſteeme to haue his grace and fauour, then regarde his office he had by this name & title. Camillus hearing what he ſayed, & beholding his threacherous parte, he ſayed to thoſe that were about him. Warre of it ſelfe ſurely is an euill thing, for in warres many iniuries & miſchieues are done: neuertheles amõg good men there is a law & diſcipline, which doth forbid thẽ to ſeeke victorie by wicked & traiterous meanes, &
F that a noble & worthie generall ſhould make warre, & procure victorie, by truſting to his own valliantnes, & not by anothers vilenes & villanie. Therefore he commaunded his ſergeants to teare the clothes of the backe of this vile ſchoolemaſter, & to binde his hands behinde him: & that they ſhould geue the children roddes & whippes in their handes, to whippe the traitour backe againe into the cittie, that had thus betrayed them, & grieued their parents. Now when the FALERIANS heard newes that the ſchoolemaſter had thus betrayed them, all the cittie fell a weeping (as euery man maye thinke for ſo great a loſſe) and men & women ranne together one in anothers necke, to the town walles, & gates of the cittie, like people out of their wittes; they were ſo troubled. When they came thither, they ſaw their childrē bringing their ſchoolemaſter backe againe, ſtarcke naked and bownde, whipping of him, & calling Camillus their father, their god, and their ſauiour: ſo that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the cittizens alſo in generall, dyd conceyue in them ſelues a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wiſedome, goodnes, and iuſtice of Camillus. So that euen preſently they called a counſaill, and there it was concluded they ſhould ſend ambaſſadours forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goodes to his mercy and fauour. Camillus ſent their ambaſſadours vnto ROME, where audience being geuen vnto them by the Senate, the ambaſſadours ſayed, Bicauſe the ROMAINES preferred iuſtice aboue victorie, they taught them to be better contented to ſubmit them ſelues vnto them, then to be their own men at libertie: confeſſing their vertue dyd more ouercome them, then any force or power could doe. The Senate diſpatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commiſſion to doe and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certen ſumme of money of the FALERIANS, dyd furthermore make peace and league with all the reſt of the FALISCES: and thereupon returned backe againe to ROME. But the ſouldiers grudged maruelouſly at it. For they ſtoode in hope to haue had the ſacking of the cittie. When there was no remedie, but they muſt needes returne home emptie handed, they beganne to accuſe Camillus to the reſt of the cittizens, as ſone as they came to ROME, ſaying: he loued not the common people, and howe for ſpite he diſapointed their army of the ſpoyle. On the other ſide, the Tribunes of the people beganne to reuiue the lawe, for the deuiding of the inhabitants of ROME, and were ready to paſſe it by the voyces of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, dyd boldely ſpeake, and doe in open preſence, all he could againſt it. So that plainely he was the chiefeſt cauſe, that the people againſt their willes (intreate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were ſo ſpitefull againſt him, that notwithſtanding his ſorowe and misfortune for the death of his ſonne (dying of a ſickenes) was great: they would not of malice once take pittie or compaſſion of him. The loſſe whereof (albeit he was of a very good & curteous nature) was ſo grieuous, and made him ſo vnquiet: that being accuſed before the people, he ſturred not once out of his houſe, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his ſonne departed. He that dyd accuſe him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burdening him that he had ſtolen and taken awaye, parte of the ſpoyle of the THVSCANS: and ſayed, they had ſeene certen braſen gates at his houſe, which had bene brought out of THVSCAN. Nowe the people were ſo maliciouſly bent againſt him, that euery man might ſee, if they could once take him in a trippe, vpon any aduantage whatſoeuer, they would douteles haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friendes and ſouldiers that had ſerued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earneſtly beſought them, that they would not ſuffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through falſe and vniuſt accuſations layed againſt him, nor to be ſo ſcorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends hauing layed their heades together, and conſulted thereupon, made him aunſwer: howe for his iudgment they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very goodwill, to helpe to paye his fine. But he being of minde not to beare ſuch an open ſhame and ignominie, determined in choller to leaue the cittie, and to exile him ſelfe from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife & children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his houſe to the gates of the cittie, & ſayed neuer a word. When he came thither, he ſtayed ſodainely, & returning backe againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the godds: that if it were of very ſpight and malice, and not of iuſt deſeruing, that the common people compelled him thus ſhamefully to forſake the cittie, that the ROMAINES might quickely repente them, and in the face of the worlde might wiſhe for him, and haue nede of him. After he had made theſe prayers againſt the cittizens (as Achilles dyd againſt the GRECIANS) he went his way, & was condemned

A condemned for his contempte, in the ſumme of fifteene thouſand Aſſes of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greekiſhe money, a thouſand fiue hundred Drachmas of ſiluer: for an As was a litle pece of money, wherof tenne of them made a ROMAINE penney. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderſtãding, but beleeued certenly that ſome great puniſhment would followe them incontinently, and that the wrong & iniurie they had done him would be quickely requited, with ſome moſt ſharpe and terrible reuenge, not only vnpleaſaunt to thinke vpon, but further moſt notable to be ſpoken of through the world. There fell out ſo ſodainely vpon it, ſuch miſchief toward the cittie of ROME, and the preſent time alſo brought forth ſuch occaſion of daunger and deſtruction thereof, to their ſhame & infamie: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chaunce, or els it was the handie worcke of ſome god, that would not

B ſuffer vertue recompẽced with ingratitude, to paſſe vnreuenged. Their firſt token that threatned ſome great miſchief to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Cenſors: for the ROMAINES doe greately reuerẽce the office of a Cenſor, and eſteeme it as a ſacred place. The ſeconde token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was: that one Marcus Cæditius, a man but of meane qualitie, and none of the Senatours (but otherwiſe a fayre conditioned honeſt man, and of good conſcience) tolde the Tribuni militares of a thing that was to be well conſidered of. For he ſayed that the night before, as he was going on his waye in the newe ſtreete, he heard one call him alowde: and returning backe to ſee what it was, he ſawe no liuing creature, but only heard a voyce bigger then a mans, which ſayed vnto him. Marcus Cæditius, goe thy waye to morrowe morning to the Tribuni militares, and byd them looke

C quickely for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were mery at the matter, and made but a ieaſt at his warning, and ſtraight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Nowe as touching the GAVLES. They came (as they ſaye) of the CELTÆ, whoſe country not being able to maintein the multitudes of them, they were driuen to goe ſeeke other countryes to inhabite in: and there were amongeſt them many thouſands of young men of ſeruice and good ſouldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of theſe people, ſome of them went towards the north ſea, paſſing the mountaines RIPHEI, and dyd dwell in the extreme partes of EVROPE. Other of them remained betwene the mountaines PIRENEI, and the greateſt mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the ende to taſte of the wine, which was firſt

D brought out of ITALIE vnto them. Which drinke they found ſo good, and were ſo delited with it, that ſodainely they armed themſelues: and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe ſeeke out the country that brought forth ſuch fruite, iudging all other countries in reſpect of that, to be but wilde and barren. It is ſayed, that the firſt man which brought wine vnto them, and that dyd procure them to paſſe into ITALIE, was a noble man of THVSCAN called Arron, and otherwiſe of no ill diſpoſed nature: howbeit he was ſubiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor vnto an orphan childe, the richeſt that was at that time in all the countrie of THVSCAN, and of complexion was wonderfull fayer: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons houſe of a childe, and though he was growen to mans ſtate, yet he would not goe from him, fayning he was ſo well,

E and to his liking. But in deede the cauſe was, that he loued his maiſtres (Arrons wife) whom ſecretly he had enioyed a long time, and ſhe him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the ende, loue hauing ſo poſſeſſed them both, that neither parte could withdrawe from other, much leſſe culler that they had long enioyed: the young man ſtole her away from him, and kept her ſtill by force. Arron put him in ſute, but he preuayled not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money, giftes, and charges. But he tooke it ſo greuouſly, that he left his country: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALIE. So they conquered at their firſt coming all that country which the THVSCANS helde in olde time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and ſtretched out in length from one ſea vnto the other which enuironneth ITALIE, as the names them is well planted with trees,& hath goodly pleasaunt pastures for beastes and cattell to feede in, & is notably watered with goodly ronning riuers. There was also at that time eighteene fayer great cities in that country,all of them very strong and well seated, aswell for to enriche the inhabitants thereof by traffike,as to make them to liue delicately for pleasure. All these cities the Gavles had wonne, and had expulsed the Thvscans, but this was done long time before. Now the Gavles being further entred into Thvscan,dyd besiege the cittie of Clvsivm. Thereupon the Clvsians seeking ayde of the Romaines, besought them they would send letters and ambassadours vnto these barbarous people in their fauour. They sent vnto them three of the best and most honorable persones of the cittie, all three of the house of the Fabians. The Gavles receyued them very curteously, bicause of the name of Rome and leauing to assaulte the cittie,they gaue them audience. The Romaine ambassadours dyd aske them,what iniurie the Clvsians had done vnto them, that they came to make warres with them. Brennus king of the Gavles, hearing this question, smiled, and aunswered them thus. The Clvsians doe vs wrong in this: they being but fewe people together, & not able to occupie much lande,doe notwithstanding possesse much,and will let vs haue no parte with them,that are straungers,and out of our country, and stande in neede of seate and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you Romaines in old time,by those of Alba,by the Fidenates, and the Ardeates: and not long sithence,by the Veians,& the Capenates: and partly by the Falisces and the Volsces: against whom ye haue taken, & doe take armes, at all times. And as ofte as they will let ye haue no parte of their goods, ye imprison their persones,robbe and spoyle their goodes,and distroye their cities. And in doing this,ye doe them no wrong at all,but followe the oldest lawe that is in the worlde, which euer leaueth vnto the stronger,that which the weaker can not keepe and enioye. Beginning with the goddes, & ending with beastes: the which haue this propertie in nature,that the bigger and stronger haue euer the vauntage of the weaker and lesser. Therefore,leaue your pittie to see the Clvsians besieged, least you teache vs Gavles to take compassion also of those you haue oppressed. By this aunswer the Romaines knewe very wel,there was no waye to make peace with king Brennus. Wherefore they entred into the cittie of Clvsivm, and incoraged the inhabitants to salye out with them vpon these barbarous people: either bicause they had a desire to proue the valliantnes of the Gavles, or els to shewe their owne corage and manhoode. So the cittizens went out, and skirmished with them harde by the walles: in the which one of the Fabians,called Quintus Fabius Ambustus, being excellently well horsed, and putting spurres to him, dyd set vpon a goodly bigge personage of the Gavles, that had aduaunced him selfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. He was not knowen at the first encounter, as well for the sodaine meeting and skirmishing together, as for that his glistering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had slaine the Gavle, and came to strippe him: Brennus then knewe him, and protested against him, calling the goddes to witnesse, howe he had broken the lawe of armes, that coming as an ambassadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemie. Hereupon Brennus forthwith left skirmishing,and raising the seige from Clvsivm, marched with his army vnto Rome gates. And to the ende the Romaines might knowe, that the Gavles were not well pleased for the iniurie they had receyued: to haue an honest culler to beginne warres with the Romaines, he sent an Herauld before to Rome, to demaunde liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him accordingly. In the meane time,he him selfe came marching after, by small iourneys to receyue their aunswer. The Senate hereupon assembled,& many of the Senatours blamed the rashnes of the Fabians: but most of all,the priestes called Fæciales. For they followed it very earnestly, as a matter that concerned religion,& the honour of the godds: declaring how the Senate,in discharge of all the residue of the cittie of the offence cõmitted,should laye the whole waight and burden of it vpon him alone,that only had done the facte. Numa Pompilius,the iustest and most peaceable of all the kings of Rome that had bene, was he that first erected the colledge of these Fæciales,and dyd ordeine that they should be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to heare and allowe all the causes,for the which they should iustely beginne any warres. Neuertheles,the Senate in the ende turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and iudgment

A iudgment of the people, before whom these priestes Feciales dyd also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made so litle accõpt of their propounded religion, & honour of the godds in that case: that in stede of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they dyd choose him for one of the Tribunes of the souldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderstanding this, were so furious & angrie thereat, that they would no lenger linger their iourneis, but marched with all spede vnto ROME. The people that dwelt by the high wayes where they should passe by, were maruelously affrayed to see the multitude of them, & their braue & vniuersall furniture: & beginning to doubt the furie of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroye all the chãpion country before them, & afterwardes would take all the strong cities. They cõtrariwise dyd take nothing at all out of the fieldes, neither dyd any hurte or displeasure vnto any

B bodie: but passing by their cities, cried out they went to ROME, and would haue no warres but with the ROMAINES, and howe otherwise they desired to be friendes with all the worlde. These barbarous people marching on in this wise towards ROME, the Tribunes of the souldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them. They were no lesse in number then the GAVLES, for they were fourty thousand footemen. Howbeit most part of them were rawe souldiers, that had neuer serued in the warres before. They were very careles of the goddes, & dissolute in matters of religion: for they passed neither for good signes in their sacrifices, neither to aske coũsaill of their soothesayers, which the ROMAINES were religiously wont to doe, before they gaue any battaill. To make the matter worse: the number of the captaines hauing power and authoritie alike, dyd asmuche (or more then the rest) disorder and confounde their

C doings. For ofte times before, in farre lesser matters and daungers then these, they dyd vse to chuse speciall officers that had sole & soueraine authoritie, which they called Dictators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in daungerous times to haue but one head & generall, to cõmaũnd all, & to haue supreme authoritie of iustice in his hands, & not to be bound to deliuer accõpt of his doings to any. The iniury also which they had to vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great mischief & incõueniẽce then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durst no more commaunde the people roughly, but euer after dyd flatter them much. When their army was nowe brought into the field, they encamped them selues by a litle riuer called Allia, about the eleuẽth stone from ROME, and not farre from the place where the same riuer falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell,

D by their disorder & lacke of gouernment. For the left pointe or winge of their battell was broken of at the first by the GAVLES, who charged them so furiously, that they draue them hedlõg into the riuer. The right wing then retiring out of the plain, before they had any charge geuẽ, & hauing gotten certen hilles hard by them: they had litle hurte, & most of them sauing them selues, did recouer ROME again. The rest that escaped after the enemies were weary of killing, fled by night vnto the cittie of VEIES, thinking ROME had bene lost, & all the cittie put to the sword. This ouerthrowe was on the lõgest daye in sommer, the moone being at the full: & the daye before fortuned the great slaughter of the Fabians, of the which were slaine by the THVSCANS in one daye 300. all of a name. The very daye it self was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle riuer, by the which the 2. ouerthrow was geuen. But for the differẽce of dayes,

E that some of thẽ are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the philosopher had reason to reproue the poet Hesiodus, for makĩg some days good, & some dayes ill, as though he vnderstood they were not all of one nature: we haue writtẽ & declared our opinion therof in other places. Yet, bicause the matter deliuereth present occasiõ to speake of the same, peraduẽture it wil not be amisse to alleage a few exãples of it only. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to wine two honorable victories, on the first daye of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombæon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did still restore the GRECIANS to their libertie. The first was the battell of LEVCTRES. The secõd was the battell of GERASTE, which was two hũdred yeres before, when they ouercame LATTAMIAS, & the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battail

F by the GRECIANS, the sixt daye of August, at the iorney of MARATHON. The third day, at the battell of PLATEES. And on the selfe same daye, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fiue and twenty daye, at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wanne the battell by sea, neere vnto

Ile of NAXOS, vnder the charge and gouernment of Chabrias, about the full of the moone, in the moneth of August. And on the twenty of the same moneth, they wanne the battell of SALAMINA: as we haue written more amplie in our historie of difference of dayes. The moneth of Aprill also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great, ouercame the generall of the king of PERSIA, at the fielde of GRANICA, in the sayed moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in SICILE by Timoleon, on the seuen & twenty daye thereof. On which daye also it is thought the cittie of TROYE was taken: as Ephorus, Callisthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their histories. Nowe contrariwise. The moneth of Iulye, which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not bene gratious to the GRECIANS. For on the seuen daye of the same, they were ouerthrowen by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter destruction. They had before also lost a battell the same moneth, neere vnto the cittie of CHAERONEA, by king Phillippe. On the same daye also, and in the very self moneth and yere, those which came into ITALIE with king Archidamus, were slaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the coūtry. The CARTHAGINIANS also feare the seuen & twenty daye of the same moneth, as the daye which had before time brought them into many great and sorowfull calamities. Contrarilie also, I knowe very well, how about the feast of mysteries, the cittie of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, & that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receyue a garrison of souldiers into their cittie, about the twenty daye of August, at which time they made the holie procession of the mysteries of Iacchus. And on the self day the ROMAINES lost their armie, & their generall Cæpio, who was slaine by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, & the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey also, dyed both on the selfe same daye they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, vnto whom after like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chaunces of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our historie. The daye of this ouerthrowe, is one of those which the ROMAINES take for one of the vnfortunateſt dayes that euer came vnto them. And by reason of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare & superstition, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) vpon such sinister misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue written it more largely & exquisitly in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & customes of the ROMAINES. Now after this battell lost, if the GAVLES had hottely pursued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could haue saued ROME from being taken, & the inhabitāts therof from being put vnto the sword. For the ROMAINES that fled from the battell, brought such a feare vpon those that receyued them, and filled the whole cittie of ROME with such greif & trēbling: that they wist not what to doe. The barbarous people againe, beleeuing litle their victorie was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a ioye receiued, & deuided among them the spoyle of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leysure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to seeke them some place of safety: & to such as remained still, they left good hope to saue them selues, & to make someprouision for defence. Thereupon they all fortified them selues within moūt Capitoll, & storing it with all kind of vitaill, armor, & munition, they wholy dyd forsake the rest of the cittie. But the first worke they tooke in hande was this. They dyd bring into their sayed forte, parte of their sacred relickes: & the professed Vestalls brought thither also their holy fire & all other their holy monumēts. Some writers saye, that they had nothing els in keeping, but the sempiternall fyer, & were so consecrated by king Numa, who dyd first institute, that the fyer should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most motiue & quickest substance that is of all naturall things: notwithstanding, that generation also is a mouing, or at the least not done without motion. For we see, that all other substance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, & without action, & sturreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fyre: as the soule it selfe recouering heate, beginneth somewhat to moue, and disposeth it selfe to doe, and suffer some thing. Wherefore Numa being (as they saye) a man of great learning and vnderstanding, who for his wisedome was reported to talke many times with the Muses, dyd consecrate the same as a most sacred thing, and commaunded that they neuer should suffer that fyre to goe out, and but keepe it, as they would preserue the

The holy fier.

The force of fyer.

A the liuely image of the eternall God, the only King & maker of the worlde. Other saye, that the fyer burned continually there before the holy & sacred things, signifying a kinde and manner of purification, which opinion the GRECIANS holde also: howbeit behinde the same fyer, there were certen hidden things, which in no case any might see, but those holy Vestall Nunes. Many also holde an opinion, that the Palladium of TROYE (as much to say, as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Æneas into ITALIE. Other doe reporte also, that Dardanus, at that time when he first beganne to buylde the cittie of TROYE, brought thither the holy images of the goddes of SAMOTHRACIA, and he dyd offer them vp there: and howe Æneas after the cittie was taken, dyd steale them awaye, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALIE. Some other also, that take vpon them to knowe more therein then the B common sorte, doe holde opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is emptie and standeth open, the other is full & fast locked vp, howbeit they are not to be seene but by these holy Nunnes. Other thincke also, that these imaginers inuented that they spake of their owne heads, bicause the Vestall Nunnes dyd cast all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the grounde, within the temple of Quirinus: and herefore that very place carieth the surname at this daye of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the most precious things they had, & fled alongest the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, & hauing brought away his wife & litle children, and other household stuffe he had in a carte, by chaunce he lighted vpon the Vestall Nunnes in the waye. But so sone as he perceyued these holy Nunnes (carying the blessed relickes and iuells in C their armes, dedicated vnto the seruice of the goddes) all alone, & that they were wearie with going a foote: he caused his wife and his children to come out of the carte, & tooke downe all his goodes also, & willed them to get them vp, and flye into some cittie or towne of GRECE. Thus, me thought I could not well passe ouer with silence, Albinus reuerence & deuotion he shewed vnto the goddes, in so daungerous a time & pinche of extremitie. Furthermore the priests of other goddes, & the most honorablest olde men of the cittie of ROME (that had bene Cõsuls before time, or had past the honour of triumphe) had not the harte to forsake ROME: but putting on all their most holy robes & vestments dyd vowe, and as it were willingly sacrificed them selues vnto the fortune that should befall them, for the safety of their countrie. And vsing certain words & prayers which their high bishoppe Fabius had taught them, they went Fabius chief bishoppe of Rome.
D euen thus apparelled into the great market place, & dyd sit them downe there, in chayers of iuory, expecting the good will & pleasure of the godds what should become of them. But within three dayes after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the cittie Rome taken of the Gaules. all open, & the walles without watche, he dowted some deuise in it, & feared some priuie ambush had bene layed, as one hardly beleeuing to haue found the ROMAINES of so base a mind, as to forsake their cittie. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, & tooke the same, litle more thẽ three hũdred & three score yeres after it was first builded: if it be true at the least there hath remained any certen chronicles of those times vnto this present daye, considering the trouble & confusion of that time hath made many things more vncerteine then that, dowtefull vnto vs. But so it was, that the rumor ranne to GREECE incon-
E tinently howe ROME was taken, but yet withall somwhat doubtefully & vncertainely. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) sayeth in a certen booke he wrote of the soule, that there was newes come from the West parte, that an armie which came from the HYPERBORIANS, had taken a cittie of GRECE called ROME, situated in that country neere the great sea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written so many other fables & lyes) dyd amplifie the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding to of his owne deuise, of the HYPERBORIANS, & by the great sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the philosopher had certain know- Aristotles testimonie of the taking of Rome.
ledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he sayeth also it was recouered againe afterwards by one called Lucius: where in deede it was, by Marcus Camillus, & not by Lucius. But all this in F manner is spoken by cõiecture. Moreouer, Brennus being entred ROME, dyd appointe parte of The maieflie of the olde Senatours set in the market place of Rome. his souldiers to besiege those which were gotten into moũt Capitoll. And he with the residue of his armie, marched on towards the market place: where when he saw the aunciẽt Senatours set so grauely in their chayers, & spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw their enemies come armed towards them, neither chaunged coũtenance, nor culler at all, but leaned ſoftely on their ſtaues they had in their hands, ſeeming to be nothing affrayed nor abaſhed, but looked one vpon another, he marueloufly wondred at it. This their ſo ſtraunge manner at the firſt dyd ſo dampe the GAVLES, that for a ſpace they ſtoode ſtill, and were in doubte to come neere to touche them, fearing leaſt they had bene ſome goddes: vntill ſuche time, as one of them went boldely vnto Marcus Papyrius, & layed his hand fayer & ſoftely vpon his lõg bearde. But Papyrius gaue him ſuch a rappe on his pate with his ſtaffe, that he made the bloud ronne about his eares. This barbarous beaſte was in ſuch a rage with the blowe, that he drue out his ſworde, and ſlewe him. The other ſouldiers alſo killed all the reſt afterwardes: and ſo the GAVLES continued many dayes ſpoyling and ſacking all thinges they founde in the houſes, and in the ende dyd ſet them all a fyer, and deſtroyed them euery one, for deſpite of thoſe that kept the forte of the Capitoll, that would not yeld vpon their ſummons, but valliantly repulſed them when they ſcaled the walles. For this cauſe they raſed the whole cittie, and put all to the ſworde that came in their handes, young and olde, man, woman, and childe.

Nowe this ſiege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very ſtowtely, vittells beganne to growe ſcante in the campe of the GAVLES, in ſo much as they were driuen of force to ſeeke it abroade without the cittie. Hereupon they deuided them ſelues, whereof ſome remained ſtill with the King at the ſiege of the Capitoll: and the reſt went a forraging, and ſpoyling all the champion countrie and villages thereaboutes, ſcattered as it were by bandes & companies, ſome here, ſome there, fearing nothing, nor paſſing vpon watch or warde, they liued in ſuche ſecuritie of their victorie. Howbeit the greateſt company amongeſt them, went by fortune towardes the cittie of ARDEA, where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, medling with no matters of ſtate from the time of his exile, vntill that preſent time. But then he beganne not to bethinke him ſelf as a man that was in ſafety, and might haue eſcaped the handes of his enemies, but rather ſought to deuiſe and finde out all the meanes he could to ſubdewe them if occaſion were ſo offered. Whereupon, conſidering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to ſet vpon them, although faynte harted, and cowardly, by reaſon of the ſlouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the warres: he beganne to caſt out theſe words among the young men. That they ſhould not thinke the ROMAINES misfortune fell vpon them, through the valliantnes of the GAVLES, nor that their calamitie (who had refuſed good counſaill) had happened vnto them by any worke or acte of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their parte to make them carie awaye the victorie: but that they ſhould thinke, it was no other thing, but fortune alone, that would needes ſhewe her power. Therefore, that it were nowe a notable and honorable enterpriſe (although ſomewhat daungerous) to driue theſe ſtraungers and barbarous people out of their countrie: conſidering that the only ende of their victorie was, but to deſtroye and conſume as fire, all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but only take a good luſty harte and corage vnto them, he would with opportunitie, and place, aſſure them the victorie, without any daunger. The young men were pleaſed with theſe words of life & comforte. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter alſo vnto the magiſtrates & counſellours: and hauing drawen them by perſuaſion vnto this enterpriſe, he armed all that were of age to carie armor, & would not ſuffer a man to goe out of the cittie, for feare leaſt the enemies (which were not farre of) ſhould haue intelligẽce of the ſame. Now after the GAVLES had rõne ouer all the chãpion countrie, & were loden with all ſorts of ſpoyles, they did encãpe them ſelues negligẽtly in open fields, & neuer charged watch nor warde: but hauing their full cariage of wine layed them down to ſlepe, & made no noyſe at all in their cãpe. Camillus being aduertiſed therof by his ſeuerall skowtes, cauſed the ARDEANS with as litle noyſe as might be, forthwith to goe out into the fields: & hauing marched ſomwhat roũdly the diſtance betwene the cittie, & the cãpe of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his ſoldiers make great ſhowtes & cries, & the trũpets to be ſoũded on euery ſide, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the lowde noyſe they made, could hardly be made to wake, they were ſo deadly drõke. Yet there were ſome notwithſtãding, that for feare to be takẽ tardy, dyd buſtle vp at this ſodaine noyſe: & coming to them ſelues, fell to their weapons to reſiſt Camillus

The citie of Ardea.

Camillus wordes vnto the Ardeans in excuſe of the Romaines.

Camillus perſuadeth the Ardeans to take armes againſt the Gaules.

A millus, which were ſlayne by and by. The reſt, & the greateſt number of them, laye here & there ſcattered in the middeſt of the field, without any weapon, dead a ſleepe, ſtarcke droncke with wine, & were put to the ſworde, & neuer ſtrake ſtroke. Thoſe that fled out of the campe that night (which were but fewe in number) were ouerthrowen alſo the next daye, by the horſe men which followed & killed them, as they tooke them ſtraggling here & there in the fieldes. The brute of this victorie was blowen abroade incontinently through all the townes and villages thereabouts, which cauſed many young men to come & ioyne them ſelues to Camillus: but ſpecially the ROMAINES deſired the ſame, that had ſaued thē ſelues in the cittie of VEIES, after the battell loſt at ALLIA, who made their mones amongeſt them ſelues there, ſaying. O goddes, what a captaine hath fortune taken from the cittie of ROME? What honour hath the B cittie of ARDEA by the valliantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus: and in the meane ſeaſon, his naturall cittie that brought him forth, is now loſt, & vtterly deſtroyed? We, for lacke of a captaine to leade vs, are ſhut vp here within others walles, & doe nothing but ſuffer ITALIE in the meane ſpace to goe to ruine, & vtter deſtruction before our eyes. Why then doe we not ſend to the ARDEANS for our captaine? or why doe we not arme our ſelues, to goe vnto him? For he is nowe no more a baniſhed man, nor we poore cittizens: ſince our cittie is poſſeſſed with the forein power, of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counſaill, & ſent vnto Camillus to beſeche him to be their captaine, and leade them. But he made aunſwer, he would in no caſe conſent vnto it, vnles they that were beſieged in the Capitoll had lawfully firſt confirmed it by their voyces. For thoſe (ſayed he) ſo long as they remaine within the cittie, doe re- C preſent the ſtate & bodie thereof. Therefore if they cōmaunded him to take this charge vpon him, he would moſt willingly obey them: if otherwiſe they miſliked of it, that thē he would not medle againſt their good willes & cōmaundement. They hauing receaued this aunſwer, there was not a ROMAINE amongeſt them, but greatly honored & extolled the wiſedome & iuſtice of Camillus. But nowe they knewe not how to make them priuie to it, that were beſieged in the Capitoll: for they ſawe no poſſibilitie to conuey a meſſenger to them: conſidering the enemies were lordes of the cittie, & layed ſeige to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius amōgeſt the young men (a man of a meane houſe, but yet deſirous of honour & glory) that offered him ſelf very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no letters to cary to them which were beſieged, for feare leaſt they might be intercepted, & ſo they ſhould diſcouer Camillus in- D tētion: but putting on an ill fauoured gowne vpon him, he cōueyed certen peces of corcke vnder it, & traueling at none dayes kept on his waye without feare, vntill he came to ROME, bringing darke night with him. And bicauſe he could not paſſe ouer the bridge, for that the Barbarous people kept watche vpō it: he wrapped ſuch clothes as he had, about his necke (which were not many, nor heauy) & tooke the riuer, & ſwimming with theſe corcks he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other ſide where the cittie ſtoode. Then taking vp thoſe lanes allwayes where he thought the enemies were not, ſeeing fire, & hearing noyſe in other places, he wēt to the gate Carmentale, where he found more ſilēce then in other places: on the which ſide alſo, the hill of the Capitoll was more ſtepe and vpright, by reaſon of the great rocks that were harde to clime vp vpon. But he digged & crept vp ſo long amongeſt them, that he got vp E with great payn vnto the wall of the fortreſſe, on the which ſide alſo the enemie kept no watch: & ſaluting the watche of the Capitoll, he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magiſtrates that ruled then. Who cauſed the Senate to aſſemble preſently, vnto whom he told the newes of Camillus victorie, which they had not heard of before: & therewith alſo he dyd declare vnto thē, the determination of the ROMAINE ſouldiers that were abroade, which was, to make Camillus their captaine & general, & did perſuade them alſo to graūt him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whō the cittizēs gaue their conſents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitoll, conſulted thereupon amōgeſt them ſelues, & ſo did chuſe Camillus Dictator, & returned the meſſenger Pōtius Cominius backe againe, the ſelf ſame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe, was F like vnto his coming thither: for the enemies neuer ſawe him. And ſo he brought reporte vnto thē that were abroad, of the Senates decree & conſent, whereof they all were maruelous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of generall vpon him, & found there were twēty thouſand good fighting men abroade,and well armed.Then got he further ayde alſo of their allies and confederates,and prepared daylie to goe and ſet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus choſen nowe Dictator the ſeconde time, and went vnto the cittie of VEIES, where he ſpake with the ROMAINE ſouldiers that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies beſides, to goe fight with the enemies as ſone as he could. But whileſt Camillus was thus a preparing, certen of the Barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chaunce on that ſide of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: ſpied in diuers places the printes of his feete and hands,as he had griped & gotten holde,ſtill digging to get vp,& ſawe the weedes and erbes alſo growing vpon the rocks,& the earth in like manner,flat troden down. Whereupon they went preſently vnto the King,to let him vnderſtãde the ſame: who forthwith came to vewe the place. And hauing conſidered it well,he dyd nothing at that time:but when darke night was come,he called a companie of the lighteſt GAVLES together, and that vſed moſt to digge in mountaines,& ſayed vnto them.Our enemies them ſelues doe ſhew vs the waye how to take them,which we could not haue founde out but by them ſelues. For they hauing gone vp before vs,doe geue vs eaſely to vnderſtãde,it is no impoſſible thing for vs to clime vp alſo. Wherefore,we were vtterly ſhamed,hauing already begõne well,if we ſhould fayle alſo to end well: & to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were eaſie for one man alone, by digging to clime vp to the height thereof: much leſſe is it harde for many to get vp one after another, ſo that one doe helpe another.Therefore Syrs,I aſſure you,thoſe that doe take paynes to get vp, ſhalbe honorably rewarded, according to their iuſt deſerte.When the King had ſpoken theſe wordes vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it luſtely euery man to get vp: & about midnight, they beganne many of them to digge,& make ſtepps vp to the rocke one after another,as ſoftly as could poſſibly,with catching holde the beſt they could,by the hãging of the rocke,which they found very ſteepe,but neuertheles eaſier to clime,then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formeſt of them being come to the toppe of the rocke, were now ready to take the walle, & to ſet vpon the watche that ſlept: for there was neither man nor dogge that heard them. It chañced then there were holy geſe kept in the temple of Iuno,which at other times were wont to be fed till their croppes were full:but vittells being very ſtraite,& ſcante at that time euen to finde the men,the poore geſe were ſo hard handled, & ſo litle regarded, that they were in mãner ſtarued for lacke of meate. This fowle in deede naturally is very quicke of hearing,& ſo is ſhe alſo very fearefull by nature:& being in manner famiſhed with their harde allowance,they were ſo much the more waking,& eaſier to be afrayed. Vpõ this occaſion therfore, they heard the cõming of the GAVLES,& alſo beganne to ronne vp & downe & crie for feare:with which noyſe they did wake thoſe that were within the caſtell.The GAVLES being bewrayed by theſe fooliſhe geſe, left their ſtealing vpon them, & came in with all the open noyſe & terrour they could.The ROMAINES hearing this larum, euery man tooke ſuch weapon as came firſt to his hand, & they ranne ſodainely to reſcue that place from whence they vnderſtoode the noyſe: among thoſe,the formeſt man of all was Marcus Manlius,a man that had bene Cõſul,who had a luſty bodye,& as ſtowte a harte.His happe being to mete with two of the GAVLES together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knocke him on the head, he preuẽted him,& ſtrake of his hand with his ſword,and clapt his target on the others face ſo fiercely, that he threwe him backward down the rocke:& cõming afterwards vnto the walle with others that ranne thither with him,he repulſed the reſt of the GAVLES that were gotten vp,who were not many in nũber,neither did any great acte.Thus the ROMAINES hauing eſcaped this daũger,the next morning they threw the captaine hedlong down the rocks from the caſtell,who had charge of the watche the night before: & gaue Manlius in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done, a more honorable then profitable rewarde,which was this.Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the country wheate, which they call Far, and the fourth parte of the meaſure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quarte, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the daye. After this repulſe, the GAVLES beganne to be diſcoraged, partely for that their vitailles fayled them, and durſt no more forage abroade in the fieldes for feare of Camillus: and partly alſo for that the plague came amongeſt them, being lodged amongeſt heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place aboue ground without buriall,

The Gaules clime vp to the Capitoll in the night.

The holy geſe ſaued the Capitoll.

Marcus Mãlius repulſed the Gaules from the Capitoll.

The Gaules vexed with the plague at Rome.

A and amongeſt burnt houſes deſtroyed, where the aſhes being blowen very high by the winde & vehemẽcy of heate, dyd geue a drie perſing ayer, that dyd maruelouſly poyſon their bodies when they came to drawe in the breathe of it. But the greateſt cauſe of all their miſchief was, the chaunge of their wonted dyet. Who comming out of a freſhe countrie, where there were excellent pleaſaunt places to retire vnto, to auoyde the diſcommoditie of the parching heate of the ſommer, were nowe in a naughty plaine countrie for them to remaine in, in the latter ſeaſon of the yere. All theſe things together dyd heape diſeaſes vpon them, beſides the long continuaunce of the ſiege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the ſeuenth moneth) by reaſon whereof there grewe a maruelous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that dyed daylie, and laye vnburied. But notwithſtanding all the death and trouble of the B Gavles, the poore beſieged Romaines were nothing holpen the more, the famine ſtill dyd growe ſo faſt vpõ them. And bicauſe they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growen almoſt vnto a deſpaire: and ſend vnto him they could not, the Gavles kept ſo ſtraight watche vpon them in the cittie. Whereupon both parties finding them ſelues in harde ſtate, firſt the watche of either ſide beganne to caſt out wordes of peace amongeſt them ſelues: and afterwards by cõſent of the heades, Sulpitius, Tribune of the ſouldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the Romaines ſhould paye a thouſand pounde weight of golde, and that the Gavles ſhould incontinently after the receipt of the ſame, departe out of their cittie, and all their territories. This decree being paſſed by othe from both, the golde was brought. And whẽ it came to be weyed, the Gavles at the firſt priuely begãne to deale falſe-C ly with them: but afterwardes they openly ſtayed the ballance, and would not let them waye no more, whereat the Romaines beganne to be angrie with them. Then Brennus, in ſcorne & mockery, to deſpight them more, pluckt of his ſworde, girdell and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was wayed. Sulpitius ſeeing that: asked him what he ment by it? Brennus aunſwered him: what canne it ſignifie els, but ſorrowe to the vanquiſhed. This worde euer after ranne as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouthes. Some of the Romaines tooke this vile parte of theirs in ſuch ſcorne, that they would needes take the gold from them againe by force, and ſo returne into their holde, to abide the ſiege ſtill, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it beſt with pacience to put vp this ſcorne of theirs, and not to thincke it was a ſhame to paye more then they had promiſed: but only to D paye it by cõpulſion as they dyd, by misfortune of time, was to thincke it rather neceſſary, then honorable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aſwell amongeſt them ſelues, as with the Gavles: Camillus came to Rome gates with his armie, and vnderſtanding all what had paſſed betweene them, he commaunded the reſt of the army to marche fayer and ſoftely after him in good order, and he in the meane ſeaſon with the beſt choyſe men he had, went before with all ſpeede. Aſſone as the other Romaines within the cittie had ſpied him, they ſhowted out for ioye, and receaued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more wordes, as their ſoueraine captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the golde out of the skales, gaue it vnto his men, and commaunded the Gavles preſently to take vp their skales, and to get them going: for, ſayeth he, it is not the Romaines E manner to keepe their countrie with golde, but with the ſworde. Then Brennus beganne to be hotte, and tolde him it was not honorably done of him, to breake the accorde that had paſſed betweene them before by othe. Whereunto Camillus ſtowtely aunſwered him againe, that accorde was of no validitie. For he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magiſtrates whatſoeuer, & their actes, by his election were made of no authoritie: and ſeeing therefore they had delte with men, that had no power of them ſelues to accorde to any matter, they were to ſpeake to him, if they required ought. For he alone had abſolute authoritie to pardone them if they repented, and would aske it: or els to puniſhe them, and make their bodies aunſwer the damages and loſſe his cuntry had by them ſuſteyned. Theſe wordes made Brennus madde as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their ſwordes of all ſides, and F layed luſtely one at an other as they could, within the houſes, and in open ſtreetes, where they could ſet no battell in order. But Brennus ſodainely remembring him ſelfe that it was no euen matche for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had loſt many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of Rome with all his army, and went to encãpe him ſelf about a three ſcore furlong from thence, in the highe way that goeth towards the cittie of the Gabians. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, & ſhowed at his campe by the breake of daye. The Romaines hauing taken harte againe vnto them, dyd luſtely geue them battell: the ſame continued longe, very cruell and doubtefull, vntill the Gavles at the length were ouerthrowen, and their campe taken with great ſlaughter. As for thoſe that dyd eſcape the furie of the battell, they were killed, ſome by the Romaines ſelues, who hottely followed the chaſe after the battell broken: the reſidue of them, and the greateſt parte, were ſlaine by thoſe of the citties and villages neere abouts, that dyd ſet vpon them as they fled ſcatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the cittie of Rome ſtraungely againe recouered, that was before ſtraungely wonne and loſt, after it had continued ſeuen moneths in the handes of the barbarous people. For they entred Rome about the fiftenth daye of Iulye: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirtenth daye of Februarye following. So Camillus triumphed as beſeemed him, and as one that had ſaued and deliuered his countrie out of the handes of their enemies, and ſet Rome againe at libertie. Thoſe that had bene abroade all the time of this ſiege, came into Rome againe, following his triumphing charret: and thoſe that had bene beſieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue dyed by famin) went and preſented them ſelues before him, and eche one embraced other, in weeping wiſe for ioye. The prieſtes and miniſters of the temples alſo, preſented their holy iuells, whole and vndefaced, which ſome of them had buried in the ground within the cittie ſelfe: and others ſome had caried awaye with them, when they fled out of Rome. All theſe the people dyd as gladly ſee, as if the goddes them ſelues had returned home againe into their cittie. After they had ſacrificed vnto the goddes, and rendred them moſt humble thankes, and had purged their cittie, as they had bene taught by men experienced in thoſe matters for ſatisfaction of the goddes: Camillus beganne againe to buylde vp the temples that were there before, harde by the which he buylt another newe one alſo to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Ceditius heard the voyce warne him of the coming of the Gavles. So by Camillus good diligence, and the prieſtes great paynes and trauaill, the ſituations of theſe temples were with muche a doe founde out againe. But when they were to buylde againe all the reſt of the cittie, that was wholy burnt, and deſtroyed to the grounde: the people had no minde to it, but euer ſhrinked backe, to put any hande to the worcke, for that they lacked all thinges neceſſarie to beginne the ſame. Furthermore, waying their late and long ſuſteined trouble and miſeries, they were fitter to take their eaſe and reſt, then to beginne newe labour and toyle, to kill their hartes and bodies altogether. For, neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reache to the charge of it. Wherefore diſpoſing their mindes to dwell in the cittie of Veies, Which remained whole, vntouched, and furniſhed of all thinges to receaue them: they deliuered to the pratling Orators (whoſe tongues dyd neuer ceaſe to ſpeake placentia to the people) trimme occaſion to ſet this matter abroache. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certen ſeditious wordes ſpoken againſt Camillus, which were theſe. That for his priuate ambition he would depriue them of a cittie well furniſhed already, and would againſt their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houſes, wholy burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, how he would make them to rayſe vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the ende the people might call him, not only captaine and generall of the Romaines, but the founder of Rome alſo, & ſo drown Romulus honorable title thereof. The Senate conſidering of this matter, & fearing ſome tumulte among the people: they would not ſuffer Camillus to leaue his Dictator ſhippe before the ende of the yere, notwithſtanding no man euer enioyed that office aboue ſixe moneths. Then Camillus for his parte dyd much endeuour him ſelfe, to comforte & appeaſe the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncеſters, and put them in minde alſo of the holy places dedicated to the goddes, and ſanctified by king Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongeſt many other tokens drawen out of holy and diuine things, he forgate not to bring for example, the heade of a man feunde newe and freſhe, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that Camillus perſuaded the people what he could to dwell in Rome, and to leaue Veies.

A if that place by fatall deſteny had bene once choſen to be the heade and chief of all ITALIE. And moreouer, that the holy fyer of the goddeſſe Veſta (which ſence the warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Veſtall Nunnes) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forſake their naturall cittie, beſides the great ſhame and diſhonour it would be vnto them, to ſee it inhabited in time to come by vnknowe ſtraungers, or els to be left a common field and paſture, for beaſtes and cattell to graze in. Such ſorowfull examples and griefes, the honeſt naturall borne cittizens, dyd euer blowe into the peoples eares, aſwell priuately, as openly. The people againe to the contrarie, dyd make their hartes to yerne for pittie, when they layed before their eyes their penurie, and pouertie they ſuſteined: and beſought them alſo not to enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peces of a ſpoyled cittie (as B of a ſhippewracke that had caſt them naked into the ſea, hauing only ſaued bare life and perſones) ſence that they had another cittie neere at hande and ready to receaue them. So Camillus counſell was, that the Senate ſhould conſulte vpon this matter, and deliuer their abſolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this counſell, he him ſelf brought forth many probable reaſons, why they ſhould not leaue in any caſe, the place of their naturall birth and country: and ſo dyd many other Senatours in like caſe, fauoring that opinion. Laſt of all, after theſe perſuaſions, he commaunded Lucius Lucretius (whoſe manner was to ſpeake firſt in ſuch aſſemblies) that he ſhould ſtand vp and deliuer his opinion, & that the reſt alſo in order as they ſat, ſhould ſaye their mindes. So euery man keeping ſilence, as Lucretius was ready to ſpeake, at that preſent time there paſſed by their coũſaill houſe, a captaine with his bãde that warded C that daye, who ſpake alowde to his enſigne bearer that went formeſt, to ſtaye, and ſet downe his enſigne there: for, ſayed he, here is a very good place for vs to warde in. Theſe wordes being heard vp into the Senate houſe, euen as they ſtoode all in a doubte & maze what would be the reſolution of this matter: Lucretius beganne to ſaye, that he moſt humbly thancked the goddes, and allowed of the captaines iudgment, and ſo euery one of the reſt in their order, ſayed as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull chaunge and alteration of minde ſodainely among the common people: for euery man dyd perſuade & encorage his fellowe liuely to put his hand to this worke. Inſomuch as tarying for no diuiſion or appointing out of ſtreetes, nor ſetting out euery man his place he ſhould builde in: they fell to worke of all handes, euerie one choſing that place he liked beſt, & was moſt cõmodious for their building, without any other D order or diuiſion amongeſt them. Whereupon, they ronning to this building on a head, the ſtreetes were cõfuſed on heapes together, & their houſes all built out of order & vniformitie. For the reporte goeth, that the whole cittie (as well cõmon as priuate buildings) was built vp new againe in a yere. But the ſurueyours, to whom Camillus had geuen charge to finde out all the holy places where the tẽples had bene ouerthrowen: as they went about mount Pallatine, they came by chaunce to the place, where the chappell of Mars had ſtoode, which the GAVLES had wholy burnt and deſtroyed, as they had done all the reſt. They making cleane the place, and ſurueying euery corner, dyd finde by chaunce Romulus augures crooked ſtaffe hidden vnder a great mount of aſhes. This ſtaffe is crooked at one of the endes, and they call it Lituus, which ſoothe ſayers doe vſe to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will E beholde the flying of birdes to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skillfull in this arte, dyd vſe this ſtaffe: and after he was taken awaye from all mens ſights, the prieſts tooke it, and kept it as a holy relicke, ſuffering no creature to laye hands on it. Nowe they founde this ſtaffe whole and vnbroken, where all things els were conſumed and periſhed by fire, they were in a maruelous ioye thereat. For they interpreted this to be a ſigne, of the euerlaſting continuaunce of the cittie of ROME. But before they could make an ende of all their building, there grewe a newe warre againe vpon them. For at one very inſtante, all the ÆQVES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and mayne into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THVSCANS alſo went then and beſieged SVTRIVM, that was in league & amitie with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them ſtraight to the field with their F armie, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES beſieged them ſo ſtraightely, that their army ſtoode in great daunger to be ouerthrowen, & they were driuen to ſende to ROME for a newe ſupplie. Thereupon the ROMAINES dyd chooſe Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occaſion of this warre is reported two manner of wayes: whereof I will declare the A firſt, which I doe conceyue to be but a tale. They ſaye the LATINES ſent vnto the ROMAINES, to demaunde ſome of their free maydes in mariage: which they dyd either to make a quarell of warre, or els as deſirous in deede, to ioyne both the peoples againe by newe mariages. The ROMAINES were amaſed very much at this, and ſore troubled, as not knowing howe to aunſwer them, they were ſo affrayed of warres. For they were yet ſcante newe ſetled at home, and dreaded much leſt this demaunde of their daughters, was but a ſummons made to geue them hoſtages, which they finely cloked vnder the name of alliãce in mariage. Some ſaye that there dreſſed vp like gentlewomen, & then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuiſe, B and choſe ſuch a number of bonde maydes as ſhe deſired to haue, & trimming them vp in fine apparell, begawded with chaines of golde and iuells, they ſent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the cittie. When night was come, the other maydes hyd their enemies ſwords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) dyd clime vp to the toppe of a wilde figge tree, from which ſhe ſhewed a burning torche vnto the ROMAINES, hauing made ſhifte to hange ſomwhat behinde her, to keepe the light from ſight of the enemies. For this ſignall the Senate of ROME had ſecretly appointed her to ſet vp, which was the cauſe that the iſſuing out of the ſouldiers being commaunded to goe out in the night, was full of trouble and tumulte. For being preſſed by their captaines, they called one another, and there was great done on the fifte day of the moneth called then Quintilis, & now is named Iulye: at which time they doe yet celebrate a certaine feaſt in remembraunce of that acte. For firſt of all, going out of the citie, they call alowde many of their fellowes names which are moſt common: as Caius, Marcus, and Lucius, ſhowing thereby howe one of them called another after that ſorte, as they dyd helpe the ROMAINES at that time to deſtroye the LATINES. Then they are feaſted, ſit-ting vnder bowers made with wilde figge tree boughes: and this feaſte daye is called, Nonæ D Capratinæ, by reaſon of the wilde figge tree (as ſome thincke) from the toppe whereof, the bonde mayde ſhewed to the ROMAINES the burning torche. For the ROMAINES call the wilde figge tree, Caprificus. Other ſaye, that all theſe things are done and ſpoken, in remembrance of the miſchaũce that happened vnto Romulus, whẽ he was taken out of their ſight, the ſame day without the gats of the citty, at which time there roſe a ſodain miſte & darke clowd.

Or as ſome other ſaye, that then was the eclypſe of the ſunne: and they holde opinion that the lus* vaniſhed out of mens ſightes, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neere vnto the place which is called goate marſhe, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The 2. occaſion & beginning of this warre (according to the opinion of moſt writers) was, that Camillus E being choſen Dictator the third time, & knowing that the Trib. militares with their army were ſtraightly beſieged by the LATINES, and VOLSCES: he was inforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priuiledged from further ſeruice in warres. And hauing fetched a great cõpaſſe about moũt Martian, bicauſe he would not be ſeene of his enemies, he came to lodge his campe behind them, where he raiſed fiers, to make the ROMAINES knowe that were beſieged, how he was come: which as ſone as they pceiued, they tooke to thẽ corage again, & determined to fight. But the LATINES & VOLSCES kept within their cãpe, & dyd entrenche & fortifie thẽ ſelues with a wall of wodd, which they layed a croſſe, bicauſe they ſaw they were beſet both before & behind: & determined to tary the releeſe of a new ſupply, as well of their owne, as of ſome further ayde beſides frõ the THVSCANS, which thing Camillus pceauing, & fearing F leaſt they ſhould ſerue him, as he had already hãdled thẽ by cõpaſſing of him again behind: he thought it neceſſary to preuẽt this. So cõſidering the incloſure & fortificatiõ of their cãpe was all

A all of wodde, and that euery morning commonly, there came a great winde from the side of the mountaines, he made prouision of a number of fire brandes. And leading out his armie into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one parte of them to geue charge vpon the enemies on the one side, with great noyse and showting: and he with the other parte determined to rayse fier on the cõtrary side, from whence the winde should come, looking for oportunitie to doe the same. When he sawe the sunne vp, and the winde beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hilles, & that the skirmishe was begonne on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the companie he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throwe into the inclosure of their campe, diuers potts & dartes with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catche holde of, in this inclosure of wodde, & trees layed ouerthwart, dyd raise B straight an exceding great flame in the ayer, & still got waye inwards into the Latines cãpe. Whereupon the Latines being vnprouided of present remedy to quenche the flame, and seeing their campe a fyre all about their eares: they gathered them selues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheles, they were inforced in the ende to get them into the field, & there they founde their enemies ready armed, & in battell raye. So as fewe of those escaped that came into the field, & their fellowes that remained within their cãpe, were burnt to death with fyer, vntill the Romaines them selues came to quench it for greedines of their spoyle & goodes. When all this was done, Camillus left his sonne in the campe, to keepe the prisoners & spoyles: & he him self, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies contrie, where he tooke the cittie of Æqves. Then after he had ouercome the Volsces, he led his army pre-C sently from thence vnto the cittie of Svtrivm. For he had not yet harde of their misfortune. Therefore he hasted him self to ayde them, bicause he thought they were yet besieged by the Thvscans. But suche was their harde fortune, that they had already yelded vp their cittie by composition, & saued no parte of their goodes, but the very clothes they had on their backs. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the waye as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miserie, with their wiues & litle young children: whose miserie went to the very harte of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he sawe the Romaines weepe for pittie also, to see the mone that these vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it greued them hartely to beholde their great mischaunce: he determined with him self not to deferre reuenge, but presently to goe the selfe same daye before the cittie D of Svtrivm, imagining that he should finde the Thvscans out of order, without keeping watch, & attending nothing but making good cheere, bicause they had newly taken a wealthy riche cittie, where they had left neuer an enemy in the same to hurte them, neither feared any abroad to come neere to assaulte them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he gessed. For he had not only passed through the territories of the cittie, without any intelligence geuen to the enemies within the same: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles, before they hard any thing of his coming, by reason they neither kept watch nor warde, but were dispersed abroade in the cittie, in euery house, eating and drincking droncke together. Insomuch as when they knew their enemies were already within the cittie, they were so full fraight with meate & wine, that the most of their wittes serued them not so much as to flye, but tarried vn-
E till they were slaine or taken, like beastes in the houses. Thus was the cittie of Svtrivm twise taken in one daye. And it chaunced that those which had wonne it, lost it: & those which had lost it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes. Who deserued both the honour and entrie of triumphe into Rome: the which wanne him no lesse good will and glorie, then the two first before had done prayse, and gotten fame. For euen his greatest enemies that most spighted and enuied his former noble actes, ascribing them rather to fortune that fauored him, then to his valliantnes or worthines: were forced nowe by this deede of his to confesse, that his wisedome and valliantnes deserued prayse and commendation to the skyes. Camillus of all his enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man F that gaue the Gavles the repulse that night they had entered the walles of the Capitoll, and had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the surname of Capitolinus. He aspiring to be the chief of the cittie, & finding no direct waye to exceede the glory of Camillus, tooke the broade highe waye of them that practise tyrannie. For he beganne to flatter the common people, and ſpecially thoſe that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defende their cauſes, and pleaded their caſe at the barre againſt their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours handes and caried them awaye by force, that for lacke of abilitie to paye, were by rigour of the lawe condemned to be bonde ſlaues. But by this practiſe, in ſhorte time he gotte him a maruelous number of ſuche needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honeſt cittizens were affrayed of the inſolent partes they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumultes they daylie ſtirred vp in the market place. Therefore ſuſpecting the worſt in this caſe, they dyd chooſe Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who cauſed the ſayed Manlius immediately to be apprehended, and committed him to priſon. Whereupon the people beganne to chaunge their apparell: which they were neuer wont to doe, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing leaſt ſome cõmotion would ryſe hereupon, they dyd ſet him at libertie againe. He being thus out of priſon, was no whit the better, nor wiſer thereby, but dyd ſtill ſtirre vp the commons, more boldely and ſeditiouſly, then before. Then was Camillus choſen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accuſed in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the ſight of the Capitoll troubled his accuſers much. For the very place it ſelfe where Manlius had repulſed the GAVLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was eaſely ſeene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he him ſelfe pointing with his hande, ſhewed the place vnto the goddes, and weeping tenderly he layed before them the remembraunce of the hazarde of his life, in fighting for their ſafety. This dyd moue the iudges hartes to pittie, ſo as they knew not what to doe, but many times they dyd put ouer the hearing of his caſe vnto another daye, and neither would they geue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifeſt proofes: neither could they vſe the ſeueritie of the lawe vpon him, bicauſe the place of his ſo notable good ſeruice was euer ſtill before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cauſe of delaye of iuſtice, dyd make the place of iudgement to be remoued without the cittie, into a place called the wodde Petelian, from whence they could not ſee the Capitoll. And there the accuſers gaue apparent euidence againſt him: and the iudges conſidering all his wicked practiſes, conceaued a iuſt cauſe to puniſhe him, as he had deſerued. So they gaue ſentence of death againſt him: that he ſhould be caried to the mount Capitoll, and there to be throwen downe hedlonge the rockes thereof. Thus, one, and the ſelfe place was a memory of his notable good ſeruice, and alſo a memoriall of his miſerable and vnfortunate end. Beſides all this, they raſed his houſe, and built in the ſame place a temple to the goddeſſe they call Moneta: and made a lawe alſo, that no Patrician from thenceforth ſhould dwell any more in the mount Capitoll. Camillus after this, being called againe to take the office of Tribunus militaris the ſixt time: he ſought to excuſe him ſelfe aſwell for that he ſawe he was well ſtepte in yeres, as alſo for that he feared fortunes ſpight, or ſome miſhappe, after he had obteined ſuch glorie for his noble actes and ſeruice. Howbeit the moſt apparent cauſe of his excuſe, was his ſickenes, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allowe no excuſe by any meanes, but cried out, they dyd not deſire he ſhould fight a foote nor a horſe backe, but that he ſhould only geue counſaill, and commaunde: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, againſt their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, dyd inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friendes. So he led his army out immediately to the field, and camped as neere the enemy as he could: being minded for his parte to drawe the warres out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if neede required) when he had recouered ſtrength. But Furius contrarilie coueting glorie, was whottely bent to hazarde the battell, whatſoeuer perill came of it: and to this ende he ſturred vp, and incoraged the captaines of euerie priuate bande. Wherfore Camillus fearing leaſt they ſhould thinke, for ill will he bare the young men, that he went about to hinder and take awaye the meanes to winne their honour, and to doe ſome noble acte: ſuffered Furius againſt his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane ſeaſon by reaſon of his ſicknes, remained with a fewe about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to preſent battell to the enemie, & ſo was he as headilie alſo ouerthrowen. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINES were ouerthrowen: ſicke as he was vpon his bedde, Lucius Furius gaue battell to the Praneſtines and Volſces, and was ouerthrowen.

A bedde, got vp, and taking his houſeholde ſeruantes with him, he went in haſte to the gates of the campe, and paſſed through thoſe that fled, vntill he came to mete with the enemies that had them in chaſe. The ROMAINES ſeeing this that were already entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and thoſe that fled alſo without, when they ſawe him, they gathered together, and put them ſelues againe in arraye before him, and perſuaded one another not to forſake their captaine. So their enemies hereupon ſtayed their chaſing, and would purſue no further that daye. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the fielde, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victorie harde, he entred amongeſt them that fled into their campe pelmel, or hand ouerheade, and ſlue the moſt parte of them euen there. After this victorie, he was aduertiſed howe the B THVSCANS had taken the cittie of SVTRIVM, and had put to the ſworde all the inhabitants of the ſame, which were the ROMAINES cittizens. Whereupon he ſent to ROME the greateſt parte of his army, and keeping with him the lighteſt and luſtieſt men, went and gaue aſſaulte vnto the THVSCANS, that nowe were harbored in the cittie of SVTRIVM. Which when he had wonne againe, he ſlue parte of them, and the other ſaued them ſelues by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding ſpoyle, confirming by experience, the wiſedome of the ROMAINES, who dyd not feare the age nor ſicknes of a good captaine that was experte and valliant: but had choſen him againſt his will, though he was both olde and ſicke, and preferred him farre before the younger and luſtier that made ſute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were reuolted, they ſent Camillus
C thither againe, willing him of fiue other companions to take out one he liked beſt, euery of the which deſired to be choſen, and made their ſute vnto him for the ſame. But he refuſing all other, dyd choſe againe Lucius Furius beyounde all expectation of men, ſeeing not long before he needes would againſt his will hazarde battell, in which he was ouerthrowen. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a deſire (as I thincke) to hyde his faulte and ſhame he had receaued: dyd of curteſie preferre him before all other. Nowe the THVSCVLANIANS hearing of Camillus coming againſt them, ſubtilly ſought to culler the faulte they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, ſome to plowe, other to keepe the beaſtes, as if they had bene in beſt peace: and dyd ſet the gates of the cittie wide open, ſent their children openly to ſchoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their ſhoppes, D the men of hauiour & honeſt cittizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, & the officers and gouernours of the cittie went vp and downe to euery houſe, commaunding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINES, as if they had ſtoode in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no faulte. Howbeit all theſe fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeue, but that they had an intent to rebell againſt the ROMAINES: yet they made Camillus pittie them, ſeeing they repented them of that they had determined to doe. So he commaunded them to goe to Rome to the Senate, to craue pardone of their faulte: and he him ſelfe dyd helpe them, not only to purge their cittie of any intent of rebellion, but alſo to get them the priuiledge and freedome of ROME. And theſe be the chiefeſt acts Camillus dyd in the ſixt time of his tribuneſhippe. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great ſedition in the cittie, betwene E the common people, and the Senate. For he would in any caſe that of the two Conſuls, which were choſen yerely, the one of them ſhould be a commoner, and not that both of them ſhould be of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were choſen, but the election of the Conſuls, the people ſtayed: ſo that the common wealth went to decaye, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it dyd before, for lacke of gouernment. But to F ſuppreſſe this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was ſore againſt his will, bicauſe it miſliked the people muche. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing ſerued vnder him in many warres and battells, might boldely, and truely ſaye vnto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in deſpight, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble men towards them. Thus neceſſitie dyd vrge him, either by force to ſuppreſſe the people, if he were the ſtronger in this diſſention: or els that he him ſelf ſhould be ſuppreſſed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithſtanding, preparing to preuent this mischief, and knowing the daye the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the passing of their lawe by voyces of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations set vpon postes, that the same very daye he would muster the people, and all was but to drawe them from the market place into the field of Mars, and dyd set great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrarie parte, dyd withstande his threates, and sware they would condemne Camillus selfe in fiftie thousand Drachmas of siluer, if he dyd not let the people alone, but would goe about to disturbe them for geuing their voyces to such lawe, as they liked of. Camillus perceauing this, and fearing to be condemned, and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being nowe an olde man, and one that had done so many great and notable actes, or els for that he thought him selfe not strong enough to withstande the force of the people: he kept his house that daye, fayning him selfe to be sicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the ende he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stolo general of the horse men, that was the author and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides dyd suffer him to preferre another lawe, and to passe it by voyces of the people, that aboue all other lawes, dyd most trouble the Patricians. Which lawe dyd forbid any cittizen of Rome, to haue, or occupie aboue fiue hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres and a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. partes of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloste, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite of the Senate established this law. Howbeit shortely after it was found out, that him self had more number of acres then his owne lawe permitted. By reason whereof, he receaued the iuste punishment of his owne deuised forfaiture. Yet the most weightie matter of all this dissention that beganne first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained still vndetermined. But while these matters were thus in talke, the Romaines had certen intelligence, howe the Gaules were departed once againe from the Adriaticke sea, and were coming with a great power straight vnto Rome: vpon reporte of which newes, the warres followed immediately. For the Gaules destroyed the champion country as they went: and the poore country men that could not recouer Rome, were scattered here and there amongest the mountaines. The feare of this dyd somewhat appease the dissention. The people then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sorte with the noble, dyd all with one voyce and assent chuse Camillus Dictator the fifte time. He was nowe a very olde man, lacking litle of foure score yeres; but neuertheles, considering the necessitie and present daunger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, he vndertooke the charge. Nowe that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leuied men, and prepared his army. And knowing very well howe the fiercenes of these barbarous Gaules consisted, in downe right blowes with their swordes, with which they would strike of heades and shoulders of men at a blowe, mangling them like bouchers, without any cast or skyll of fight: he caused iron salletts, and morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothely wrought on the out side as could be, that their swordes lighting on them, should either slyde of, or breake. Moreouer, he caused their sheldes to haue barres made about them of copper, bicause the wodde selfe was not able to abide their blowes. Furthermore, he dyd teache his souldiers to cary long iauelines or punchion staues, wherewith they might wounde their enemies lifting vp their swordes to strike them. Nowe when the Gaules were come neere Rome, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kindes of spoyle and booties: then Camillus brought his armie also into the fielde, and went to lodge on a litle hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many litles caues, so that the most of his army was all hidden and couered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those highe places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder: dyd suffer them to come and spoyle euen to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept him selfe quiet in his campe and well fortified. Vntill such time as he spyed occasion of aduantage, that the best parte of their army were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fieldes: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drincking, as they vsed carelesly at all howres. Then Camillus

A millus ſent very early before daye, his lighteſt armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in coming out of their campe, and to let them in any caſe from putting their men in order of battell: and he at the breake of daye, came downe into the plaine, and dyd ſet his other men being well armed, in good arraye, which were a great number, and luſtie fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, fewe, and fearefull. This at the very firſt diſcoraged the hartes of the GAVLES maruelouſly, bicauſe they thought them ſelues diſhonored, that the ROMAINES ſhould charge vpon them firſt. Afterwardes alſo Camillus vantgarde dyd ſet vpon the GAVLES, and that on a ſodaine, before they had leyſure to put them ſelues in battell, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chaunce. In the ende alſo, Camillus came vpon the neckes of them, with B all his whole force, and army together: againſt whom they ranne notwithſtanding, holding vp their naked ſwordes aloſte in their handes. But the ROMAINES thruſting with their armed iauelinges, receaued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby ſo rebated the edges of their ſwordes (their blades being very ſharpe and thinne grounde, and of ſo ſofte a temper) that they bowed againe, and ſtoode crooked vnreaſonably: and furthermore, hauing perſed their ſhieldes through with their punchingſtaues, the GAVLES armes were ſo clogd and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their ſwordes and ſhieldes, and flying in, cloſed with the ROMAINES, and caught holde of their iauelines, thincking by plaine force to haue wreſted them out of their handes. Howbeit they perceauing then the GAVLES were naked, fell ſtraight to their ſwordes: and ſo was Camillus ſlue the Gaules againe.
C the ſlaughter of their firſt ranckes very great. The other fled ſcatteringly here and there, all about the plaine: bicauſe Camillus had cauſed all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and poſſeſſed. Neither dyd they retire towardes their campe, for that it was vnfortified, and alſo knewe well enough it would be eaſely taken. This battell (as they ſaye) was thirteene yeres after their taking of ROME before. But after that fielde, the ROMAINES corages were good enough againſt theſe barbarous GAVLES, whom they ſtoode in feare of before: thincking the firſt time they came, that they had not ouercomed them by force, but by reaſon of the plague that fell amongeſt them, or through ſome other ſtraunge chaunce.
For they dyd ſo feare them at that time, that they made a lawe, howe their prieſtes ſhould The Romaines howe they exempted prieſtes from the warres.
D be exempted from warres, ſo it were not againſt the GAVLES. This ouerthrowe was the laſt marſhall acte Camillus dyd in the warres. For, the taking of the cittie of VELITRES, was an accident depending vpon this iorney: bicauſe they yelded ſtraight vnto him, without ſtriking any ſtroke. But the ſeditiouſnes of the people of ROME about gouernment, and the chooſing of the yere Conſuls, was the hardeſt matter he euer had in hande. For they returning home to ROME ſtronge, and of greate power, by their late obteined victorie: woulde in any caſe haue one of the Conſuls to be choſen of a commoner, which was directly againſt their auncient cuſtome. But the Senate ſtowtely withſtoode it, and would not ſuffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authoritie, which was greate then, that they ſhould mainteine and continue their auncient dignitie, and prerogatiue of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was ſet in his chayer in the market place, where he hearde E and diſpatched cauſes: there came a ſergeante to him, ſent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to followe him, and there withall layed violent handes vpon him, as he woulde haue caried him awaye by force. This made ſuche a terrible Sedition at Rome about chooſing of Conſuls.
tumulte and vprore, that the like was neuer ſeene before in the market place. For Camillus friendes draue the ſergeaunte backe behinde the chayer. The common people cried out againe to the ſergeant from beneath, pull him out of his chayer. This ſo amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to ſaye to the matter. Notwithſtanding, he would not reſigne vp his office, but taking thoſe Senatours he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept. And there, before he would goe into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, & made his prayer vnto the goddes, that it would pleaſe them to F bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and ſo made a ſolemne vowe and promiſe (if theſe tumultes and troubles might be pacified) that he woulde builde a temple of Concorde. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and di-

Policy to yeld to neceſsitie. uerſitie of opinions among them: yet in the ende, the eaſieſt waye dyd carie it, and that was to graunt the common peoples deſire, that a commoner ſhould be choſen Conſul with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly publiſhed to the people the Senates decree, confirming their deſire: the common people were ſo ioyfull, that at that preſente they let fall all their malice againſt the Nobilitie and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his houſe, with greate ſhowtes of ioye, and clapping of handes. The next morning all the people being aſſembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of concorde ſhould be built at the common wealthes charge (according to the vowe Camillus had made) in ſuch a place, as it might be ſeene from the market place ſelfe, where all the aſſemblies for matters of counſell were made. And further, it was ordered that one daye more ſhould be added to the feaſtes of the LATINES: & that from thenceforth they ſhould ſolemniſe foure feſtiuall dayes, & ſhould preſently make generall ſacrifices vnto the goddes, in euerie temple of the cittie, to geue them thanckes: and in token of ioye, they ſhould all weare garlands vpon their heades for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were choſen two Conſuls, Marcus Æmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or commoners. And this was the laſte acte that euer Camillus dyd. For, the next yere after, the plague was in ROME, and tooke awaye an infinite number of people that dyed, beſides many magiſtrates and officers of the cittie that departed: among whom, Camillus alſo left his life. Who notwithſtanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reaſonable courſe of life: yet he was as ready to dye, and as paciently tooke his death, as any man liuing could haue done. Moreouer, the ROMAINES made more mone and lamentation for his deathe alone, then for all the reſt the plague had already conſumed.

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

CÆSAR seeing in Rome one daye certen riche & wealthy ſtraũgers, hauing litle dogges and munkeyes in their armes, and that they made maruelous much of them, he asked them if the women in their country had no children: wiſely reprouing them by his queſtion, for that they beſtowed their naturall loue & affection vpon brute beaſts, which they ſhould with all kindnes and loue beſtowe vpon creatures. Nature in like caſe alſo, hauing planted in our minds a naturall deſire to learne and vnderſtand, we are in reaſon to reproue thoſe that vainely abuſe this good deſire, fondly diſpoſing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable: and to caſt behinde them in the meane ſeaſon things honeſt and neceſſarie to be learned. For as touching our outward ſence, which with paſſion receaueth impreſſiõ of the thing it ſeeth, peraduenture it wilbe neceſſarie to conſider indifferently the thing ſeene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtefull vnto him: but ſo fareth it not with our vnderſtanding, for euery man maye at his pleaſure turne and diſpoſe that to the thinge he taketh delight in, the reaſon whereof we muſt allwayes employe to the beſt parte, and that not only to conſider and looke vpon the thing, but alſo to reape the beneſit and commoditie of the thing we ſee. For like as the eye is moſt delited with the lighteſt and freſheſt cullers: euen ſo we muſt geiue our mindes vnto thoſe ſightes, which by looking vpon them doe drawe profit and pleaſure vnto vs. For ſuch effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or reade them, they doe printe in our hartes an earneſt loue aud deſire to followe them. But this followeth not in all other things we eſteeme, neither are we allwayes diſpoſed to deſire to doe the things we ſee wel done: but cõtrary oftentimes, when we like the worke, we miſlike the worke man, as cõmonly in making theſe perfumes and purple cullers. For both the one, & the other doe pleaſe vs well: but yet we take perfumers & diers to be men of a meane occupation. Therefore Antiſthenes aunſwered one very wiſely, that told him Iſmenias was an excellent player of the flute. But yet he is a naughtie man, ſayed he: otherwiſe he could not be ſo conning at the flute as he is. Euen ſo dyd Philippe king of Macedon ſaye to his ſonne Alexander the great on a time: that at a certen feaſt had ſong paſſing ſweetely, and like a maiſter of muſicke: Art thou not

VVit allwayes to be employed to good things.

Antiſthenes ſaying of a flute player.

aſhamed, ſonne, to ſinge ſo well? It is enough for a King to beſtowe his leyſure ſomtime to heare muſitians ſinge, and he doth much honour to the muſes to heare the maſters of the ſcience otherwhile, when one of them ſingeth to excell another. But he that perſonally ſhall beſtowe his time, exerciſing any meane ſcience: bringeth his paynes he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witnes againſt him ſelfe, to proue that he hath bene negligent to learne things honeſt and profitable. And there was neuer any young gentleman nobly borne, that ſeeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the cittie of PISA) deſired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for ſeeing of Iuno in the cittie of ARGOS: nor that deſired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleaſure ſomtime to reade their workes. For it followeth not of neceſſitie, that though the worke delight, the workeman muſt needes be prayſed. And ſo in like caſe, ſuch things doe not profit thoſe which behold them, bicauſe they doe not moue affection in the hartes of the beholders to followe them, neither doe ſtirre vp affection to reſemble them, and much leſſe to conforme our ſelues vnto them. But vertue hath this ſingular propertie in all her actions: that ſhe maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her ſo, that ſtraight he liketh all her doings, and deſireth to followe thoſe that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only deſire to haue them in poſſeſſion: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deedes. Wherefore, we are contented to haue goodes from other men: but good deedes we would other ſhould haue from vs. For vertue is of this power, that ſhe allureth a mans minde preſently to vſe her, that wiſely conſidereth of her, and maketh him very deſirous in his harte to followe her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderſtanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which ſodainely bringeth vnto him a reſolute deſire to doe the like. And this is the reaſon, why me thought I ſhould continew ſtill to write on the liues of noble men, and why I made alſo this tenthe booke: in the which are conteined the liues of Pericles, and Fabius Maximus, who mainteined warres againſt Hanniball. For they were both men very like together in many ſundry vertues, and ſpecially in curteſie and iuſtice: & for that they could paciently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruelous profitable members for their countrie. But if we haue ſorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you ſhall eaſely iudge that reade our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the towne of CHOLARGVS, and of one of the beſt & moſt auncient families of the cittie of ATHENS, both by his father and mother. For Xanthippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the iorney of Mycala) maried Agariſte that came of Cliſthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Piſiſtratus offſpring, and valliantly ouerthrewe their tyrannie. Afterwards he eſtabliſhed lawes, and ordeined a very graue forme of gouernment, to mainteine his cittizens in peace and concorde together. This Agariſte dreamed one night, that ſhe was brought a bed of a lyon: and very ſhortely after ſhe was deliuered of Pericles, who was ſo well proportioned in all the partes of his bodie, that nothing could be mended, ſauing that his head was ſomwhat to long and out of proportion to the reſt of his bodie. And this is the only cauſe why all the ſtatues & images of him almoſt, are made with a helmet of his head: bicauſe the workemen as it ſhould ſeeme (and ſo it is moſt likely) were willing to hide the bleamiſhe of his deformitie. But the ATTICAN poets dyd call him Schinocephalos, aſmuch to ſaye, as headed like an onyon. For thoſe of ATTICA doe ſomtime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to ſaye, an onyon of barbarie: Schinos. And Cratinus the Comicall poet in his comedie he intituled Chirones, ſayed:

The power of vertue.

Pericles ſtocke.

Pericles mothers dreame.

Pericles had a long head.

Olde Saturne he, and dreadfull dyre debate begotten haue, betvvene them Carnally, this tyranne here, this heauy iollting pate, in courte of goddes ſo termed vvorthely.

And againe alſo in that which he nameth Nemeſis, ſpeaking of him, he ſayeth:

Come Iupiter, come Iupiter, Come iollithead, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him alſo, ſayeth in a place:

Sometimes

A Somtimes he ſtandes, amazed when he perceyues, that harde it vvere, ſufficiently to knovve, in vvhat eſtate, his gouernment he leaues.
And then vvill he, be ſeldome ſeene by lovve, ſuche heauy heapes, vvith in his braynes doe grovve.
But yet ſomtimes, out of that monſtruous pate he thundreth faſt, and threatneth euery ſtate.

And Eupolis in a comedie which he intituled Démi: being very inquiſitiue, and asking particularly of euery one of the Orators (whom he fayned were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the laſt man vnto him, he ſayed:

B Truely thou haſt novv brought, vnto vs here that dvvell, the chief of all the captaines, that come from darkſome hell.

And as for muſicke, the moſt authors write, that Damon dyd teache him muſicke, of whoſe name (as men ſaye) they ſhould pronounce the firſt ſyllable ſhorte. Howbeit Ariſtotle ſayeth, that he was taught muſicke by Pythoclides. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderſtanding, and ſubtill in matters of gouernment: for, to hide from the people his ſufficiency therein, he gaue it out he was a muſitian, and dyd reſorte vnto Pericles, as a maſter wreſtler, or fenſer: but he taught him howe he ſhould deale in matters of ſtate. Notwithſtanding, in the ende he could not ſo conningly conuey this matter, but the people ſawe his harping and muſicke, was only a viſer to his other practiſe: wherefore C they dyd baniſh him ATHENS for fiue yeres, as a man that buſilie tooke vpon him to chaunge the ſtate of things, and that fauored tyrannie. And this gaue the Comicall poets matter to playe vpon him finely: among which Plato in a comedie of his, bringeth in a man that aſketh him: Pericles ſtudies and teachers.

O Chiron, tell me firſt: art thou in deede the man, vvhich dyd inſtruct Pericles thus? make anſvver if thou can.

He was ſomtime alſo ſcholler to the philoſopher Zenon, who was borne in the cittie of ELEA, & taught naturall philoſophie, as Parmenides dyd: but his profeſſion was to thwarte and contrary all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his diſputation, which were ſo intricate, that his aduerſarie replying againſt him, knewe not howe to aunſwer him, nor to D conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliaſius witneſſeth in theſe wordes, Zenon Eleatean.

Zenon vvas ſubtill ſure, and very eloquent, and craftilie could vvinde a man, by vvaye of argument, if ſo he vvere diſpoſed, his cunning to deſcrie, or ſhovve the ſharpenes of his vvitt, to practiſe pollicie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was moſt familliar and conuerſaunt with him, and dyd put in him the maieſtie and grauity he ſhewed in all his ſayings, and doings, who dyd farre excell the common courſe of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be ſhorte, he it was that dyd facion his manners, altogether to cauſe that graue countenaunce which he dyd. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nûs, as much to ſaye, E as vnderſtanding. Either bicauſe they had his ſingular wit and capacitie in ſuche great admiration, being growen to ſearche out the cauſe of naturall things: or that he was the firſt man, who dyd aſcribe the diſpoſition and gouernment of this world, not vnto fortune or fatall neceſſitie, but vnto a pure, ſimple, and vnderſtanding minde, which doth ſeparate at the firſt mouing cauſe, the ſubſtaunce of ſuche like partes as are meſled and compounded of diuers ſubſtaunces, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruelous vſe of Anaxagoras, who had fully inſtructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of thoſe ſpecially that worke aboue in the ayer and firmament. For he gaue not only to haue a great minde and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or groſſe countrie termes: but to a certen modeſt countenaunce that ſcantly ſmyled, very ſober in his gate, hauing a kynde of Pericles maner and behauiour.

ſounde in his voyce that he neuer loſt nor altered, and was of very honeſt behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that croſſed him, and many other ſuche like things, as all that ſawe them in him, and conſidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the reporte goeth, there was a naughty buſy fellowe on a time, that a whole daye together dyd nothing but rayle vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous wordes he could vſe. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a worde againe, diſpatching in the meane time matters of importaunce he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went ſoftly home to his houſe, ſhewing no alteration nor ſemblaunce of trouble at all, though this lewde varlet followed him at the heeles, with wordes of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne doores, being darke night, he commaunded one of his men to take a torche, and to bring this man home to his houſe. Yet the poet Ion ſayeth, that Pericles was a very prowde man, and a ſtately, and that with his grauity and noble minde, there was mingled a certaine ſcorne and contempt of other: and contrarilie, he greatly prayſeth the ciuillitie, humanitie, and curteſie of Cimon, bicauſe he could facion him ſelfe to all companies. But letting paſſe that which the poet Ion ſayed: who would that vertue ſhould be full of tragicall diſcipline, bringing in with it, a certaine ſatyricall diſcourſe to moue laughture. Nowe Zennon contrariwiſe dyd counſell all thoſe, that ſayd Pericles grauity was a preſumption, and arrogancie: that they ſhould alſo followe him in his preſumption. For, to counterfeate in that ſorte things honeſt and vertuous, doth ſecretly with time breede an affection and deſire to loue them, and afterwardes with cuſtome euen effectually to vſe and followe them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras company, dyd not onely profit him ſelfe in theſe things, but he learned beſides to put awaye all ſuperſtitious feare, of celeſtiall ſignes and impreſſions ſeene in the ayer. For to thoſe that are ignoraunte of the cauſes thereof, ſuche ſights are terrible, and to the godly alſo feareful, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, bicauſe they haue no certaine knowledge of the reaſon that naturall philoſophy yeldeth, which in ſteade of a fearefull ſuperſtition, would bring a true religion accompanied with aſſured hope of goodnes. Some ſaye a man brought Pericles one daye from his farme out of the countrie, a rammes head that had but one horne, and that the prognoſticator Lampon conſidering this head, that had but one ſtrong horne in the middeſt of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the ſignification thereof. That being two tribes and ſeuerall factions in the cittie of Athens touching gouernment, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both ſhould be brought into one, and ſpecially into his parte, in whoſe houſe this ſigne dyd happen. Further, it is ſayed that Anaxagoras being preſent, dyd cauſe the rammes head to be clouen in two peces, and ſhewed vnto them that ſtoode by, that the brayne of this ramme dyd not fill the panne of his naturall place, but incloſed it ſelfe in all partes, being narrowe like the poynte of an egge, in that parte where the horne tooke his firſt roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruelouſly eſteemed at that preſent by all thoſe that ſtoode by: but ſo was Lampon, ſone after that Thucydides was driuen awaye, and that the gouernment of the whole common weale fell into the handes of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall philoſopher and the prognoſticator dyd rightly mete together in trothe: the one directly telling the cauſe, and the other the ende of the euent as it fell out. For the profeſſion of the one, is to knowe howe it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where ſome ſaye, that to ſhewe the cauſe, is to take awaye the ſignification of the ſigne: they do not conſider that in ſeeking to aboliſhe by this reaſon the wonderfull tokens and ſignes in the ayer, they doe take awaye thoſe alſo which are done by arte. As the noyſe of baſons, the lightes of fyre by the ſea ſide, and the ſhadowes of nedles or pointes of dyalles in the ſunne: all which things are done by ſome cauſe and handyworke, to be a ſigne and token of ſome thing. But this argument peraduenture maye ſerue better in another booke. And nowe againe to Pericles. Whileſt he was yet but a young man, the people ſtoode in awe of him, bicauſe he ſomwhat reſembled Piſiſtratus in his countenaunce: and the auncienteſt men of the cittie alſo were muche afeard of this ſofte voyce, his eloquent tongue, and ready vtteraunce, bicauſe

A in thoſe he was Piſiſtratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very riche and wealthy, and of one of the nobleſt families of the cittie, and thoſe were his friendes alſo that caried the only ſwaye and authoritie in the ſtate: whereupon, fearing leaſt they would baniſhe him with the baniſhement of Oſtraciſmon, he would not medle with gouernment in any caſe, although otherwiſe he ſhewed him ſelfe in warres very valliant and forward, and feared not to venter his perſone. But after that Ariſtides was dead, that Themiſtocles was driuen awaye, and that Cimon being euer in ſeruice in the warres as generall in forreine countries, was a long time out of GRECE: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore communaltie, aboue the ſmall number of Nobilitie and riche men, the which was directly againſt his nature. For of him ſelfe he was not popular, nor meanely geuen: but he B dyd it (as it ſhould ſeeme) to auoyde ſuſpition, that he ſhould pretend to make him ſelfe King. And bicauſe he ſawe Cimon was inclined alſo to take parte with the Nobilitie, and that he was ſingularly beloued and liked of all the honeſter ſorte: he to the contrarie enclined to the common people, purchaſing by this meanes ſafety to him ſelfe, and authoritie againſt Cimon. So he preſently beganne a newe courſe of life, ſince he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of ſtate: for they neuer ſawe him afterwardes at any time goe into the cittie, but to the market place, or to the Senate houſe. He gaue vp going to all feaſtes where he was bidden, and left the entertainment of his friendes, their company and familiaritie. So that in all his time wherein he gouerned the common weale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to ſupper to any of his friendes, vnles it were that he was once at a feaſt at his nephew Euryptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremonie was a doing, C when they offer wine to the goddes, and ſo he roſe from the table. For theſe friendly meetings at ſuche feaſtes, doe much abaſe any counterfeate maieſtie or ſet countenaunce: and he ſhall haue much a doe to keepe grauity and reputation, ſhewing familiaritie to euery knowen friende in ſuch open places. For in perfect vertue, thoſe things truely are euer moſt excellent, which be moſt common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto ſtraungers, then their dayely conuerſation is to their friendes. Pericles nowe to preuent that the people ſhould not be glutted with ſeeing him to ofte, nor that they ſhould come much to him: they dyd ſee him but at ſome times, and then he would not talke in euery matter, neither came muche abroade among them, but reſerued him ſelfe (as Critolaus ſayed D they kept the SALAMINIAN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importaunce. And in the meane ſeaſon, in other matters of ſmall moment, he delt by meanes of certaine orators his familliar friendes, amongeſt whom Ephialtes (as they ſaye) was one: he who tooke awaye the authoritie and power from the courte of Areopagus, and dyd geue to muche libertie to the people, as Plato ſayed. Vpon which occaſion, as the Comicall poets ſaye, he became ſo ſtowte and head ſtrong, that they could no more holde him backe, then a younge vnbrideled colte: and tooke ſuch a corage vpon him, that he would obaye no more, but inuaded the Ile of EVBOEA, and ſet vpon the other Ilandes. Pericles alſo bicauſe he would facion a phraſe of ſpeache, with a kynde of ſtyle altogether agreable to the manner of life and grauitie he had taken vpon him: he gaue him ſelfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, E ſhadowing his reaſons of naturall philoſophie, with artificiall rethoricke. For hauing obteined a deepe vnderſtanding by ſtudying of philoſophie, and a ready waye effectually to ende any matter, he vndertoke to proue (beſides that nature had endued him with an excellent witte and capacitie, as the diuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ſerue his purpoſe) he dyd ſo artificially compaſſe it with eloquence, that he farre paſſed all the orators in his time. And for this cauſe was he (as they ſaye) ſurnamed Olympius, as muche to ſaye, as heauenly or diuine. But ſome are of opinion he had that ſurname, by reaſon of the common buildings and ſtately workes he rayſed vp in the cittie of ATHENS, that dyd muche ſet forth the ſame. Other thinke it was geuen him for his great authoritie and power he had in gouernment, aſwell in warres, as in peace. But it is no maruaill that this glorie was F geuen him, conſidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the comedies the Poetes cauſed to be played in thoſe times (in which there were many wordes ſpoken of him, ſome in earneſt, ſome in ſporte and ieaſt) doe witneſſe Ephialtes an orator.

Why Pericles was ſurnamed Olympius.

that he had that ſurname geuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightened in his oration to the people, & that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an aunſwer Thucydides, Mileſius ſonne, ſhould pleaſauntly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended againſt Pericles in matters of the common weale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wreſtled beſt. Thucydides made him aunſwer. When I haue geuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can ſo excellently deny it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perſuadeth them the contrarie of that they ſawe. Notwithſtanding he was euer very graue and wiſe in ſpeaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that nothing might eſcape his mouthe, but that he might conſider before whether it would ſerue the purpoſe of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnles it be ſome fewe lawes he made, and but very fewe of his notable ſayings are brought to light, ſaue only theſe. He ſayed on a time that they muſt take awaye the cittie of ÆGINA, bicauſe it was a ſtrawe lying in the eye of the hauen PIRÆA. And another time, he ſayed that he ſaw the warres a farre of, comming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke ſhippe with Sophocles (his companion in commiſſion with him as generall of the armie) who commended a fayer young boye they met as they came to the hauen: Sophocles, ſayed he, a gouernour muſt not only haue his handes, but alſo his eyes cleane. And Steſimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the prayſe of thoſe that were ſlaine in the warre of SAMOS: he ſayed they were immortall as the goddes. For we doe not ſee the goddes (ſayed he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happines they enioye, we doe coniecture they are immortall: and the ſame things are in thoſe that dye in ſeruice, and defence of their countrie. Nowe where Thucydides doth write the gouernment of the common weale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had apparaunce of a popular ſtate: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, bicauſe one alone dyd rule and gouerne the whole ſtate. And many other ſaye alſo, he was the firſt that brought in the cuſtome to deuide the enemies landes wonne by conqueſt among the people, and of the common money to make the people ſee playes and paſtimes, and that appointed them rewarde for all things. But this cuſtome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing paynefully with ſwet of their browes: became nowe to be very vaine, ſumptuous, and riotous, by reaſon of theſe things brought vp then. The cauſe of the alteration doth eaſely appeare by thoſe things. For Pericles at his firſt comming, ſought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue ſayed before, only to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But comming farre ſhorte of his wealthe and abilitie, to carie out the porte and charge that Cimon dyd, entertaining the poore, keeping open houſe to all commers, clothing poore olde people, breaking open beſides all incloſures and pales through all his landes, that euery one might with more libertie come in, and take the fruites thereof at their pleaſure: and ſeeing him ſelfe by theſe great meanes out gone farre in good will with the common people, by Demonides counſell and procurement (who was borne in the Ile of IOS) he brought in this diſtribution of the common money, as Ariſtotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a ſhorte time the fauour and good will of the common people, by diſtribution of the common treaſure, which he cauſed to be deuided among them, aſwell to haue place to ſee theſe playes, as for that they had rewarde to be preſent at the iudgementes, and by other ſuche like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, dyd inuey againſt the courte of the Areopagites, wherof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happe to be yerely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the ſacrifices, nor maſter of the warres: all which were offices choſen in auncient time by lot. And further, thoſe on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued them ſelues well in their office, they were called forwards, & raiſed to be of the bodie of this courte of the Areopagites. Pericles nowe by theſe meanes hauing obteined great credit and authoritie amongeſt the common people, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in ſuche ſorte, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and

A and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that fauored the LACEDÆMONIANS, and contraried the common wealthe and authoritie of the people. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest persone of all the cittie, and one that had wonne so many glorious victories, and had so replenished ATHENS with the conquered spoyles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: so great was the authoritie of Pericles amongest the people. Nowe the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they called Ostracismon) was limited by the lawe for tenne yeres. In which space the LACEDÆMONIANS being come downe with a great armie into the countrie of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS sent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to shewe the ATHENIANS by his deedes, that they had falsely accused him for fauoring the LACEDÆMONIANS: dyd armie B him self, and went on his country mens side, to fight in the companie of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to departe thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that daye more valliantly then euer he dyd, and he wanne the honour and name to haue done more in the persone of him selfe that daye, then any other of all the armie. At that battell also, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewise to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings, dyed euery man of them that daye. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this battell vpon the confines of the countrie of ATTICA: bicause they feared sharpe warres would come vpon them againe at the next spring. Which thing when Pericles perceyued, he sought also to further that the common people desired: where- C fore he straight caused a decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduised that peace should be made betwene both cities: for the LACEDÆMONIANS dyd loue Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithstanding doe write, that Pericles dyd neuer passe his consent to call him home againe, before suche time as they had made a secret agreement amongest them selues (by meanes of Elpinice Cimons sister) that Cimon should be sent out with an armie of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of PERSIA his dominions, & that Pericles should remaine at home with the authoritie of gouernment within the cittie. This Elpinice (Cimos sister) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at such time as he was accused before the iudge of treason. For Pericles was one of the committees, D to whom this accusation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, & besought him not to doe his worst vnto her brother. Pericles aunswered her merilie. Thou art to old Elpinice, thou art to olde, to goe through with these matters. Yet when his matter came to iudgement, & that his cause was pleaded: he rose but once to speake against him (for his owne discharge as it were) & went his waye when he had sayed, doing lesse hurte to Cimon, then any other of his accusers. How is Idomeneus to be credited nowe, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the orator Ephialtes to be slaine by treason (that was his friende, and dyd alwayes counsell him, and take his parte in all kinde of gouernment of the common weale) only for the ielousie and enuie he dyd beare to his glorie? I can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so slaunderously against Pericles, vnles it were that his melancholy humour procured suche violent E speache: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameles, yet he was euer nobly minded, and had a naturall desire of honour, in which kinde of men such furious cruell passions are seldome seene to breede. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to those that tooke parte with the Nobilitie, bicause he would spare nor pardone no man for any offence whatsoeuer committed against the peoples authoritie, but dyd followe and persecute them with all rigour to the vttermost: his enemies layed waite for him by meanes of one Aristodicus TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the meane time Cimon dyed in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS by sea. Where- F fore those that tooke parte with the Nobilitie, seeing Pericles was nowe growen very great, and that he went before all other cittizens of ATHENS, thincking it good to haue some one to sticke on their side against him, and to lessen thereby somewhat his authoritie, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raised vp against him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a graue wise man, and father in lawe to Cimon. This Thucydides had lesse skill of warres then Cimon, but vnderſtoode more in ciuill gouernment then he, for that he remained moſt parte of his time within the cittie: where continually inuaying againſt Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in ſhorte time he had ſtirred vp a like companie againſt the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer ſorte (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their eſtate and dignitie was abſcured, and troden vnderfoote. Moreouer he dyd ſeparate them from the people, and dyd aſſemble them all as it were into one bodie, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and dyd put (as a man will ſaye) a counterpeaſe into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a litle ſecret grudge only betwene theſe two factions, as an artificiall flower ſet in the blade of a ſworde, which made thoſe ſhewe a litle, that dyd leane vnto the people: and the other alſo ſomwhat that fauored the Nobilitie. But the contention betwene theſe two perſones, was as a deepe cut, which deuided the cittie wholy in two factions: of the which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communaltie. Therefore Pericles geuing yet more libertie vnto the people, dyd all things that might be to pleaſe them, ordeining continuall playes and games in the cittie, many feaſtes, banckers, and open paſtimes to entertaine the commons with ſuche honeſt pleaſures and deuiſes: and beſides all this, he ſent yerely an armie of three ſcore gallyes vnto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore cittizens that tooke paye of the ſtate for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they dyd learne together, and practiſe to be good ſea men. Furthermore he ſent into the countrie of Cherronesvs, a thouſand free men of the cittie to dwell there, and to deuide the landes amongeſt them: fiue hundred alſo into the Ile of Naxos: into the Ile of Andros, two hundred & fiftie: into Thracia, a thouſand to dwell with the Biſaltes: & other alſo into Italie, when the cittie of Sybaris was built againe, which afterwardes was ſurnamed the cittie of the Thvrians. All this he dyd to ryd the cittie of a number of idle people, who through idlenes beganne to be curious, and to deſire chaunge of things, as alſo to prouide for the neceſſitie of the poore townes men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall cittizens of Athens neere vnto their ſubiects and friendes, they ſerued as a garriſon to keepe them vnder, and dyd ſuppreſſe them alſo from attempting any alteration or chaunge. But that which deliteth moſt, and is the greateſt ornament vnto the cittie of Athens, which maketh ſtraungers moſt to wonder, and which alone doth bring ſufficient teſtimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealthe of Greece, to be true and not falſe: are the ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the cittie of Athens. For it is the only acte of all other Pericles dyd, and which made his enemies moſt to ſpight him, and which they moſt accuſed him for, crying out vpon him in all counſailles & aſſemblies: that the people of Athens were openly defamed, for carying awaye the ready money of all Greece, which was left in the Ile of Delos to be ſafely kept there. And although they could with good honeſtie haue excuſed this facte, ſaying that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the ende to laye it vp in a more ſtronger place, where it ſhould be in better ſafetie: yet was this to ouergreat an iniurie offered vnto all the reſt of Greece, and to manifeſt a token of tyrannie alſo, to beholde before their eyes, howe we doe employe the money, which they were inforced to gather for the maintenaunce of the warres againſt the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and ſetting forth our cittie, like a glorious woman, all to be gawded with golde and precious ſtones, and howe we doe make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull & infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrarie, and declared vnto the Athenians that they were not bounde to make any accompt of this money vnto their friendes and allies, conſidering that they fought for their ſafety, & that they kept the barbarous people farre from Greece, without troubling them to ſet out any one man, horſe, or ſhippe of theirs, the money only excepted, which is no more theirs that payed it, then theirs that receyued it, ſo they beſtowe it to that vſe they receyued it for. And their cittie being already very well furniſhed, and prouided of all things neceſſary for the warres, it was good reaſon they ſhould employe and beſtowe the ſurplus of the treaſure in things: which in time to come (and being throughly finiſhed) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he ſayed that whileſt they continue building, they ſhould

A be presently riche, by reason of the diuersitie of workes of all sortes, and other things which they should haue neede of: and to compasse these things the better, and to set them in hande, all manner of artificers and worke men (that would labour) should be set a worke. So should all the townes men, and inhabitants of the cittie, receyue paye and wages of the common treasure: and the cittie by this meanes should be greatly beawtified, and muche more able to mainteine it selfe. For suche as were stronge, and able men of bodie, and of yeres to carie weapon, had paye and entertainment of the common wealthe, which were sent abroade vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes men, and labourers: he would also they should haue parte of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing somwhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie
B the common people with great buildings, and deuises of works of diuers occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the ende that the cittizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and waye to take parte of the common treasure, and enriche them selues, aswell as those that went to the warres, and serued on the sea, or els that laye in garrison to keepe any place or forte. For some gayned by bringing stuffe: as stones, brasse, yuory, gold, ebbany, & cypres. Other got, to worke and facion it: as carpinters, grauers, sownders, casters of images, masons, hewers of stone, dyers, goldsmithes, ioyners working in yuorie, painters, men that set in sundrie cullers of peces of stone or wodde, and turners. Other gayned to bring stuffe, & to furnishe them: as marchaunts, mariners, and shippemasters, for things they brought them by sea. And by lande other got also: as carte makers, cariers, carters, corde makers, sadlers, collermakers, C & pyoners to make wayes plaine, & miners, & such like. Furthermore, euery science and crafte, as a captaine hauing souldiers, had also their armie of the worke men that serued them, labouring truely for their liuing, who serued as prētises & iorney men vnder the worke-masters: so the worke by this meanes dyd disperse abroade a common gayne to all sortes of people and ages, what occupation or trade soeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnes & sumptuousnes, being of excellent workemanshippe, & for grace & beawtie not comparable: bicause euery workeman in his science dyd striue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in sight, and to be most workemanly done in showe. But the greatest thing to be woundred at, was their speede and diligence. For where euery man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many mens liues and ages, &
D from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one only gouernour continued still in credit and authoritie. And yet they saye, that in the same time, as one Agatarchus boasted him self, that he had quickly painted certen beastes: Zeuxis another painter hearing him, aunswered. And I contrarilie doe reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For cōmonly slight and sodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe cullers, nor geue perfect beawty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the cullers to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes Pericles made, are more wonderfull: bicause they were perfectly made in so shorte a time, and haue cōtinued so long a season. For euery one of those which were finished vp at that time, seemed then to be very auncient touching the beawtie thereof: and yet for the grace & continuance E of the same, it looketh at this daye as if it were but newly done and finished, there is suche a certaine kynde of florishing freshnes in it, which letteth that the iniurie of time cannot impaire the sight thereof: As if euery one of those foresaid workes, had some liuing spirite in it, to make it seeme young and freshe: and a soule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chief surueyour generall of all these workes, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent worke masters in euery science & occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would saye, the temple of the virgine, and is surnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery waye) was built by Ictinus, and Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleusin (where the secret ceremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corebus, who raised vp the first pillers in order, standing beneath F on the ground, and dyd set them vp vnto the master chaptrells. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of XYPETA, turned the arches ouer, and then dyd set the pillers in order also which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of CHOLARGA, was he that made the lanterne or toppe of the ſteeple which couereth the ſanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles him ſelfe geue order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to ſee how ſlowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, ſaying:

Pericles long a goe, dyd ende this vvorke begonne:
and build it highe, vvith glorious vvordes, if ſo it had bene done.
But as for deedes (in dede) he built nothing at all, but let it ſtande: as yet it ſtands, much liker for to fall.

The Odeon. And as for the Theater or place appointed for muſicke, where they heare all muſicians playe, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuers ſeates & degrees, and many ranges of pillers, but the toppe of the roofe is altogether rounde, which is ſomwhat hanging downeward round about of it ſelfe, comming together into one pointe. And it is ſayed that this was made after the patterne and facion of king Xerxes royall pauilion, and that Pericles was the firſt deuiſer and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the THRACIANS, doth playe very pretily vpon him, ſaying:

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter ſurnamed, (and onyons hed) vvhich hath in his great noddell finely framed,
The plot of Odeon, vvhen he deliuered vvas from banishment, and daungers deepe, vvherein he long dyd paſſe.

Pericles was the firſt that made maruelous earneſt labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the daye of the feaſt called Panathenæa, they would ſet vp games for muſicke. And he him ſelfe being choſen ruler of theſe games, as iudge to reward the beſt deſeruer: ordained the manner the muſitians ſhould euer after keepe in their ſinging, playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other inſtruments of muſicke. So the firſt games that euer were for muſicke, were kept within the Odeon: and ſo were the other after them alſo, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the caſtell was made and finiſhed within the ſpace of fiue yeres, vnder the charge of Mneſicles, that was maſter of the workes. And whileſt theſe gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chaunce, which declared very well that the goddeſſe Minerua dyd not miſlike the building, but that it pleaſed her maruelouſly. For one of the moſt painefulleſt workemen that wrought there, fell by miſchaunce from the height of the caſtell to the grounde, which fall dyd ſo ſore brooſe him, and he was ſo ſicke with all, that the phiſitians and ſurgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very ſorie for his miſchaunce, the goddeſſe appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he dyd eaſely heale the poore brooſed man, & that in ſhorte time. And this was the occaſion why he cauſed the image of the goddeſſe Minerua (otherwiſe called of healthe) to be caſt in braſſe, and ſet vp within the temple of the caſtell, neere vnto the altar which was there before, as they ſaye. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the baſe: Who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reaſon of the good will Pericles bare him, he commaunded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill ſpoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receyued the gentlewomen of the cittie into his houſe, vnder culler to goe ſee his workes, and dyd conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Comicall poets taking occaſion, dyd caſt out many ſlaunderous ſpeaches againſt Pericles, accuſing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenante in the warres: and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends alſo, brought vp fowle, and ſpecially peacoks, which he ſecretly ſent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we muſt not wonder at theſe Satyres, that make profeſſion to ſpeake ſlaunderouſly againſt all the worlde, as it were to ſacrifice the iniuries and wronges they caſt vpon honorable and good men, to the ſpight and enuie of the people, as vnto wicked ſpirites: conſidering that Steſimbrotus THASIAN durſt falſely accuſe Pericles of deteſtable inceſt, and of abuſing his owne ſonnes wife. And this is the reaſon, in my opinion, why it is ſo hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the trothe of auncient things, by the monuments of hiſtoriographers: conſidering long proceſſe of time, doth vtterly obſcure the trothe of matters, done in former times.

Pericles erected games for muſicke.

For euery written hiſtorie ſpeaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention: ſomtime for hate and enuie, ſomtime for fauour or flatterie, doth diſguiſe and corrupt the troſhe. But Pericles perceyuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations dyd ſtill crie out vpon him, that he dyd vainely waſte and conſume the common treaſure, and that he beſtowed vpon the workes, all the whole reuenue of the cittie: one daye when the people were aſſembled together, before them all he asked them, if they thought that the coſte beſtowed were to muche. The people aunſwered him: a great deale to muche. Well, ſaid he then, the charges ſhalbe mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Pericles had ſayed ſo, the people cried out alowde, they would none of that (either bi-

But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, & putting it to an aduēture which of them ſhould baniſhe other, with the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and baniſhed Thucydides out of the cittie, & therewithall alſo ouerthrewe the contrarie faction againſt him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the cittie againe to vnitie & concorde, he founde then the whole power of ATHENS in his handes, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his diſpoſing. And hauing all the treaſure, armour, gallyes, the Iles, and the ſea, and a marueious ſeigniorie and Kingdome (that dyd enlarge it ſelfe partely ouer the GREGIANS, and

Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernment which he vſed vntill that time, as to delicate & to effeminate an harmonie of muſike, and dyd conuert it vnto an imperious gouernment, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held ſtill a direct courſe, and kept him ſelf euer vpright without fault, as one that dyd, ſayed, and counſelled that, which was moſt expedient for the common weale. He many times brought on the people by perſuaſions and reaſons, to

D be willing to graunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times alſo, he draue them to it by force, & made them againſt their willes doe that, which was beſt for them. Following therein the deuiſe of a wiſe phiſitian: who in a long and chaungeable diſeaſe, doth graunt his pacient ſomtime to take his pleaſure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate ſorte: and another time alſo he doth geue him a ſharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioye ſo great an empire: many times misfortunes doe chaunce, that fill them full of ſundrie paſſions, the which Pericles alone could finely ſteere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with the one, the fierce & inſolent raſhenes of the common people in proſperitie, and with the other comforting their grief and diſcoragement in aduerſitie. Wherein he manifeſtly proued,

E that rethorike and eloquence (as Plato ſayeth) is an arte which quickeneth mens ſpirites at her pleaſure, and her chiefeſt skill is, to knowe howe to moue paſſions and affections throughly, which are as ſtoppes and ſoundes of the ſoule, that would be played vpon with a fine fingered hande of a conning maſter. All which, not the force of his eloquence only brought to paſſe, as Thucydides witneſſeth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthines, bicauſe he would not any waye be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetouſnes in him. F of a grote in ſiluer. And yet the hiſtoriographer Thucydides doth ſet forth plainely enough, the greatnes of his power. And the Comicall poets alſo of that time doe reporte it maliciouſly vnder couert words, calling his familiar friends, the newe Piſiſtratides: ſaying, howe they muſt make him sweare and protest he would neuer be King, geuing vs thereby to vnderstand, that his authoritie was to exceeding great for a popular gouernment. And Teleclides (amongest other) sayeth that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the townes & cities vnder their obedience, and the townes them selues, to binde the one, and to lose the other, & to pull downe their walles, or to build them againe at his pleasure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treasure, & authoritie, and all their goodes, wholy into his handes. But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that should continue for a time: but this helde out fortie yeres together, he being allwayes the chief of his cittie amõgest the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, & the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed against Thucydides, & had banished him: he yet remained chief aboue all other, the space of fifteene yeres. Thus hauing atteined a regall dignitie to cõmaunde all, which continued as aforesaid, where no other captaines authoritie endured but one yere: he euer kept him selfe vpright from bribes and money, though otherwise he was no ill husband, and could warely looke to his owne. As for his landes and goodes left him by his parents, that they miscaried not by negligẽce, nor that they should trouble him much, in busying him self to reduce them to a value: he dyd so husband them, as he thought was his best and easiest waye. For he solde in grosse euer the whole yeres profit and commoditie of his landes, and afterwardes sent to the market daylie to buye the cates, and other ordinarie prouision of housholde. This dyd not like his sonnes that were men growen, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberall in his house, for they complained of his ouerhard and straight ordinarie, bicause in so noble and great a house as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receyued into the house, ranne vnder accompt, & were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandrie of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, Steward of his house, a man very honest and skillfull in ordering his housholde prouision: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowen. But these things were farre contrarie to Anaxagoras wisedome. For he despising the world, and casting his affection on heauenly things: dyd willingly forsake his house, and suffered all his lande to ronne to layes and to pasture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuersitie betwene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuill life. For the one employeth all his time vpon the speculation of good and honest things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no neede of any exteriour helpe or instrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit & benefit of men: he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an instrument not only necessarie, but also honest. As, looke vpon the example of Pericles: who dyd relieue many poore people. And Anaxagoras specially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of state at that time, hauing no leysure to thinke vpon Anaxagoras, he seeing him selfe old & forsaken of the world, layed him downe, and couered his head close, determining to starue him selfe to death with hunger. Pericles vnderstanding this, ranne presently to him as a man halfe cast awaye, and prayed him as earnestly as he could, that he would dispose him selfe to liue, being not only sorie for him, but for him selfe also, that he should lose so faithfull and wise a counseller, in matters of state and gouernment. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and tolde him: O Pericles, those that will see by the light of a lampe, must put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now beganne the LACEDÆMONIANS to growe iealous, of the greatnes of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hartes greater, and to drawe their mindes to great enterprises: set downe an order they should send ambassadours, to persuade all the GRECIANS (in what part soeuer they dwelt in EVROPE, or ASIA, aswell the litle as the great cities) to send their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the generall assembly that should be holden there, to take order for the temples of the goddes which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the sacrifices they had vowed for the preseruation of GRECE, when they gaue battell vpon them: and touching sea matters also, that euery man might sayle in safetie where he would, & that all might liue together in good peace & loue, one with another. To performe this commission, twenty persones were sent of this embasiate, euery one of them being fiftie yeres of age and vpward. Whereof fiue of them went to the DORIANS, dwelling in ASIA, and to the inhabitants of the Iles,

A Iles, euen vnto the Iles of Lesbos, & of the Rhodes. Fiue other went through all the country of Hellespont, and of Thracia, vnto the cittie of Bizantivm. Other fiue were cõmaunded to goe into Boeotia, into Phocides, and through all Peloponnesvs, & from thence by the countrie of the Locrians, into the vplande countrie adioyning to it, vntill they came into the country of Acarnania, & of Amphacia. And the other fiue went first into the Ile of Evboea, and from thence vnto the Oetaeians, and through all the gulfe of Malea, vnto the Phtiotes, vnto the Achaians, and the Thessalians: declaring to all the people where they came, the Athenians commission, perſuading them to ſend vnto Athens, and to be preſent at the councell which ſhould be holden there, for the pacification & vnion of all Greece. But when all came to all, nothing was done, & the ſayed cities
B of Greece dyd not aſſemble, by practiſe of the Lacedæmonians (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the firſt refuſall that was made of their ſummons, was at Peloponnesvs. This haue I written to make Pericles noble corage to be knowen, and howe profounde a wiſe man he ſhewed him ſelfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was choſen generall in the warres, he was much eſteemed, bicauſe he euer tooke great regarde to the ſafetie of his ſouldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he ſawe might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing daungerous: and moreouer, he neuer prayſed them for good generalls, neither would he followe them that had obteined great victories by hazard, howſoeuer other dyd eſteeme or cõmend them. For he was wont to ſaye, that if none but him ſelf dyd leade them to the ſhambles, as much as laye in him, they ſhould be immortall. And when C he ſawe Tolmides, the ſonne of Tolmæus (truſting to his former victories, and the praiſe & commendation of his good ſeruice) dyd prepare vpon no occaſion, and to no purpoſe, to enter into the countrie of Boeotia, & had procured alſo a thouſand of the luſtieſt & moſt valliant men of the cittie, to be contented to goe with him in that iorney, ouer and aboue the reſt of the armie he had leauied: he went about to turne him from his purpoſe, and to keepe him at home, by many perſuaſions he vſed to him before the peoples face, and ſpake certen wordes at that time, that were remembred long after, and theſe they were. That if he would not beleeue Pericles counſell, yet that he would tarie time at the leaſt, which is the wiſeſt counſeller of men. Theſe wordes were pretilie liked at that preſent time. But with in fewe dayes after, when newes was brought that Tolmides ſelfe was ſlaine in a battell he had loſt, neere vnto the D cittie of Coronea, wherein periſhed alſo, many other honeſt & valliant men of Athens: his wordes ſpoken before, dyd then greatly increaſe Pericles reputation & good will with the common people, bicauſe he was taken for a wiſe man, and one that loued his cittizens. But of all his iorneis he made, being generall ouer the armie of the Athenians: the iorney of Cherronesvs was beſt thought of and eſteemed, bicauſe it fell out to the great benefit and preſeruation of all the Grecians inhabiting in that coũtrie. For beſides that he brought thither a thouſand cittizens of Athens to dwell there (in which doing he ſtrengthened the cities with ſo many good men) he dyd fortifie the barre alſo, which dyd let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drue from one ſea to another: ſo that he defended the countrie againſt all the inuaſiõs and piracies of the Thracians inhabiting thereabouts, & deliuered it
E of extreme warre, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongeſt them, who only liued vpon piracie, and robbing on the ſeas. So was he likewiſe much honored & eſteemed of ſtraungers, when he dyd enuironne all Peloponnesvs, departing out of the hauen of Pegis, on the coaſt of Megara, with a fleete of a hũdred gallyes. For he dyd not only ſpoyle the townes all alõgeſt the ſea ſide, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the mayne lande, farre from the ſea, with his ſouldiers he had in the gallyes, he draue ſome of them to retire within their walles, he made them ſo affrayed of him: and in the countrie of Nemea, he ouercame the Sicyonians in battell, that taried him in the field, and dyd erect a piller for a notable marke of his victorie. And imbarking in his ſhippes, a newe ſupply of ſouldiers which he tooke vp in Achaia, being friends F with the Athenians at that time: he paſſed ouer to the firme lande that laye directly againſt it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuer of Achelous, he inuided the countrie of Acarnania, where he ſhut vp the Oeneades within their walles. And after he had layed waſte and deſtroyed all the champion countrie, he returned home againe to Athens: A hauing ſhewed him ſelfe in this iorney, a dreadfull captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the ſafety of his ſouldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iorney (by chaunce or otherwiſe) vnto the ſouldiers vnder his charge. And afterwardes, going with a great nauie marueleus well appointed vnto the realme of Pontvs, he dyd there gently vſe and intreate the citties of Greece, and graunted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the ſame alſo, to know the great force & power of the Athenians, who ſailed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coaſtes of the ſea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the Sinopians thirteene gallyes, with certen number of ſouldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them againſt the tyranne Timeſileus: who being expulſed, and driuen a- B waye, with thoſe of his faction, Pericles cauſed proclamation to be made at Athens, that ſixe hundred free men of the cittie, that had any deſire to goe, without cõpulſion, might goe dwell at Sinopa, where they ſhould haue deuided among them, the goodes & landes of the tyranne & his followers. But he dyd not followe the fooliſhe vaine humours of his cittizens, nor would not yeld to their vnſatiable couetouſnes, who being ſet on a iolitie to ſee them ſelues ſo ſtrõg, and of ſuche a power, and beſides, to haue good lucke, would needes once againe attempt to conquer Egypt, and to reuolte all the countries vpon the ſea coaſtes, from the empire of the king of Persia: for there were many of them whoſe mindes were marueloufly bent to attẽpt the vnfortunate enterpriſe of entering Sicilia, which Alcibiades afterwardes dyd muche pricke forward. And ſome of them dreamed beſides, of the conqueſt of Thvscan, & the em- C pire of Carthage. But this was not altogether without ſome likelyhood, nor without occa-ſion of hope, conſidering the large boundes of their Kingdome, & the fortunate eſtate of their affayres, which fell out according to their owne deſire. But Pericles dyd hinder this going out, and cut of altogether their curious deſire, employing the moſt parte of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: iudging it no ſmall matter to keepe downe the Lacedæmonians from growing greater. For he was allwayes an enemie to the Lacedæmonians, as he ſhewed him ſelfe in many things, but ſpecially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the Lacedæmonians hauing put the Phocians from the charge of the tẽ-ple of Apollo, in the cittie of Delphes, which they had vſurped, & hauing reſtored the Del-phians againe vnto the ſame: ſo ſone as they were gone thence, Pericles went alſo with ano- D ther armie, & reſtored the Phocians in again. And where as the Lacedæmonians had cauſed to be grauen in the forehead of a woulfe of braſſe, the priuiledge the Delphians had graunted them, to be the firſt that ſhould make their demaundes of the oracle; he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the Phocians, made his image alſo to be grauen on the right ſide of the ſame image, of the braſen woulfe. Nowe howe wiſely Pericles dyd gouerne Greece by the power of the Athenians, his deedes doe plainely ſhewe. For firſt of all, the countrie of Evboea dyd rebell, againſt whõ he brought the armie of the Athenians. And ſodaine-ly in the necke of that, came newes from another coaſte, that the Megarians alſo were in armes againſt them: and howe that they were already entered into the countrie of Attica with a great armie, led by Pliſtonax, king of Lacedæmon. This occaſion drewe him home- E ward againe, and ſo he marched backe with ſpeede into his countrie, to make preparation to encoũter his enemies, that were already entered into the territories of Attica. He durſt not offer them battell, being ſo great a number of valliant ſouldiers: but hearing that king Pliſtonax was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counſell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counſell & direct him) he ſought priuilie to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had wonne him ſone with his money, he perſuaded him to drawe backe the Peloponnesians out of their countrie of Attica: and ſo he dyd. But when the Lacedæmonians ſawe their armie caſſed, & that the people were gone their waye, euery man to his owne cittie or towne: they were ſo mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great ſome. The King being vnable to aunſwer his fine, which was ſo extreme great: he was F driuen to abſent him ſelf from Lacedæmon. Cleandrides on the other ſide, if he had not fled in time, euen for ſpight had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that

A that afterwards ouercame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it seemed nature bred couetousnes, as a disease in the table by succession from father to the sonne. For he being shamefully conuicted also, for certen vile partes he had played, was likewise banished from SPARTA: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. And Pericles deliuering vp the accõpt of his charge, and setting downe an article of the expense of tenne talentes he had employed, or should employe in needefull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking question how, nor which waye, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certen writers (amõg whom the philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write that Pericles sent yerely vnto SPARTA tenne talets, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, bicause they should make no warres with them: not to buye peace of them, but time, that B he might in the meane season, with better commoditie, and that leysure, prouide to mainteine the warres. After that, as the armie of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the countrie of ATTICA, he returned again against the rebels, & passed into the Ile of EVBOEA with fiftie sayle, & fiue thousand footemen well armed: & there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes against him, and draue away the Hyppobates, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valliantnes. He draue awaye also all the HESTIAEANS, whom he chased cleane out of all the countrie, and placed in their cittie, only the cittizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he delt so rigorously with them was, bicause they hauing taken a galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betwene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMO- C NIANS for thirtie yeres: he proclaimed open warres against those of the Ile of SAMOS, burdening them, that they being cõmaunded by the ATHENIANS, to pacifie the quarrells which they had against the MILESIANS, they would not obaye. But bicause some hold opinion, that he tooke vpon him this warre against SAMOS, for the loue of Aspasia: it shall be no great digression of our storie, to tell you by the waye, what manner of woman she was, & what a marueluous gifte and power she had, that she could entangle with her loue the chiefest rulers and gouernours at that time of the common weale, and that the philosophers them selues dyd so largely speake & write of her. First of all, it is certaine that she was borne in the cittie of MILETVM, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: she following the steppes and example of an olde curtisan of IONIA, called Thargelia, gaue her selfe only to entertaine the greatest per- D sones & chiefest rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing fayer, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a sharpe wit and pleasaunt tongue: she had the acquaintaunce and friendshippe of the greatest persones of all GREECE, and wanne all those that dyd haunte her company to be at the king of Persiaes commaundement. So that she sowed through all the citties of GREECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the greatest men of power & authoritie of euerie cittie that were acquainted with her. But as for Aspasia, some saye that Pericles resorted vnto her, bicause she was a wise woman, and had great vnderstanding in matters of state and gouernment. For Socrates him selfe went to see her somtimes with his friends: and those that vsed her company also, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine about her were to entertaine such as would warme E them by their fire. Æschines writeth, that Lysicles a grasier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chief man of ATHENS, by frequenting the companie of Aspasia, after the death of Pericles. And in Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasauntly written, yet in that, this storie is written truely: that this Aspasia was repaired vnto by diuers of the ATHENIANS, to learne the arte of rethorike of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles dyd beare her, grewe rather of loue, then of any other cause. For he was maried vnto a kinswoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom she had Callias, surnamed the riche: & had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her companie, he gaue her with her owne good will and consent vnto another, and maried Aspasia whom he dearely lo- F ued. For euer when he went abroad, & came home againe, he saluted her with a kisse. Whereupon in the auncient comedies, she is called in many places, the newe Omphale, and somtimes Deianira, and somtimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainely calleth her whore in these verses:

And it seemeth that he had a bastard for Eupolis in a comedie of his called Demoi, bringeth him in asking Pyronides thus:

Prayé thee is my bastard sonne yet alive?

And then Pyronides answered him

A perfect man long since, he surely had bene founde, if that this dame, and naughty vvhore his vertue had not drovvned.

To conclude, this Aspasia was so famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aspasia his best beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milta, and was borne in PHOCIDES, being Hermotimus daughter. And Cyrus being slayne in the field, Aspasia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwardes she was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this storie came in my minde and me thought I should haue delt hardly, if I should haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres against the SAMIANS, on the behalfe of the MILESIANS, at the request of Aspasia: for these two cities were at warres together, for the cittie of PRIENA, but the SAMIANS were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANS commaunded them to laye a side their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refused it vtterly. Wherefore Pericles went thither & tooke awaye the gouernment of the small number of Nobilitie, taking for ostages, fiftie of the chiefest men of the cittie, and so many children besides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some saye euery one of these ostages offered to geue him a talent: and besides those, many other offered him the like, suche as would not haue the soueraine authoritie put into the handes of the people. Moreouer Pissuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the good will he bare those of SAMOS, dyd send Pericles tenne thousand crownes to release the ostages. But Pericles neuer tooke pennie: and hauing done that he determined at SAMOS, and established a popular gouernment, he returned againe to ATHENS. Notwithstanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their ostages againe by meanes of this Pissuthnes that stale them awaye, and dyd furnishe them also with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning against them once more, he founde them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but resolutely determined to receyue him, and to fight for the seigniorie by sea. So there was a great battell fought betwene them, neere the Ile of TRACIA. And Pericles wanne the battell: hauing with foure and fortie sayle only nobly ouercome his enemies, which were three score & tenne in number, wherof twenty of them were shippes of warre. And so following his victorie forthwith, he wanne also the porte of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANS besieged within their owne cittie: where they were yet so bolde, as they would make salies out many times, and fight before the walles of the cittie. But when there arriued a newe supplie of shippes bringing a greater ayde vnto Pericles: then were they shut vp of all sides. Pericles then taking three score gallyes with him, lanched out into the sea, with intent (as some saye) to goe mete certen shippes of the PHOENICIANS (that came to ayde the SAMIANS) as farre from SAMOS as he could: or as Stesimbrotus sayeth, to goe into CYPRVS, which me thinketh is not true. But whatsoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Melissus (the sonne of Ithagenes, a great philosopher) being at that time generall of the SAMIANS: perceyuing that fewe shippes were left behinde at the siege of the cittie, and that the captaines also that had the charge of them were no very expert men of warre, persuaded his cittizens to make a salye vpon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken prisoners, and they suncke many of their shippes. Nowe they being lordes againe of the sea, dyd furnishe their cittie with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth that Pericles selfe was once ouercome in a battell by sea by Melissus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be euen with the ATHENIANS for the iniurie they had receyued of them before: dyd brande them in the forehead with the stampe of an owle, the owle being then the stampe of their coyne at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN prisoners before with the stape

A of Samena. This Samena is a kynde of a ſhippe amongeſt the SAMIANS, lowe afore, and well layed out in the midde ſhippe, ſo that it is excellent good to riſe with the waues of the ſea, and is very ſwifte vnder ſayle: and it was ſo called, bicauſe the firſt ſhippe that was made of this facion, was made in the Ile of SAMOS, by the tyranne Polycrates. It is ſayed that the poet Ariſtophanes, couertly conueying the ſtampe of the SAMIANS, ſpeaking merylie in a place of his comedies ſayeth: Samena a kinde of a ſhippe.

The Samians are great learned men.

The wittie ſaying of Ariſtophanes of the Samians.

Pericles being aduertiſed of the ouerthrowe of his armie, returned preſently to the reſcue. Meliſſus went to mete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowen, and driuen backe into his cittie, where Pericles walled them in round about the cittie, deſiring victorie rather by B time and charge, then by daunger, and loſſe of his ſouldiers. But when he ſawe that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withholde them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to drawe lots, and that companie that lighted on the white beane, they ſhould be quiet & make good cheere, while the other ſeuen fought. And they ſaye that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheere, & taken pleaſure abroade, they doe yet call it a white daye, bicauſe of the white beane. Ephorus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was there, where firſt of all they beganne to vſe engines of warre to plucke down great walles, and that Pericles vſed firſt this wonderfull inuention: & that Artemon an enginer was the firſt deuiſer of them. He was caried vp and downe in a chayer, to ſet forward theſe workes, bicauſe he had a lame
C legge: and for this cauſe he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verſes of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeres before this warre of SAMOS beganne: & ſayeth that this Periphoretos was a maruelous tender man, and ſo fooliſhly afeard of his owne ſhadowe, that the moſt parte of his time he ſturred not out of his houſe, & dyd ſit allwayes hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare leaſt any thing ſhould fall vpon him. And if vpon any occaſion he were driuen, to goe abroade out of his houſe: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neere the grounde, & for this cauſe he was ſurnamed Periphoretos. At the laſt, at nine moneths ende the SAMIANS were compelled to yeld. So Pericles tooke the cittie, & raſed their walles to the grounde: he brought their ſhippes awaye, and made them paye a maruelous great tribute, D whereof parte he receyued in hande, & the reſt payable at a certen time, taking ſtages with him for aſſurance of payment. But Duris the SAMIAN dilateth theſe matters maruelous pittifully, burdening the ATHENIANS, and Pericles ſelf with vnnaturall crueltie: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariſtotle him ſelfe maketh mention. And ſuer I cannot beleeue it is true that is writtē. That he brought the captaines of the gallyes, & the ſouldiers themſelues of SAMIA, into the market place of the cittie of MILETVM: where he made them to be bound faſt vnto bordes for the ſpace of tenne dayes, & at the ende of the ſame, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads paſſhed in peces: and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, & would not burie them. So Duris being accuſtomed to ouerreach, & to lye many times in things nothing touching him: ſeemeth in this place out of E all reaſon to aggrauate the calamities of his countrie, only to accuſe the ATHENIANS, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing wōne the cittie of SAMOS, he returned againe to ATHENS, where he dyd honorably burie the bones of his ſlaine cittizens in this warre: and him ſelf (according to their manner & cuſtome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruelouſly eſteemed. In ſuche ſorte, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration: the ladies & gentlewomen of the cittie came to ſalute him, & brought him garlāds to put vpon his head, as they doe to noble cōquerers when they returne from games, where they haue wonne the price. But Elpinicé coming to him, ſayed. Surely Pericles, thy good ſeruice done, deſerueth garlands of triumphe: for thou haſt loſt vs many a good and valliant cittizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANS, and with the barbarous people as F my brother Cimon dyd, but for deſtroying a cittie of our owne nation and kynred. Pericles to theſe wordes, ſoftely aunſwered Elpinicé, with Archilochus verſe, ſmyling: Elpinicé.

When thou art olde, painte not thy ſelfe. Pericles taunts to an olde woman.

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and ſtoode muche in his owne conceipt, after he had ſubdued the SAMIANS, ſaying: Agamemnon was tenne yeres taking of a cittie of the barbarous people: and he in nine moneths only had wonne the ſtrongeſt cittie of the whole nation of IONIA. In deede he had good cauſe to glorie in his victorie: for truely (if Thucydides reporte be true) his conqueſt was no leſſe doubtfull, then he founde it daungerous. For the SAMIANS had almoſt bene lordes of the ſea, and taken the ſeigniorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the warres of PELOPONNESVS being whotte againe, the CORINTHIANS inuading thilanders of CORPHV: Pericles dyd perſuade the ATHENIANS to ſend ayde vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which was of great power by ſea, ſaying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would haue warre with them. The ATHENIANS conſented to his motion, to ayde thoſe of CORPHV. Whereupon they ſent thither Lacedæmonius (Cimons ſonne) with tenne gallyes only for a mockery: for all Cimons familie and friendes, were wholy at the LACEDÆMONIANS deuotion. Therefore dyd Pericles cauſe Lacedæmonius to haue ſo fewe ſhippes deliuered him, and further, ſent him thither againſt his will, to the ende that if he dyd no notable exploite in this ſeruice, that they might then the more iuſtly ſuſpect his good will to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Moreouer whileſt he liued, he dyd euer what he could, to keepe Cimons children backe from ryſing: bicauſe that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but ſtraungers. For the one was called Lacedæmonius, the other Theſſalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three, was an ARCADIAN woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he ſent but tenne gallyes only, which was but a ſléder ayde for thoſe that had requeſted them, and a great matter to them that ſpake ill of him: he ſent thither afterwardes a great number of other gallyes, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were maruelous angrie, and went & complained to the counſell of the LACEDÆMONIANS, where they layed open many grieuous complaints and accuſations againſt the ATHENIANS, and ſo dyd the MEGARIANS alſo: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauens, their ſtaples, and all trafficke of marchaundiſe in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly againſt the common lawes, and articles of peace, agreed vpon by othe among all the GRECIANS. Moreouer the ÆGINETES finding them ſelues very ill and cruelly handled, dyd ſend ſecretly to make their mone & complaintes to the LACEDÆMONIANS, being afeard openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While theſe things were a doing, the cittie of POTIDÆA, ſubiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in olde time by the CORINTHIANS) dyd rebell, and was beſieged by the ATHENIANS, which dyd haſten on the warres. Notwithſtanding this, ambaſſadours were firſt ſent vnto ATHENS vpon theſe complaints, & Archidamus, king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, dyd all that he could to pacifie the moſt parte of theſe quarrells and complaints, intreating their friendes and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no warres at all, for any other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would haue graunted to haue reuoked the decree they had made againſt the MEGARIANS. Whereupon, Pericles, that aboue all other ſtood moſt againſt the reuocation of that decree, & that dyd ſturre vp the people, & made thē to ſtand to that they had once decreed, & ordered, againſt the MEGARIANS: was thought the only original cauſe & author of the PELOPONNESIAN warres. For it is ſayed that the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent ambaſſadours vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pericles alledged a lawe, that dyd forbid them to take away the table, whereupon before time had bene written any cōmon law or edict: Polyarces, one of the LACEDÆMON ambaſſadours, ſayed vnto him. Well, ſaid he, take it not awaye then, but turne the table onely: your lawe I am ſuer forbiddeth not that. This was pleaſauntly ſpoken of the ambaſſadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it ſeemeth he had ſome ſecret occaſion of grudge againſt the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the cōmō cauſe & cloke, he tooke frō them the holy lāds they were breaking vp. For to bring this to paſſe, he made an order, that they ſhould ſend an herauld to ſumnione the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, & that the ſame herauld ſhould goe alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to accuſe the MEGARIANS vnto the. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as alſo it was moſt iuſt & reaſonable: but it fortuned ſo, that the meſſenger they ſent thither dyed

A and not without ſuſpition that the MEGARIANS made him awaye. Wherefore Charinus made a lawe preſently againſt the MEGARIANS: that they ſhould be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And alſo if any MEGARIAN ſhould once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he ſhould ſuffer the paynes of death. And moreouer, that their captaines taking yerely their ordinary othe, ſhould ſweare among other articles, that twiſe in the yere they ſhould goe with their power, and deſtroy ſome parte of the MEGARIANS lande. And laſtly, that the herauld Anthemocritus ſhould be buried by the place called then the gates Thriaſienes, and nowe called, Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS ſtowtely denying, that they were any cauſe of the death of this Anthemocritus: dyd altogether burden Aſpaſia and Pericles with the ſame, alledging for

C But in very deede, to tell the originall cauſe of this warre, and to deliuer the trothe thereof, it is very harde. But all the hiſtoriographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefeſt author of the warre: bicauſe the decree made againſt the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe. Yet ſome holde opinion, that Pericles dyd it of a noble minde and iudgement, to be conſtant in that he thought moſt expedient. For he iudged that this commaundement of the LACEDÆMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would graunte them: and if they yelded to them in that, then they manifeſtly ſhewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarilie ſaye, that it was done of a ſelfe will and arrogancie, to ſhewe his authoritie and power, and howe he dyd deſpiſe the LACEDÆMONIANS. But the ſhrowdeſt proſe of all, that bringeth beſt authoritie with it, is reported after this ſorte. Phidias the image
D maker (as we haue tolde you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friende, was in great eſtimation about him. But that procured him many ill willers. Then they being deſirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles: they intiſed Menon, one of the worke men that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to praye aſſurance of the people that he might openly accuſe Phidias, for a faulte he had committed about Pallas image. The people receyued his obedience, and his accuſation was heard opēly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: bicauſe that Phidias (through Pericles counſell & deuiſe) had from the beginning ſo layed on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken of, & wayed euery whitte. VVhereupō Pericles openly ſayed vnto his accuſers, take of the golde & way it. The glorie of his works dyd pur E chaſe him this enuie. For he hauing grauē vpon the ſcutchiō of the goddeſſe, the battel of the AMAZONES, had cut out the portraiture of him ſelf maruelous liuely, vnder the perſone of an olde balde man, lifting vp a great ſtone with both his handes. Further he had cut out Pericles image, excellētly wrought & artificially, ſeeming in māner to be Pericles ſelf, fighting with an AMAZON in this ſorte. The AMAZONES hād being lifte vp highe, holdeth a darte before Pericles face, ſo paſſing cunningly wrought, as it ſeemed to ſhadowe the likenes & reſemblaunce of Pericles: and yet notwithſtanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles ſelf on either ſide of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in priſone, & there dyed of a ſicknes, or els of poyſon (as ſome ſaye) which his enemies had prepared for him: & all to bring Pericles into further ſuſpition, & to geue them the more cauſe to accuſe him. But howſoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his F freedome, & ſet him free for paymēt of all ſubſidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they ſhould ſee him ſafely kept, and that he tooke no hurte. And about the ſame time alſo Aſpaſia was accuſed, that ſhe dyd not beleeue in the goddes: and her accuſer was Hermippus, maker of the comedies. He burdened her further, that ſhe was a bawde to Pericles, and receyued cittizens wiues into her houſe, which Pericles kept. And Diopithes at the ſame time made a decree, that they ſhould make ſearche and enquirie for hereticks that dyd not beleeue in the goddes, and that taught certaine newe doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the ſuſpition vpon Pericles, bicauſe of Anaxagoras. The people dyd receyue and confirme this inquiſition: and it was moued alſo then by Dracontides, that Pericles ſhould deliuer an accompt of the money he had ſpent, vnto the handes of the Prytanes, who were treaſorers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the iudges deputed to geue iudgement, ſhould geue ſentence within the cittie vpon the altar. But Agnon put that worde out of the decree, and placed in ſtead thereof, that the cauſe ſhould be iudged by the fifteene hundred iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for theſte, for batterie, or for iniuſtice. As for Aſpaſia, he ſaued her, euen for the verie pittie and compaſſion the iudges tooke of him, for the teares he ſhed in making his humble ſute for her, all the time he pleaded her caſe: as Æſchines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not doe ſo muche for him: he ſent him out of the cittie, and him ſelfe dyd accompany him. And furthermore, ſeeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias facte, and for this cauſe fearing the iſſue of the iudgement: he ſet the warres a fyre againe, that allwayes went backeward, and dyd but ſmoke a litle, hoping by this meanes to weare out the accuſations againſt him, and to roote out the malice ſome dyd beare him. For the people hauing waightie matters in hande, and very daungerous alſo: he knewe they would put all into his handes alone, he hauing wonne already ſuche great authoritie and reputation among them. And theſe be the cauſes why he would not (as it is ſayed) ſuffer the ATHENIANS to yeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the trothe cannot certenly be knowen. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could wede out Pericles, and ouerthrowe him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commaunded them they ſhould purge their cittie of Cylons rebellion, bicauſe they knew well enough that Pericles kynne by the mothers ſide were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practiſe fell out contrarie to their hope, and expectation, that were ſent to ATHENS for this purpoſe. For, wening to haue brought Pericles into further ſuſpition and diſpleaſure, the cittizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiaunce in him then before, bicauſe they ſawe his enemies dyd ſo much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before king Archidamus entred with the armie of the PELOPONNESIANS into the countrie of ATTICA, he tolde the ATHENIANS, that if king Archidamus fortuned to waſte and deſtroye all the countrie about, and ſhould ſpare his landes and goodes for the olde loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to geue his enemies occaſion falſely to accuſe him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the landes and tenements he had in the countrie, vnto the common wealthe. So it fortuned, that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a maruelous armie into the countrie of ATTICA, vnder the leading of king Archidamus: who burning & ſpoyling all the countries he came alõgeſt, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, were they incamped, ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS would neuer ſuffer them to approche ſo neere, but that they would giue them battell for the honour and defence of their countrie, and to ſhewe that they were no cowardes. But Pericles wiſely conſidered howe the daunger was to great to hazard battell, where the loſſe of the cittie of ATHENS ſtoode in perill, ſeing they were three ſcore thouſand footemẽ of the PELOPONNESIANS, & of the BOEOTIANS together: for ſo many was their number in the firſt voyage they made againſt the ATHENIANS. And as for thoſe that were very deſirous to fight, and to put them ſelues to any hazard, being mad to ſee their countrie thus waſted and deſtroyed before their eyes, Pericles dyd comforte and pacifie them with theſe wordes. That trees being cut and hewen downe, dyd ſpring againe in ſhorte time: but men being once dead, by no poſſibilitie could be brought againe. Therefore he neuer durſt aſſemble the people in counſell, fearing leaſt he ſhould be inforced by the multitude, to doe ſome thing againſt his will. But as a wiſe man of a ſhippe, when he ſeeth a ſtorme coming on the ſea, doth ſtraight geue order to make all things ſafe in the

A the ſhippe, preparing euery thing readie to defend the ſtorme, according to his arte and skill, not harkening to the paſſengers fearefull cries and pittiefull teares, who thinke them ſelues caſt away: euen ſo dyd Pericles rule all things according to his wiſedome, hauing walled the cittie ſubſtancially about, and ſet good watche in euery corner: and paſſed not for thoſe that were angrie & offended with him, neither would be perſuaded by his friends earneſt requeſts & intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threates nor accuſatiõs againſt him, nor yet reckoned of all their fooliſhe ſcoffing ſonges they ſonge of him in the cittie, to his ſhame and reproche of gouernment, ſaying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for daſtardlines he let the enemies take all, and ſpoyle what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that moſt defamed him, and beganne to enter into ſome prety credit and fauour with the com-B mon people, for that they were angrie, and miſliked with Pericles: as appeareth by theſe ſlaunderous verſes of Hermippus, which were then abroade:

Cleon accuſeth Pericles.

O King of Satyres thou, vvho vvith ſuch manly ſpeache of bloudy vvarres and doughty dedes, doſt daylie to vs preache: VVhy art thou novve afrayed, to take thy launce in hande, or vvith thy pike againſt thy foes, corageouſly to ſtande?
Synce Cleon ſtovvte and fierce, doth daylie thee prouoke, VVith biting vvordes, vvith trenchaunt blades, & deadly davvnting ſtroke.

All theſe notwithſtanding, Pericles was neuer moued any thing, but with ſilence dyd pa-C ciently beare all iniuries and ſcoffings of his enemies, and dyd ſend for all that a nauie of a hundred ſayle vnto PELOPONNESVS, whether he would not goe in perſone, but kept him ſelf at home, to keepe the people in quiet: vntill ſuch time as the enemies had raiſed their campe, and were gone awaye. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angrie at this warre: he comforted the poore people againe, with cauſing a certen diſtribution to be made amongeſt them of the common treaſure, and diuiſion alſo of the landes that were got by conqueſt. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their countrie, he cauſed the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongeſt the cittizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comforte to them in this aduerſitie, to heare of their enemies hurte and loſſe in ſuche manner as it dyd fall out. For their armie that was ſent by ſea vnto PELOPONNESVS, D had waſted and deſtroyed a great parte of the champion countrie there, and had ſacked beſides many ſmall citties and townes. Pericles ſelfe alſo entring into the MEGARIANS countrie by lande, did waſte the whole countrie all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receyuing by ſea aſmuche hurte and loſſe at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by lande vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres ſo long with the ATHENIANS, but would ſone haue geuen ouer (as Pericles had tolde them before) had not the goddes aboue ſecretly hindered mans reaſon and pollicie. For firſt of all there came ſuch a ſore plague among E the ATHENIANS, that it tooke awaye the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole cittie beſides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected with this diſeaſe, their hartes alſo were ſo ſharpely bent againſt Pericles, that the ſicknes hauing troubled their braynes, they fell to flat rebellion againſt him, as the pacient againſt his F phyſitian, or children againſt their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation of his enemies. Who bruted abroade, that the plague came of no cauſe els, but of the great multitude of the coũtry men that came into the cittie on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the harte of the ſommer, where they were compelled to lye many together, ſmothred vp in litle tentes and cabines, remaining there all daye long, cowring downewardes, and doing nothing, where before they liued in the countrie in a freſhe open ayer, and at libertie. And of all this, ſaye they, Pericles is the only cauſe, who procuring this warre, hathe pent and ſhrowded the country men together within the walles of a cittie, employing them to no manner of vſe nor ſeruice, but keeping them like ſheepe in a pinnefolde, maketh one to poyſon another with the infection of their plague ſores ronning vpon them, and geuing them no leaue to chaunge ayer, that they might ſo muche as take breathe abroade. Pericles to remedy this, and to doe their enemies a litle miſchief: armed a hundred and fiftie ſhippes, and ſhipped into them a great number of armed footemen and horſemen alſo. Hereby he put the cittizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, ſeeing ſo great a power. But when he had ſhipped all his men, and was him ſelfe alſo in the admirall ready to hoyſe ſayle: ſodainely there was a great eclypſe of the ſunne, and the daye was very darke, that all the armie was ſtriken with a maruelous feare, as of ſome daungerous and very ill token towardes them. Pericles ſeeing the maſter of his gallye in a maze withall, not knowing what to doe: caſt his cloke ouer the maſters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any hurte or no. The maſter aunſwered him, he thought it none. Then ſayed Pericles againe to him. There is no difference betwene this and that, ſauing that the bodye which maketh the darknes is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes. Theſe things are thus diſputed of in the ſchooles of the philoſophers. But Pericles hoyſing ſayle notwithſtanding, dyd no notable nor ſpeciall ſeruice, aunſwerable to ſo great an armie and preparation. For he laying ſeige vnto the holy cittie of EPIDAVRVM, when euery man looked they ſhould haue taken it, was compelled to rayſe his ſeige for the plague that was ſo vehement: that it dyd not only kill the ATHENIANS them ſelues, but all other alſo (were they neuer ſo fewe) that came to them, or neere their campe. Wherefore perceyuing the ATHENIANS were maruelouſly offended with him, he dyd what he could to comforte them, and put them in harte againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them. For by the moſt parte of voyces, they depriued him of his charge of generall, and condemned him in a maruelous great fine & ſumme of money, the which thoſe that tell the leaſt doe write, that it was the ſumme of fifteene talentes: and thoſe that ſay more, ſpeake of fiftie talentes. The accuſer ſubſcribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias ſaye, or as Theophraſtus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus ſayeth, one Lacratidas. Nowe his common grieues were ſone blowen ouer: for the people dyd eaſely let fall their diſpleaſures towardes him, as the waſpe leaueth her ſtinge behinde her with them ſhe hath ſtong. But his owne priuate affayers and houſehold cauſes were in very ill caſe: both for that the plague had taken awaye many of his friendes and kinſemen from him, as alſo for that he and his houſe had continued a long time in diſgrace. For Xanthippus (Pericles ſonne & heire) being a man of a very ill diſpoſition and nature, and hauing maried a young woman very prodigall and lauiſhe of expence, the daughter of Iſander, ſonne of Epilycus: he grudged much at his fathers hardnes, who ſcantly gaue him money, and but litle at a time. Whereupon he ſent on a time to one of his fathers friendes in Pericles name, to praye him to lend him ſome money, who ſent it vnto him. But afterwardes when he came to demaunde it againe, Pericles dyd not only refuſe to paye it him, but further, he put him in ſute. But this made the young man Xanthippus ſo angrie with his father, that he ſpake very ill of him in euery place where he came: and in mockery reported howe his father ſpent his time when he was at home, and the talke he had with the Sophiſters, and the maſter rethoritians. For a miſchaunce fortuning on a time, at the game of throwing the darte, who ſhould throwe beſt, that he that threwe, dyd vnfortunately kill one Epitimius a THESSALIAN: Xanthippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole daye diſputing with Protagoras the Rethoritian, to knowe which of the three by lawe and reaſon ſhould be condemned for this murther. The darte: he that threwe the darte: or the deuiſer of that game. Moreouer Steſimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne abroade through the cittie, howe Pericles dyd keepe his wife, was ſowen abroade by Xanthippus him ſelfe. But ſo it is, this quarrell & hate betwext the father and the ſonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xanthippus dyed in the great plague, and Pericles owne ſiſter alſo: moreouer he loſt at that time by the plague, the more parte of all his friends and kinſefolkes, and thoſe ſpecially that dyd him greateſt pleaſure in gouerning of the ſtate. But all this dyd neuer pull down his contenaunce, nor any thing abate the greatnes of his minde, what misfortunes ſoeuer he had ſuſteined. Neither ſawe they him weepe at any time, nor mourne at the funeralles of any of his kinſemen or friendes, but at the death of Paralus, his younger and lawfull begotten ſonne: for, the loſſe of him alone dyd only melt his harte. Yet he dyd ſtriue to ſhowe his naturall conſtancie, and to keepe his accuſtomed modeſtie. But as he would haue put a garland of flowers vpon his head, ſorowe dyd ſo pierce his harte when he ſawe his face, that then he burſt out in teares,

A and cryed a mayne: which they neuer ſawe him doe before, all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people hauing proued other captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgement and authoritie ſufficient, for ſo great a charge: In the ende, of them ſelues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counſells, and to the ſtate of a captaine alſo to take charge of the ſtate. But at that time he kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe, as one bewayling his late grieuous loſſe and ſorowe. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familliar friendes, perſuaded him to ſhewe himſelfe vnto the people: who dyd excuſe themſelues vnto him, for their ingratitude towardes him. Pericles then taking the gouernment againe vpon him, the firſt matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to reuoke the ſtatute he had made for baſe borne children, fearing leaſt his lawfull

B heires would fayle, and ſo his houſe and name ſhould fall to the grounde. But as for that lawe, thus it ſtoode. Pericles when he was in his beſt authoritie, cauſed a lawe to be made, that they only ſhould be compted cittizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENIANS borne by father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of EGYPT hauing ſent a gifte vnto the people of ATHENS, of forty thouſand buſhells of corne, to be diſtributed among the cittizens there: many by occaſion of this lawe were accuſed to be baſe borne, and ſpecially men of the baſer ſorte of people, which were not knowen before, or at the leaſt had no reckoning made of them, and ſo ſome of them were falſely and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon ſo it fell out, that there were no leſſe then fiue thouſand of them conuicted and ſolde for ſlaues: and they that remained as free men, and were iudged to be

C naturall cittizens, amownted to the number of fourteene thouſand and fortie perſones. Now this was much miſliked of the people, that a lawe enacted, and that had bene of ſuche force, ſhould by the ſelfe maker and deuiſer of the ſame be againe reuoked and called in. Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his houſe, dyd breake the peoples hardened hartes againſt him. Who thincking theſe ſorowes ſmarte, to be puniſhment enough vnto him for his former pryde, and iudging that by goddes diuine iuſtice and permiſſion, this plague and loſſe fell vpon him, and that his requeſt alſo was tollerable: they ſuffered him to enrolle his baſe borne ſonne in the regiſter of the lawfull cittizens of his familie, geuing him his owne name, Pericles. It is the ſelf ſame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by ſea, neere vnto the Iles ARGINVSES, was put to death by ſentence of the

D people, with the other captaines his companiõs. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not ſo vehemently as other were, rather more temperatly: & by long ſpace of time, with many alterations and chaunges, that dyd by litle and litle decaye, and conſume the ſtrength of his bodie, and ouercame his ſences and noble minde. Therefore Theophraſtus in his moralles declareth, in a place where he diſputeth, whether mens manners doe chaunge with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions doe ſo alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reaſon: that Pericles in this ſicknes ſhewed a friende of his that came to ſee him, I cannot tell what a preſeruing charme the women had tyed (as a carkanet) about his necke, to let him vnderſtand he was very ill, ſince he ſuffered them to apply ſuche a fooliſhe bable to him. In the ende, Pericles drawing faſt vnto his death, the Nobilitie

E of the cittie, and ſuch his friendes as were left aliue, ſtanding about his bed, beganne to ſpeake of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, conſidering the greatnes of his noble actes, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten battells being generall of the ATHENIANS, and had ſet vp ſo many tokens and triumphes in honour of his countrie) they reckoned vp among them ſelues all theſe matters, as if he had not vnderſtoode them, imagining his ſences had bene gone. But he contrarilie being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had ſayed, and thus he beganne to ſpeake vnto them. That he marueled why they had ſo highly prayſed that in him, which was common to many other captaines, and wherein fortune delt with them in equalitie a like, and all this while they had forgotten to ſpeake of the beſt & moſt notable thing that was in him, which

F was: that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occaſion. And ſuer ſo was he a noble and worthie perſone. For he dyd not only ſhewe him ſelfe mercifull and curteous, euen in moſt weightie matters of gouernment, among ſo enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this iudgement alſo to thincke, that the moſt noble actes he dyd were theſe, that he neuer gaue him ſelfe vnto hatred, enuie, nor choller, to be reuenged of his moſt mortall enemie, without mercy ſhewed towardes him, though he had committed vnto him ſuche abſolute power and ſole gouernment among them. And this made his ſurname to be Olympius (as to ſaye, diuine or celeſtiall) which otherwiſe for him had bene to prowde and arrogant a name, bicauſe he was of ſo good and gentle a nature, and for that in ſo great libertie he had kept cleane handes & vndefiled: euen as we eſteeme the goddes authors of all good, and cauſers of no ill, and ſo worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchie of the world. And not as Poets ſaye, which doe confounde our wittes by their follies, and fonde faynings, and are alſo contrarie to them ſelues, conſidering that they call heauen (which conteineth the goddes) the euerlaſting ſeate, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with windes, neither is darkened with clowdes, but is allwayes bright and cleare, and at all times ſhyning equally with a pure bright light, as being the only habitation and manſion place of the eternall God, only happy and immortall. And afterwardes they deſcribe it them ſelues, full of diſſentions, of enmities, of anger and paſſions, which doe nothing become wiſe and learned men. But this diſcourſe peraduenture would be better ſpoken of in ſome other booke. Nowe, the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediatly after Pericles death, made them then lament the loſſe of ſo noble a member. For thoſe who vnpaciently dyd brooke his great authoritie while he liued, bicauſe it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other ſpeakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confeſſe, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercie, then his was. And that moſt hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, dyd then moſt plainely appeare vnto them, to haue bene the manifeſt ramper and bullwarke of the ſafetie of their whole ſtate and common weale: ſuche corruption and vice in gouernment of the ſtate, dyd then ſpring vp immediatly after his death, which when he was aliue, he dyd euer ſuppreſſe and keepe vnder in ſuche ſorte, that either it dyd not appeare at all, or at the leaſt it came not to that hed and libertie, that ſuche faultes were committed, as were vnpoſſible to be remedied.

HAVING already declared vnto you ſuch things worthy memorie as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is nowe good time we ſhould proceede to write alſo of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is ſayed the firſt Fabius, from whom the houſe and familie of the Fabians dyd deſcend (being the greateſt & nobleſt houſe of all other in Rome) was begotten by Hercules, whom he gatte of a Nymphe (or as other ſaye, a woman of the coūtrie) by the riuer of Tyber. And ſome ſaye, that the firſt of this houſe, were called at the beginning Fodiani, bicauſe they dyd hunte wilde beaſtes, with pittefalles and ditches: For vnto this preſent the Romaines call ditches, Foſſæ: and to digge Fodere. Since that time, the two ſecond letters haue bene chaunged, and they haue called them Fabians. But howſoeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that houſe: and among other, there was one of that houſe called Fabius Rullus, whom the Romaines for his noble actes dyd ſurname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whoſe life we haue now in hande, was the fourth lineally deſcended of the ſame line, and he was ſurnamed Verrucoſus, bicauſe of a certen birth marke he had vpon one of his lippes, like a litle warte. And he was alſo ſurnamed Ouicula, a litle lamme, for his ſoftnes, ſlownes, and grauity of his doings whileſt he was a childe. But bicauſe of nature he was dull, ſtill, and very ſilent, and that he was ſeldome ſeene to playe at any paſtime among the boyes, and for that they ſawe he was but of ſlowe capacitie, and hard to learne and conceyue, and withall that the boyes might doe to him what they would, he was ſo lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into him, that he would proue a very foole and nigeot. Yet other were of contrarie opinion of him: who conſidering more deepely the man, perceyued in his nature a certen ſecret conſtancie & the maieſtie of a lyon. But Fabius ſelfe when he was called to ſerue the common weale, dyd quickely ſhewe to the world, that which they tooke for dullnes in him, was his grauitie, which neuer altered for no cauſe or reſpect: and that which other iudged feareſullnes in him, was very wiſedome. And where he ſhewed him ſelfe not haſtie, nor ſodaine in any thing: it was found in him an aſſured and ſetled conſtancie. Wherefore when he came to conſider the great ſoueraintie of their common weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he dyd vſe his bodie to all hardnes, and brought vp him ſelfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to ſerue in the field: and he gaue him ſelfe much to eloquence alſo, as a neceſſary inſtrument to perſuade ſouldiers vnto reaſon. His tongue likewiſe dyd agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeate finenes in his ſpeach, but his words were euer very graue and profounde, and his ſentences euen grafte in him by nature, and (as ſome ſaye) were much like Thucydides ſayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praiſe of his ſonne, who dyed when he came out of his Conſulſhippe, which is yet extant to be ſeene. Now as for him, hauing bene fiue times choſen Conſul, in his firſt yere of his Conſulſhippe, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coaſt of GENVA) who being ouerthrowen by him in a great battell, where they had loſt many men, they were compelled to goe their waye, & to take the ALPES for their ſuccour, & durſt no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALIE, whereupon they dyd confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great armie, and hauing wonne the firſt battell neere vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he paſſed further, and went through THVSCAN, waſting and diſtroying all the countrie as he paſſed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Beſides they ſawe many ſignes and tokens, ſome common vnto them, as thundering, lightning, & ſuch other like: but other alſo more ſtraunge, neuer ſeene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certen targets were waxen all bloudie of them ſelues, & that about the cittie of ANTIVM they found wheate eares, which were all bloudie when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen, burning ſtones all in a flame of fire: and in the countrie of the PHALERIANS how the element ſeemed to open, and many litle written ſcrolles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written theſe wordes, worde for worde: Mars doth nowe handle his weapons. But all theſe ſignes and wonders dyd nothing appawle nor daunte the boldnes of Caius Flaminius, Conſul then: who beſides the naturall great corage, & aſpiring minde he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reaſon increaſed in him, by the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had before. For, notwithſtanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellowe Conſul ſtoode againſt his intent: he for all that dyd geue battell to the GAVLES, in deſpight of them all, and wanne the victorie. Likewiſe, though all theſe ſignes & wonders in the ayer, dyd greatly trouble, and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he ſawe no apparant cauſe to be troubled withall. But he vnderſtanding the ſmall number of his enemies, and the lacke of money that was among them: gaue counſell, and was of opinion they ſhould paciently forbeare a litle, and not to hazard battell againſt a man, whoſe armie hadde bene long trained in warres, and by many foughten fields was growen valliant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they ſhould ſend ayde to their ſubiects, and other their allies and confederates, as neede required, to keepe their citties ſtill vnder their obedience: and in the meane ſeaſon by tract of time, to weare out Hanniballs force and power, which was like ſtrawe ſet a fire, that ſtraight geueth forth a blaſe, and yet hath no ſubſtaunce to holde fire long. When Fabius had thus ſayed enough to perſuade Flaminius, yet it would not ſincke into Flaminius heade: for, ſayeth he, I will not tarie vntill the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the cittie, to defend it, and as Camillus dyd, that fought within the cittie ſelfe in olde time. Whereup on he commaunded his captaines to ſet out their bandes to the field, and he him ſelfe tooke his horſe backe: which vpon the ſodaine, without any cauſe was ſo afeard, and tooke ſo on with him ſelfe, that he caſt the Conſul to the grounde with his heade forward. For all this fall he would not chaunge his minde, but helde on his iorney toward Hannibal, and preſented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thraſimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battell was ſo fiercely fought on both ſides, that notwithſtanding there was ſuch a terrible earthquake therewhile, that ſome citties were ouerthrowen and turned topſi turuey, ſome riuers had their ſtreames turned againſt their courſe, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in ſonder, and broken open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any ſuch thing at all. Flaminius the Conſul ſelfe was ſlaine at that battell, after he had in his owne perſone done many a valliant acte, and many of the worthieſt gentlemen and valianteſt ſouldiers of his armie laye dead about him: the reſidue being fled, the ſlaughter was great, for the bodies ſlaine were fifteene thouſand, and ſo many priſoners left aliue. After this ouerthrowe, Hannibal made all the ſearche he could poſſible to finde the bodie of Flaminius,

A nius, to burie him honorably, bicause of his valliantnes: but he could neuer be founde amongest the dead bodies, neither was it euer hearde what became of it. Now as touching the first ouerthrowe at TREBIA, neither the generall that wrote it, nor the post that brought the first newes to ROME, tolde the trothe of it as it was, but fayned that the ende was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battell, so sone as the Prator Pomponius had receyued the newes, he called all the people to counsell, where without disguising or dissembling at all, he playnely sayed thus vnto them. My Lordes, we haue lost the battell, our army is ouerthrowen, and the Consul him selfe is slaine in the field: wherefore consider what you haue to doe, & prouide for your safety. These wordes spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from B the sea, to put them in daunger, dyd so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole cittie for feare: that they were all in a maze, and knewe not what to determine. Yet in the ende they all agreed, that it stoode them vpon to haue a chief magistrate, called in Latin Dictatura, that should be a man of corage, and could stowtely vse it without sparing or fearing any persone. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the only man mete to be chosen, as he, whose noble corage and graue behauiour was aunswerable, to the dignitie and soueraintie of the office: and moreouer, that to his grauity and wisedome there was ioyned (by reasonable age) strength of bodie, and valliantnes with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius generall of the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would graunte him he might Fabius Dictator.
C haue his horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expressely forbidden by an auncient order. Either bicause they thought the chiefest force of their armie dyd consist in their footemen, which caused the making of this lawe: whereby the generall should be amongest them in the daye of the battell, and in no wise should forsake them. Or els bicause the authoritie of this magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator should haue absolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his first comming, bicause he would shewe the maiestie and dignitie of his office, and that euery man should be the more obedient and readie at his commaundement: when he went abroade, he had foure and twentie sergeants before him, carying the bundells of roddes, and axes. The Dictator might not ride in the warres. The maiestie of Fabius the Dictator.
D And when one of the Consulls came to him, he sent a sergeant to commaund his bundell of roddes that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layed a side: and that he should come and speake with him, as a priuate man. And first to make a good foundation, and to beginne with the seruice of the goddes: he declared vnto the people, that the losse they had receyued, came through the rashenes and willfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckoning of the goddes nor religion: and not through any defaulte and cowardlines of the souldiers. And for this cause he dyd persuade them not to be afrayed of their enemies, but to appease the wrath of the goddes, and to serue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but dyd confirme their valiancy with true religion and godlines: and besides dyd vtterly take awaye and aswage their feare
E of their enemies, by geuing them certaine hope and assuraunce of the ayde of the goddes. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles prophesies perused, which are kept very secret: and therein they founde certaine auncient prophecies and oracles, which spake of the present misfortunes of the time. But what were conteined therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to any persone. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assembly of the people, made a solemne vowe vnto the goddes, that he would sacrifice all the profits and fruites that should fall the next yere, of sheepe, of sowes, of milche kyne, and of goates in all the mountaines, champion countrie, riuers, or meadowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of musike, & shewe other fightes in the honour of the goddes, and would bestowe vpon the same the summe of three hundred three & thirtie Sestercians, & three hundred three & thirtie Romaine pence, &
F a third parte ouer. All which summe reduced into Græcian money, amounteth to foure score three thousand, fiue hundred, and foure score, and three siluer drachmas, & two obolos. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why The Sibylles bookes of prophecies. Fabius vowe.

he dyd deuide it by three, vnles it were to extolle the power of the number of three: bicause it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuers numbers, and conteineth in it self the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope, and trust to haue the ayde and fauour of the goddes: made them in the ende the better disposed to liue well afterwardes. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the goddes would send good lucke and prosperitie vnto men, through their valliantnes and wisdome: dyd straight set forwards vnto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his souldiers. Fabius camped allwayes in the strong and highe places of the mountaines, out of all daunger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemie: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remoued, he followed him straight, and would be allwayes neere him, but neuer forsooke the hilles, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be inforced to fight against his will. Yet allwayes he followed the enemie at his tayle, and made him euer afeard of him, thincking still that he sought to get the vantage, to geue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sorte: he became disliked of euery bodye. For euery man both in his owne campe, and abroade, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better, then a rancke coward, Hannibal only excepted. But he perceyuing his great reache and policie, and foreseeing the manner of fight, sawe there was no remedy, but by playne force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delaye would ouerthrowe the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein only consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away, and dye, and his money was scante, and him selfe should growe the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal beganne to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratageames and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to geue his aduersarie the falle. For sodainely, he would goe and geue alarom to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remoue his campe, from one place to another, and geue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuise out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in his first determination: that delaye of fight was the best waye so to ouerthrowe him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horsemen, dyd trouble him muche. For he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie corage, crept into opinion with the souldiers, by his whotte furie and desire to fight. Which wrought muche in them, and so sturred vp their corages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hannibalis schoolemaster: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valliant captaine, and worthie ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke highe, and haue a prowde opinion of him selfe, mocking Fabius bicause he euer lodged on the hilles, with saying, the Dictator would make them goodly sportes, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALY before their face. Moreouer, he asked Fabius friendes, whether he would in the ende lodge his campe in the skye, that he dyd clyme vp so highe vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earthe; or els that he was so affrayed, his enemies would finde him out, that he went to hyde him selfe in the clowdes. Fabius friendes made reporte of these ieastes, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare suche reproachefull wordes as were spoken of him. But Fabius aunswered them. If I should yeld to that you counsell me, I should shewe my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightfull wordes. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull, and iealous, of the welfare and safetie of his countrie: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery strawe, or to regard euery common prating, it is not the parte of a worthie man of charge, but rather of a base minded persone, to seeke to please those whom he ought to commaunde and gouerne, bicause they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chaunced to fall

A fall into a great errour. For intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the playnes, where there was plentie of vittells, and ſtore of paſture to feede his horſe and cattell: he commaunded his guydes to bring him ſtraight after ſupper, into the playne of CASINVM. They miſtaking his wordes, and not vnderſtanding well what he ſayed, bicauſe his ITALIAN tongue was but meane: tooke one thing for another, and ſo brought him and his armie to the ende of a feild neere the cittie of CASILINVM, through the middeſt of the which ronneth a riuer, the ROMAINES call Vulturnius. Nowe the countrie lying by it, was a valley compaſſed in with mountaines round about, ſauing that the riuer went to the ſea: where leauing his owne banckes, it ſpreadeth abroade into the mariſſes, and banckes of ſande very deepe, and in the ende fell into that parte of the ſea which is moſt daungerous, and there was B neither ſuccour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a ſacke, Fabius that knewe the countrie, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereaboutes, followed him ſteppe by ſteppe, and ſtopped his paſſage, where he ſhould haue come out of the valley, with foure thouſand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the ſtraight, and diſpoſed the reſt of his armie vpon the hanginges of the hilles, in the moſt apt and fit places all about. Then with his light horſe men he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals armie by and by out of order, and ſo there were ſlaine eight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would haue remoued his campe thence immediatly, and knowing then the faulte his guydes had made, taking one place for another, and the daunger wherein they had brought him: he roundely truſſed them vp, C and honge them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the toppes of the hilles, and to winne them from their ſtrength, he ſawe it was vnpoſſible, and out of all hope. Wherefore, perceyuing his ſouldiers both afrayed and diſcouraged, for that they ſawe them ſelues hemmed in on all ſides, without any order to eſcape: Hannibal determined to deceyue Fabius by a deuiſe. He cauſed ſtraight two thouſand oxen to be choſen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their ſpoyles, and tyed to their hornes light bundells of reedes, and fallowe faggottes, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they ſawe any ſignall or token lift vp in the ayer in the night, they ſhould then ſtraight ſet fire on thoſe bundels and bunches, and driue vp the beaſtes to the hilles, toward the wayes where the enemies laye. D Whileſt theſe things were a preparing, he on the other ſide ranged his armie in order of battell: and when night came, cauſed them to marche fayer and ſoftely. Now theſe beaſtes, whileſt the fyre was but litle that burnt vpon their hornes, went but fayer and ſoftly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen. In ſo muche as the heard men that were on the toppe of the mountaines, wondred maruelouſly to ſee ſuche flames and fires about the hornes of ſo many beaſtes, as if it had bene an armie marching in order of battell with lightes and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the ſtumpes, and that the force of the fyre dyd frye their very fleſhe: then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to ſhake their heades, wherby they dyd ſet one another a fyre. Then left they their ſofte pace, & went no more in order as they dyd before, but for the extreme payne E they felt, beganne to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fyre ſtill about their hornes, and in their tayles, and ſet fyre of all the boughes and coppeſies they paſſed by. This was a ſtraunge ſight to looke vpon, and dyd muche amaſe the ROMAINES that kept the paſſages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne here and there with torches in their handes. Whereupon they were in a maruelous feare and trouble, ſuppoſing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuironne them of all ſides: ſo as they durſt no more keepe the paſſages which they were commaunded, but forſaking the ſtraightes, beganne to flye towards their mayne and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horſe men immediatly poſſeſſed the ſtraights that were kept: by reaſon whereof, all the reſt of his armie marched out at their eaſe and leyſure, without feare or daunger, not- F withſtanding that they were loden and troubled with maruelous great ſpoyles, and of all kynde of ſortes. Fabius then perceyued very well the ſame night, that it was but a ſlight of Hannibal: for ſome of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his armie. Whereupon fearing to fall vpon ſome ambuſhe by reaſon of the darke night, he kept his men in battell raye, without ſturring, or making any noiſe. The next morning by breake of daye, he beganne to followe his enemie by the tracke, and fell vpon the tayle of the rereward, with whom he skirmiſhed within the ſtraites of the mountaines: and ſo dyd diſtreſſe ſomewhat Hannibals armie. Hannibal thereupon ſent out of his vauntgarde a certaine number of Spaniards (very luſty and nymble fellowes, that were vſed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who comming downe, and ſetting vpon the ROMAINES that were heauy armed, ſlue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they deſpiſed Fabius the more, and thought worſe of him then they dyd before: bicauſe his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wiſedome and policie to ouerthrowe him, where as he him ſelfe by Hannibal was firſt finely handled and deceyued. Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in diſliking and ſuſpition with the ROMAINES, commaunded his ſouldiers when they came neere any of Fabius landes, that they ſhould burne and deſtroye all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wiſe to medle with Fabius landes, nor any thing of his, and dyd purpoſely appointe a garriſon to ſee that nothing of Fabius ſhould miſcarie, nor yet take hurte. This was ſtraight caried to ROME, which dyd thereby the more incenſe the people againſt him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceaſed crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus ſpeciall procurement and perſuaſion: who of him ſelfe had no cauſe to miſlike with Fabius, but only bicauſe he was Minutius kinſeman (generall of the horſemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bare to Fabius, would turne to the prayſe and aduauncement of Minutius. The Senate alſo were muche offended with Fabius, for the compoſition he made with Hannibal, touching the priſoners taken of either ſide. For it was articled betweene them, that they ſhould chaunge priſoners, deliuering man for man, or els two hundred and fiftie ſiluer drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to haue moe priſoners then the other. When exchaunge was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his handes of ROMAINE priſoners, two hundred and fortie moe, then Fabius had to exchaunge of his. The Senate cõmaunded there ſhould be no money ſent to redeeme them, and greatly founde faulte with Fabius for making this accorde: bicauſe it was neither honorable, nor profitable for the common weale to redeeme men that cowardly ſuffered them ſelues to be taken priſoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderſtanding it, dyd paciently beare this diſpleaſure conceyued againſt him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no money, and meaning to keepe his worde, and not to leaue the poore cittizens priſoners behinde him: he ſent his ſonne to ROME, with commiſſion to ſell his landes, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his waye to ROME, and ſold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the priſoners, and ſent their ranſome vnto Hannibal. Many of the priſoners whom he had redeemed, offred to repaye him their ranſome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ranſome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the prieſtes to doe certaine ſolemne ſacrifices, he left the armie in charge with Minutius, to gouerne the ſame in his abſence, with condition not to ſet vpon the enemie, nor to fight with him at all: the which not only by his authoritie he dyd expreſſely forbid him, but alſo as his very friende, he dyd warne and intreate him in no wiſe to attempt. Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commaundementes or requeſtes, ſo ſone as Fabius backe was turned, beganne to be ſomewhat luſtie, and doing with his enemies. So one daye amongeſt the reſt, Minutius perceyuing Hannibal had ſent a great parte of his armie abroade to forrage and get vittells: came and ſet vpon them that remained behinde, and draue them into their campe, with great ſlaughter, and dyd put them in a maruelous feare that were ſaued, as men that looked for no leſſe, but to haue bene beſieged in their campe. Afterwardes alſo, when their whole armie came together againe: he retired backe in ſpight of them all, and loſt not a man. This exploite ſet Minutius in a pryde, and brought the ſouldiers to be more raſhe then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrowe went with ſpeede to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, ſayed: he was more afeard of Minutius proſperitie, then of his owne aduerſitie.

A uersitie. But the common people reioyced maruelosly, and made great shewe of ioye vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highely magnified Minutius, and commended his corage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlines, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he dyd accuse the Nobilitie and greatest men of Rome, saying: that from the first beginning they had layed a platte to drawe these warres out at length, only to destroye the peoples power and authoritie, hauing brought the whole common weale, to the state of a monarchy, and into the handes of a priuate persone. Who by his remissenes and delayes, would geue Hannibal leysure to plante him selfe in Italie, and by time geue open passage to the Carthaginians, at their pleasure to send B Hannibal a second ayde and armie, to make a full conquest of all Italie. Fabius hearing these wordes, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the aunswering of the accusations the Tribune had burdened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatche these sacrifices and ceremonies of the goddes, that he might spedilie returne againe to the campe, to punishe Minutius, for breaking his commaundement, in fighting with the enemie. He had no soner spoken these wordes, but there rose a maruelous tumulte and hurly burley presently among the people, for the daunger Minutius stoode in then: bicause the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprisone and put to death, whom he thought good, without ordinary course of lawe or araynement. Moreouer, they dyd iudge, since Fabius had alate left his accustomed mildnes and affabilitie, that he would growe to such seueritie in his C anger, that it would be a hard thing to appease him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, saiing only Metellus the Tribune. He hauing authoritie by vertue of his office, to saye what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authoritie, when any Dictator was chosen: then all the officers that were put down, instantly besought the people not to forsake Minutius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus dyd alate to his sonne, who strake of his head, after he had valliantly fought with his enemies and ouercomed them, for breaking his commaundement. And beganne to persuade them further, to take this tyranicall power of the Dictatorshippe from Fabius: and to put their affayers into the handes of him, that would and could tell howe to bring them safely to passe. The people were tickled maruelously with these seditious wordes, but yet they durst not force Fabius
D to resigne his Dictatorshippe, though they bare him great grudge, and were angrie with him in their hartes. Howbeit they ordeined that Minutius thenceforth should haue equall power and authoritie with the Dictator in the warres, a thing that was neuer seene nor heard of before, and yet the very same done in that sorte againe, after the battell of Cannes. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they dyd choose another Dictator at Rome, which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create newe Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number againe of the counsell of the Senate: he discharged the selfe same daye the sergeants that caried the axes before him, and sent awaye the traine that waited vpon him, and dyd so put him selfe in prease of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar busines as a priuate per-E sone. Nowe the Romanes imagined, that when Fabius should see howe they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would greue him to the harte for very anger: but they came shorte to iudge of his nature, for he dyd not thincke that their folly should hurte or dishonour him at all. But as wise Diogenes aunswered one that sayed vnto him, looke, they mocke thee: tushe (sayd he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby, that he tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and dyd comfort him selfe with the philosophers rules and examples: who doe mainteine, that an honest and wise man, can no waye be iniured nor dishonoured. For all the displeasure he receyued by the peoples follie, was in respect of the common wealth: bicause they had put a sworde into a mad mans hande, hurte before he came to the campe: he departed ſodainely out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the cãpe, where he found Minutius ſo prowde & ſtowte, that he was not to be delt with. For he would nedes haue the authoritie to commaund the whole armie when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not conſent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the armie betweene them: thincking it better he ſhould alone commaunde the one halfe, then the whole army by turnes. So he choſe for him ſelfe, the firſt and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the ſeconde and fourth, & deuided alſo betwene them the ayde of their friends. And when Minutius made his boaſte, that the maieſtie of the higheſt magiſtrate was brought lower for his ſake: Fabius tolde him that he might thincke, if he were wiſe, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would nedes contend againſt his companion, yet he ſhould haue a ſpeciall regard and conſideration, that hauing wonne nowe the cittizens good willes, by whom he was ſo much honoured, he ſhould haue no leſſe care of their healthe and ſafety, then he had, who was nowe troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his leſſon, for a counterfeate mocke, after olde mens manners & facion: & ſo taking the one half of the armie vnto him, went and lodged alone by him ſelf. Hannibal hearing of their iarre and ſquaring together, ſought ſtraight oportunitie to make their diſcord finely to ſerue his turne. Nowe there was a hill betwene both their campes not very harde to be wonne, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe ſafely in, and was very fitte and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, dyd ſeeme a farre of to be very playne & euen ground, bicauſe they had no couert of wodde to ſhadowe them, yet were there many ditches and litle vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might eaſely haue taken it at his pleaſure if he had liſted, dyd let it alone in the middeſt betwene them, for a bayte to drawe out his enemies to the battell. Nowe when Hannibal ſawe Fabius and Minutius lodged a ſonder, he placed certaine bandes in the night, among thoſe ditches and valleyes. Afterwardes the next morning by breake of daye, he ſent a ſmall number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this pollicie to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out in deede. For firſt Minutius ſent thither his light horſemen, and afterwardes all his men at armes: and laſtely perceyuing that Hannibal him ſelfe came to relieue his men that were vpon the hill, he him ſelf marched forward alſo with all the reſt of his armie in order of battell, & gaue a whotte charge vpon them that defended the hill, to driue them thence. The fight continued equall a good ſpace betwene them both, vntill ſuch time as Hannibal ſaw his enemie come directly within his daunger, and ſhewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had layed in ambuſhe: he ſtraight raiſed the ſignall he had geuen them. They vpon that diſcouered all together, and with great cries dyd ſet vpon the rereward of the ROMAINES, & ſlue a great number of them at the firſt charge: and dyd put the reſte in ſuche a feare and diſorder, as it is vnpoſſible to expreſſe it. Then was Minutius raſhe brauerie and fonde boaſtes muche cooled, when he looked firſt vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and ſawe in none of them any corage to tarie by it, but rather that they were all readie to ronne away. Which if they had done, they had bene caſt awaye euery man: for the NVMIDIANS finding they were the ſtronger, dyd diſperſe themſelues all about the plaine, killing all ſtragglers that fled. Minutius ſouldiers being brought to this daunger and diſtreſſe, which Fabius foreſawe they would fall into, and hauing vpon this occaſion his armie readie ranged in order of battell, to ſee what would become of Minutius, not by reporte of meſſengers, but with his owne eyes: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he ſawe Minutius and all his men compaſſed about on euery ſide, & euen ſtaggering & ready to flye, & heard beſides their cries not like men that had hartes to fight, but as men ſcared, and ready to flye for feare to ſaue them ſelues: he clapped his hande on his thighe, and fetched a great ſighe, ſaying to thoſe that were about him. O goddes, howe Minutius is gone to caſt him ſelfe awaye, ſoner then I looked for, and later then he deſired? But in ſpeaking theſe wordes, he made his enſignes marche on in haſte, crying out alowde. O my friends, we muſt diſpatche with ſpeede to ſuccour Minutius: for he is a valliãt man of perſone, & one that loueth the honour of his countrie. And though with ouermuch hardines he hath ventred to farre, & made a faulte, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time ſerueth not now to accuſe him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he preſently brake

A the NVMIDES, and disparsed them, that laye waiting in the fields for the ROMAINES, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwardes he went further, and dyd set vpon them that had geuen charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battell, where he slue them that made head against him. The residue, fearing least they should fall into the daunger they had brought the ROMAINES vnto: before they were enuironned in of all sides, dyd turne taile straight to Fabius. Now Hannibal seeing this chaunge, and considering howe Fabius in persone, with more corage then his age required, dyd make a lane in the middest of those that fought against the side of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to cease, and commaunded to sounde the retreate, and so drue backe his men againe into his campe; the ROMAINES being very glad also they might retire with safetie. They saye Hannibal in his retB ring, sayed merylie to his friends: haue not I tolde you (Sirs) many a time and ofte, of the hanging clowde we sawe on the toppe of the mountaines, howe it would breake out in the ende with a tempest that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius hauing stript those that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, & spake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his cāpe, assembled his souldiers, & spake thus to them. My friends, not to erre at all, enterprising great matters, it is a thing passing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faultes that are paste and done, it is the parte of a wise and valliant man. For my selfe, I acknowledge I haue no lesse occasion to prayse fortune, then I haue also cause to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one litle pece of a daye: and that is this. That I am not able to comC maunde, but am my selfe fitter to be gouerned and commaunded by another: and that I am but a foole to stande in mine owne conceipt, thinking to ouercome those, of whom it is more honour for me to confesse my selfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth shalbe he, who alone shall commaund you in all things. And to let him knowe that we doe all acknowledge the fauour which we haue presently receyued at his hands: I will leade you to geue him thankes, & will my selfe be the first man to offer to obey him in all that he shall commaund me. These wordes being spoken, he commaunded his ensigne bearers to followe him, & he him selfe marched formest towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tente: whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to mete him. Minutius after he had set downe his ensignes at his feete, sayed D with a lowde voyce, O father: and his souldiers vnto Fabius souldiers, O maisters, which name the bondemen that are infranchesed, doe vse to them that haue manumised them. Afterwards euery man being silent, Minutius beganne alowde to saye vnto him. My lorde Dictator, this daye you haue wonne two victories. The one of Hannibal, whom valliantly you haue ouercome: the second, of my selfe your companion, whom also your wisedome and goodnes hath vanquished. By the one, you haue saued our liues: and by the other, you haue wisely taught vs. So haue we also bene ouercome in two sortes: the one by Hannibal to our shame, and the other by your selfe, to our honour and preseruation. And therefore doe I nowe call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honour you: acknowledging my selfe more bounde vnto you for the present grace and fauour I haue reE ceyued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begatte me. For by him only I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all these honest cittizens liues haue bene saued? And hauing spoken these wordes, he embraced Fabius: and so dyd the souldiers also, hartely embrace together, and kisse one another. Thus the ioye was great through the whole campe, and one were so glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their chekes for great ioye. Nowe when Fabius was afterwardes put out of his office of Dictatorshippe, there were new Consuls chosen againe: the two first followed directly Fabius former order he had begone. For they kept themselues from geuing Hannibal any battell, and dyd allwayes send ayde to their subiects and friends, to keepe them from rebellion: vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, and knowen to be very bold and rashe) by flattering of the people, wanne credit among them to F be made Consul. Then they thought that he by his rashnes and lacke of experience, would incontinently hazard battell: bicause he had cried out in all the assemblies before, that this warre would be euerlasting, so long as the people dyd chuse any of the Fabians to be their generalles,and vawnted him ſelfe openly,that the firſt daye he came to ſee his enemies,he would ouerthrowe them.In geuing out theſe braue wordes,he aſſembled ſuch a power,that the Romaines neuer ſawe ſo great a number together,againſt any enemie that euer they had: for he put into one campe,foure ſcore and eight thouſand fighting men. This made Fabius and the other Romaines,men of great wiſedome and iudgement,greatly affrayed: bicauſe they ſawe no hope for Rome to riſe againe, if it fortuned that they ſhould loſe ſo great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Conſul, called Paulus Æmilius, a man very skilfull and expert in warres, but ill beloued of the common people, whoſe furie he yet feared,for that they had condemned him a litle before to paye a great fine to the treaſurie:and after he had ſomwhat comforted him,he beganne to perſuade and encorage him to reſiſt the fonde raſhnes of his companion,telling him,that he ſhould haue aſmuch to doe with Terentius Varro for the preſeruation and ſafety of his countrie, as to fight with Hannibal for defence of the ſame.For they were both Marſhall men, and had a like deſire to fight: the one bicauſe he knewe not wherein the vantage of his ſtrength conſiſted,and the other bicauſe he knewe very well his weaknes.You ſhall haue reaſon to beleeue me better,for matters touching Hannibal,then Terentius Varro.For I dare warrant you,if you keepe Hannibal from battell but this yere: he ſhall of neceſſitie,if he tarie,conſume him ſelf, or els for ſhame be driuen to flye with his armie.And the rather,bicauſe hetherto (though he ſeeme to be lorde of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his parte: and moreouer bicauſe there remaines at this daye in his campe not the third parte of his armie, he brought with him out of his countrie. Vnto theſe perſuaſions,the Conſul(as it is reported)aunſwered thus.When I looke into my ſelfe, my lorde Fabius, me thinkes my beſt waye were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands & voyces of our cittizens. Therefore,ſith the eſtate of the common wealth ſo requireth it, that it behoueth a man to doe as you haue ſayed:I will doe my beſt indeuour to ſhewe my ſelfe a wiſe captaine, for your ſake only, rather then for all other that ſhould aduiſe me to the cõtrarie. And ſo Paulus departed from Rome with this minde,But Terentius his companion would in any caſe,they ſhould cõmaund the whole armie by turnes,eche his daye by him ſelfe: and went to encampe harde by Hannibal,by the riuer of Auſide,neere vnto the village called Cannes. Nowe when it came to his daye to cõmaund by turnes,early in the mourning he cauſed the ſignall of battell to be ſet out,which was a coate armour of skarlet in graine,that they dyd laye out vpon the pauilion of the generall: ſo that the enemies at the firſt ſight,begãne to be afeard,to ſee the luſtines of this newe come generall, and the great number of ſouldiers he had alſo in his hoſte, in compariſon of them that were not halfe ſo many. Yet Hannibal of a good corage, commaunded euery man to arme, and to put them ſelues in order of battell: and him ſelfe in the meane time taking his horſe backe,followed with a fewe,gallopped vp to the toppe of a litle hill not very ſteepe, from whence he might plainely diſcerne all the Romaines campe, and ſawe howe they dyd range their men in order of battell.Nowe one Giſcon (a man of like ſtate and nobilitie as him ſelfe)being with him at that time, tolde him, that the enemies ſeemed a farre of to be a maruelous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead,aunſwered him.Yea, ſayed he, but there is another thing more to be wondered at then you thinke of Giſcon.Giſcon ſtraight asked him: What? mary ſayeth he this: that of all the great number of ſouldiers you ſee yonder, there is not a man of them called Giſcon as you are.This mery aunſwer deliuered contrarie to their expectation that were with him, looking for ſome great waightie matter, made them all laughe a good. So downe the hill they came laughing alowde, and tolde this prety ieaſte to all they met as they rode, which ſtraight from one to another ranne ouer all the campe, in ſo much as Hannibal him ſelfe could not holde from laughing. The Carthaginian ſouldiers perceyuing this,beganne to be of a good corage,imagining that their generall would not be ſo merylie diſpoſed as to fall a laughing,being ſo neere daunger,if he had not perceyued him ſelfe a great deale to be the ſtronger, and that he had good cauſe alſo to make no reckoning of his enemies.Furthermore,he ſhewed two policies of a skilfull captaine in the battell. The firſt was,the ſituation of the place,where he put his men in order of battell, ſo as they had the winde on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raiſed a ſharpe duſt out of the

A the open ſandy valley, and paſſing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS ſquadron, blewe full in the ROMAINES faces, with ſuch a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes. The ſeconde policie was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either ſide of his winges, the beſt and valliantest ſouldiers he had in all his armie: and dyd fill vp the middeſt of his battell with the worſte of his men, which he made like a pointe, and was farder out by a great deale, then the two winges of the fronte of his battell. So he commaunded thoſe of the winges, that when the ROMAINES had broken his firſt fronte, and followed thoſe that gaue backe, whereby the middeſt of his battell ſhould leaue an hollowe place, and the enemies ſhould come in ſtill increaſing within the compaſſe of the two winges: that then they ſhould ſet vpon them on both ſides, and charge their flanks immediatly, and ſo

B incloſe them in behind. And this was cauſe of a greater ſlaughter. For when the midle battell beganne to geue backe, and to receyue the ROMAINES within it, who purſued the other very whotly, Hannibals battell chaunged her forme: & where at the beginning it was like a pointe, it became nowe in the middeſt like a creſſant or halfe moone. Then the captaines of the choſen bandes that laye out in both the winges, made their men to turne, ſome on the left hand, and ſome on the right, and charged the ROMAINES on the flankes, and behinde, where they were all naked: ſo they killed all thoſe that could not ſaue them ſelues by flying, before they were enuironned. They ſaye alſo, that there fell out another miſchief by misfortune, vnto the horſemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occaſion. The horſe of Paulus Æmilius the Conſul being hurte, dyd throwe his maſter on the grounde: whereupon thoſe that were next him,

C dyd light from their horſe backs to helpe him. The reſidue of the horſemen that were a great waye behinde him, ſeeing them light, thought they had bene all commaunded to light: hereupon euery man forſooke their horſe, and fought it out a foote. Hannibal when he ſawe that, ſayed: yea marie, I had rather haue them ſo, then deliuered me bounde hande and foote. But for thoſe matters, the hiſtoriographers doe dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Cõſuls, Varro ſaued him ſelfe by his horſe, with a fewe following him, within the cittie of VENVSA. Paulus being in the middeſt of the throng of all the armie, his bodie full of arrowes that ſtucke faſt in his woundes, and his harte ſore loden with grieuous ſorowe and anguiſhe to ſee the ouerthrowe of his men: was ſet downe by a rocke, looking for ſome of his enemies,

D to come and ryd him out of his payne. But fewe could knowe him, his head and face was of ſuch a gore bloude: inſomuch as his friends and ſeruants alſo paſſed by him, and knewe him not. And there was but one young gentleman of a noble houſe of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knewe him, who dyd his beſt endeuour to ſaue him. For he lighted a foote preſently, & brought him his horſe, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could ſaue him ſelfe for the neceſſitie of his countrie, which nowe more then euer had neede of a good and wiſe captaine. But he refuſed the gentlemans offer and his intreatie, and compelled him to take his horſe backe againe, though the teares ranne downe his chekes for pittie: and raiſing him ſelfe vp to take him by the hande, he ſayed vnto him. I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witneſſe with me, that Paulus Æmilius euen to his laſt hower hath followed his counſaill, and dyd neuer ſwarue from the promiſe he made him: but that firſt he was forced

E to it by Varro, and afterwardes by Hannibal. When he had deliuered theſe wordes, he bad Lentulus farewell: and ronning againe into the furie of the ſlaughter, there he dyed among his ſlaine companions. It is thought there were ſlaine at this battell, fiftie thouſand ROMAINES, & foure thouſand taken priſoners: and other tenne thouſand that were taken priſoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victorie was gotten, Hannibals friendes gaue him counſaill to followe his good fortune: and to enter ROME after the ſcattered number that fled thither: ſo as within fewe dayes following he might ſuppe in their capitoll. A man cannot eaſely geſſe what was the cauſe that ſtayed him, that he went not, vnles it was (as I thinke) ſome good fortune, or fauorable God toward the ROMAINES that withſtoode him, and made him afeard and glad to retire. Whereupon they ſaye, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in

F his anger ſayed to Hannibal: Syr, you haue the waye to ouercome, but you cannot vſe victorie. Notwithſtanding, this victorie made a maruelous chaunge for him. For hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to ſubmit them ſelues to him: where before he had no towne at cõmaundemẽt,nor any ſtorehouſe or porte through all ITALIE,yea he did maruelous hardly, & with much a doe vittell his armie with that he could daylie robbe & ſpoyle,hauing no certẽ place to retire vnto,nor grouñded hope to entertain theſe warres,but kept the field with his armie,remouing from place to place, as they had bene a great number of murderers & theeues together.For the moſt parte of the cõũtrie,dyd yeld immediatly vnto him:as the cittie of CAPVA,being the chiefeſt and greateſt cittie of all ITALIE but ROME, and dyd receyue Hannibal, and were at his deuotion.Thus we maye plainely ſee,that as the poet Euripides ſayeth: it is a great miſchief not onely to be driuen to make triall of friendes, but proofe alſo of captaines wiſdom. For that which before they accompted cowardlines and fainte harte in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reaſon, and rather a heauenly wiſdome and influence, that ſo long foreſawe the things to come, which the parties ſelues that afterwards felt them,gaue litle credit vnto before. Vpon this occaſion, ROME repoſed incontinently all their hope and truſte in Fabius,and they repaired to him for coũſell,as they would haue ronne vnto ſome temple or altar for ſanctuarie.So as the firſt & chiefeſt cauſe of ſtaying the people together from diſperſing them ſelues abroade, as they dyd when ROME was taken by the GAVLES: was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabius wiſedome.For where before he ſeemed to be a coward, and timerous, when there was no daunger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for ſorowe,which could not helpe, and that all the world was ſo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the cittie very modeſtly, with a bold conſtant countenaunce, ſpeaking curteouſly to euery one, and dyd appeaſe their womaniſhe cries and lamentations, and dyd forbid the common aſſemblies & fonde ceremonies,of lamenting the dead corſe at their burialls. Then he perſuaded the Senate to aſſemble in counſell, and dyd comforte vp thoſe that were magiſtrates, and he alone was the only force and power of the cittie: for there was not a man that bare any office,but dyd caſt his eye vpon Fabius,to knowe what he ſhould doe. He it was that cauſed the gates of the cittie ſtraight to be warded, and to keepe thoſe in for going their waye,that would haue forſaken the cittie. He moreouer dyd appointe the time and place of mourning,& dyd commaund whoſoeuer was diſpoſed to mourne,that he ſhould doe it priuately in his owne houſe, and to continue only but thirtie dayes. Then he willed all mourning to be left of, and that the cittie might be cleane from ſuch vncleane things. So the feaſt of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue of the ſacrifices & proceſſion they were wont to keepe on Ceres daye: then by their ſmall number that were left,and ſorowe of thoſe that remained,to let their enemies vnderſtand their exceeding great loſſe.For the goddes delite to be ſerued with glad and reioycing hartes,and with thoſe that are in proſperitie.But all this notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer the prieſtes would haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the goddes,or to turne awaye the threatnings of theſe ſiniſter ſignes, it was forthwith done. For they dyd ſende to the oracle of Apollo, in the cittie of DELPHES,one of Fabius kinſemen ſurnamed Pictor.And two of the Veſtall Nunnes being deflowred:the one was buried aliue according to the lawe and cuſtome,and the other made her ſelf awaye.But herein the great corage and noble clemency of the ROMAINES,is maruelouſly to be noted and regarded.For the Conſul Terentius Varro returning backe to ROME, with the ſhame of his extreme misfortune & ouerthrowe,that he durſte not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithſtanding,and all the people following them,went to the gates of the cittie to meete him, and dyd honorably receyue him.Nay furthermore, thoſe that were the chief magiſtrates and Senators,among whom Fabius was one,when ſilence was made,they commended Varro much: bicauſe he did not deſpaire of the preſeruation of the common weale after ſo great a calamitie,but dyd returne againe to the cittie,to helpe to reduce things to order,in vſing the authoritie of the lawe,and the ſeruice of the cittizens,as not being altogether vnder foote,but ſtanding yet in reaſonable termes of good recouery.But when they vnderſtoode that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other partes of ITALIE: then they beganne to be of good chere againe,and ſent a newe armie and generalles to the field,among which,the two chief generals were,Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wanne a like glorie and reputation.For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life) was a man of

A of ſpeedy execution, of a quicke hande, of a valliant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them, that valliantly put them ſelues in any daunger: by reaſon whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine a like venturous and valliant as him ſelfe, in all ſeruice and execution, he ſhewed the ſelfe boldnes and corage that Hannibal dyd. But Fabius perſiſting ſtill vpon his firſt determination, dyd hope that though he dyd not fight with Hannibal, nor ſturre him at all, yet continuall warres would conſume him and his armie in the end, and bring them both to nought: as a commō wreſtler that forceth his bodie aboue his naturall ſtrength, doth in the ende become a lame and brooſed man. Hereupon Poſſidonius writeth, that the one was called the ROMAINES ſworde, and the other their target. And that Fabius conſtancie and reſolutnes in warres to fight with ſecuritie, and to commit nothing to hazard & daunger, being Poſſidonius wordes of Fabius & Marcellus.

B mingled with Marcellus heate and furie: was that only, which preſerued the ROMAINES empire. For Hannibal meting allwayes in his waye the one that was furious, as a ſtrong ronning ſtreame, founde that his army was continually turmoyled and ouerharried: & the other that was ſlowe as a litle prety riuer, he founde that his army ranne ſoftely vnder him without any noyſe, but yet continually by litle and litle it dyd ſtill conſume & diminiſhe him, vntill he ſawe him ſelfe at the laſt brought to that paſſe, that he was weary with fighting with Marcellus, and affrayed of Fabius bicauſe he fought not. For during all the time of theſe warres, he had euer theſe two captaines almoſt againſt him, which were made either Prætors, Conſuls, or Proconſuls: for either of them both had bene fiue times before choſen Conſul. Yet as for Marcellus: Hannibal had layed an ambuſhe for him in the fifte and laſt yere of his Conſul-

Marcellus ſlaine by an ambuſhe of Hannibals.

C ſhippe, where he ſet vpon him on a ſodaine, and ſlue him. But as for Fabius, he layed many baytes for him, and dyd what he could by all the skill and reache he had, by ambuſhes, and other warlike policies to entrappe him: but he could neuer drawe him within his daunger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue made him falle vpon his ambuſhe he had layed for him: and by this policie. He had counterfeated letters written and ſent vnto him from the cittie of METAPONT, to praye him to come to them, and they would deliuer their cittie into his handes: and withall, that ſuch as were priuie to the contentes of the ſame, deſired no other thing but his repaire thither. Theſe letters pretily quickned Fabius, inſomuch as he was determined one night to haue taken parte of his armie, & to haue gone to them. But bicauſe the ſignes of the birdes dyd promiſe him no good Hannibals ambuſh layed for Fabius.

D ſucceſſe, he left of his purpoſe. Sone after he vnderſtoode they were counterfeate letters, made by Hannibals fine deuiſe to haue drawen him out, & to haue intrapped him, for whom him ſelfe laye in perſone in ambuſhe neere the cittie, looking and waiting for his comming: but the goddes who would haue him ſaued, were only to be thāked for his happy ſcape. Furthermore, concerning the reuolte of the citties that were ſubiect vnto them, and the riſing of their allies & friends againſt them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreate them curteouſly, making them aſhamed without occaſion to rebell againſt them, rather then openly to ſuſpect them, and to deale ſtraightly with thoſe that were ſo to be ſuſpected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a ſouldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation, a valliant man of his perſone, & alſo of as noble a houſe, as any that were of all the allies of the

E ROMAINES: who had practiſed with other his fellowes of the bande he ſerued in, to goe ſeruе the enemie. Fabius hearing of this practiſe he went about, gaue him no ill countenaunce for it, but calling him to him, he ſayed. I muſt confeſſe there is no reckoning made of you, as your good ſeruice doth deſerue: wherefore for this time (ſayeth he) I blame the pety captaines only, which in ſuch ſorte doe beſtowe their good will and fauour at aduenture, and not by deſerte. But henceforth it ſhalbe your owne faulte if you doe not declare your minde vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuie of your lacke & neceſſitie. When he had ſpoken theſe wordes to him, he gaue him a very good horſe for ſeruice, and dyd rewarde him with other honorable giftes, as men of good ſeruice & deſert haue commonly beſtowed on them: and this dyd ſo encorage the ſouldier thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ſer-

F uiceable ſouldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horſes, & ſuch like as take vpon them to taine brute beaſtes, ſhould ſonner make them leaue their ſauage & churliſhe nature, by gentle vſage and manning of them: then by beating, and ſhackling of them. And ſo a gouernour of men, ſhould rather correct his ſouldier by pacience, gentlenes, and clemency: then by rigour, violence, or ſeueritie. Otherwiſe he ſhould handle them more rudely, and ſharpely, then husbandmen doe figge trees, oliue trees, & wilde pomegarnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe alter their harde and wilde nature, & cauſe them in the end to bring forth good figges, oliues & pomegarnets. Another time certaine captaines of his brought him worde, that there was one of their ſouldiers which would euer goe out of the cãpe, & leaue his enſigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They aunſwered him all together, that he was a very good ſouldier, and that they could hardly finde out ſuche another, in all their bandes as he: and therewithall they tolde him, of ſome notable ſeruice they had ſeene him doe in perſone. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquierie to know what the cauſe was, that made him goe ſo oft out of the campe: in the end, he founde he was in loue with a young woman, and that to goe ſee her, was the cauſe he dyd ſo ofte leaue his enſigne, and dyd put his life in ſo great daunger, for that ſhe was ſo farre of. When Fabius vnderſtoode this, he ſent certaine ſouldiers (vnknowing to the ſouldier) to bring the woman awaye he loued, and willed them to hyde her in his tente: and then called he the ſouldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, and taking him a ſide, ſayed vnto him thus. My friend, it hath bene tolde me, how thou haſt lyen many nightes out of the campe, againſt the lawe of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I vnderſtande alſo that otherwiſe thou art an honeſt man, and therefore I pardone thy faultes paſte, in conſideration of thy good ſeruice: but from henceforth I will geue thee in cuſtodie to ſuch a one, as ſhall make me accompt of thee. The ſouldier was blancke, when he heard theſe wordes. Fabius with that, cauſed the woman he was in loue with, to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, ſaying vnto him. This woman hereafter ſhall aunſwer me thy bodie to be forth comming in the campe amongeſt vs: and from henceforth thy deedes ſhall witneſſe for the reſte, that thy loue vnto this woman, maye be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practiſe or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after ſuche a ſorte, recouered againe the cittie of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had loſt by treaſon. It fortuned there was a young man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a ſiſter within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruelous dearely: now there was a captaine, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, and was one of thoſe to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the cittie of TARENTVM. This gaue the young ſouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and waye, to bring his enterpriſe to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuitie fled from his campe, and got into the cittie of TARENTVM, geuing it out in the cittie, that he would altogether dwell with his ſiſter. Now for a fewe dayes at his firſt comming, the BRVTIAN captaine laye alone by him ſelfe, at the requeſt of the mayde his ſiſter, who thought her brother had not knowen of her loue: and ſhortely after the young fellowe tooke his ſiſter aſide, and ſayed vnto her. My good ſiſter, there was a great ſpeache in the ROMAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefeſt captaines of the garriſon: I praye thee if it be ſo, let me knowe what he is. For ſo he be a good fellowe, and an honeſt man (as they ſaye he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all things topſi turuey, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of, and ſtill maketh vertue of neceſſitie, without reſpect of ſhame. And it is a ſpeciall good fortune, at ſuch time as neither right nor reaſon rules, to happen yet into the handes of a good and gratious lorde. His ſiſter hearing him ſpeake theſe wordes, ſent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuoured him ſelf to frame his ſiſters loue in better ſorte towards him, then it was before: by reaſon whereof, the captaine alſo beganne to truſt him very muche. So this young TARENTINE ſawe it was very eaſie, to winne and turne the minde of this amarous and mercenarie man, with hope of great giftes that were promiſed him, and Fabius ſhould performe. Thus doe the moſt parte of writers ſet downe this ſtorie. Howbeit ſome writers ſaye, that this woman who wanne the BRVTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is ſayed, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that ſhe vnderſtanding the captaine of the BRVTIANS (who laye in garriſon within the cittie of TARENTVM) was alſo

A also a BRVTIAN borne, and of her owne natiue countrie: made Fabius priuie to her intent, and with his consent, she comming to the walles of the cittie, spake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom she handled in such sorte, that she wanne him. But whilest this geare was a brewing, Fabius, bicause he would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote vnto the souldiers of RHEGIO: which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they should enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and laye seige to the cittie of CAVLONIA, and rase it to the grounde. These RHEGIAN souldiers were about the number of eight thousand, and the most of them traitours, and ronneagates, from one campe to another: and the worst sorte of them, and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, so that in losing them all, the losse were nothing to the common weale, and the sorrowe muche lesse. So Fa-
B bius thought, that putting these fellowes out for a praye to Hannibal (as a stale to drawe him from those quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and so it came to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his armie to intrappe them: and in the meane time Fabius wēt to laye seige to TARENTVM, where he had not ben six dayes before it, but the young man (who together with his sister had drawen the BRVTIAN captaine to this treason) stale out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of that side of the walle the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promised him to keepe it secret, & to suffer them to enter, that came to assaulte that side. Yet Fabius would not grounde his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treason, but went him self in persone to vewe the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: C and in the meane season, he gaue a generall assault to all partes of the cittie (aswell by sea as by lande) with great showtes & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine seeing all the cittizens and garrison ronne to that parte, where they perceyued the noyse to be greatest: made a signall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought a pace, whereupon him selfe with his companie scaled the walles, and so wanne the cittie. But it appeareth here, that ambition ouercame him. For first he commaunded they should kill all the BRVTIANS, bicause it should not be knowen he had wonne the cittie by treason. But this bloudie policie failed him: for he missed not only of the glorie he looked for, but most deseruedly he had the reproche of crueltie and falsehood. At the taking of this cittie, a maruelous number of the TARENTINES were slaine, besides there were solde thirtie thousand of the D chiefest of them, & all the cittie was sacked: and of the spoyle thereof was caried to the common store treasure at ROME, three thousand talents. It is reported also, that when they dyd spoyle and carie awaye all other spoyles leste behinde, the recorder of the cittie asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to doe with the goddes, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius aunswered him. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their goddes that be angrie with them. This notwithstanding, he caried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstruous bignes, and caused it to be set vp in the Capitoll, and withall dyd set vp his owne image in brasse a horse backe by him. But in that act he shewed him self farre harder harted, then Marcellus had done, or to saye more truely, thereby he made the world knowe how muche Marcellus curtesie, clemencie, and bowntie was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life.
E Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was besieged, he marched presently with all speede possible to raise the seige: and they saye he had almost come in time, for he was with in 40. furlonges of the cittie when he vnderstoode the trothe of the taking of it. Then sayed he out alowd, sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal to: for as we wanne TARENTVM, so haue we lost it. But after that, to his friends he sayed priuately (and that was the first time they euer heard him speake it) that he sawe long before, and now appeared plainely, that they could not possibly with this small power keepe ITALIE. Fabius made his triumphe and entrie into ROME the seconde time, by reason of taking of this cittie: and his seconde triumphe was muche more honorable then the first, as of a valliant captaine that held out still with Hannibal, and easely met with all his fine policies. muche like the slight trickes of a cunning F wrestler, which caried not now the former roughenes and strength any more, bicause that his armie was geuen to take their ease, and growen to delicacie, partely through the great riches they had gotten, and partely also for that it was sore wasted and diminished, through the ſundrie foughten battells and blowes they had bene at. Now there was one A Martius Liuius a ROMAINE, that was gouernour of TARENTVM at that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheles kept the caſtell ſtill out of Hannibals handes, and ſo held it vntill the cittie came againe into the handes of the ROMAINES. This Liuius ſpighted to ſee ſuche honour done to Fabius, ſo that one daye in open Senate, being drowned with enuie and ambition, he burſt out and ſayed: that it was him ſelfe, not Fabius, that was cauſe of taking of the cittie of TARENTVM againe. Fabius ſmiling to heare him, aunſwered him openly: in Fabius wittie aunſwer. deede thou ſayeſt true, for if thou haddeſt not loſt it, I had neuer wonne it againe. But the ROMAINES in all other reſpects dyd greatly honour Fabius, and ſpecially for that they choſe his ſonne Conſul. He hauing alreadie taken poſſeſſion of his office, as he was diſpatching certen cauſes touching the warres, his father (whether it was for debilitie of his age, or to B proue his ſonne) tooke his horſe to come to him, and rode through the preaſe of people that thronged about him, hauing buſines with him. But his ſonne ſeeing him comming a farre of, would not ſuffer it, but ſent an officer of his vnto him, to commaund him to light of his horſe, and to come a foote if he had any thing to doe with the Conſul. This com-ſayed not a worde: thinking with them ſelues, that the Conſul dyd great wronge to his fathers greatnes. So he lighted ſtraight, and went a good rounde pace to embrace his ſonne, maund, vnderſtanding the authoritie of a Conſul, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct courſe, by the which we and our aunceſters haue increaſed the ROMAINE empire: C preferring euer the honour and ſtate of our countrie, aboue father, mother, or children. And truely they ſaye, that Fabius great grandfather being the greateſt and moſt noble perſone of ROME in his time, hauing fiue times bene Conſul, and had obteined many triumphes, for diuers honorable and ſundrie victories he had wonne: was contented after all theſe, to be his ſonnes lieutenaunt, and to goe to the warres with him, he being choſen Conſul. And laſt of all, the Conſul his ſonne returning home to ROME a conquerour, in his triumphing char-ret drawen with foure horſes, he followed him a horſe backe alſo, in troupe with the reſt:

thinking it honour to him, that hauing authoritie ouer his ſonne in the right of a father, and being alſo the nobleſt man of all the cittizens, ſo taken and reputed, neuertheles he willingly ſubmitted him ſelfe to the lawe and magiſtrate, who had authoritie of him. Yet beſides all D this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then thoſe already ſpoken of. But it fortuned that this ſonne of Fabius died before him, whoſe death he tooke paciẽtly, like a wiſe man, and a good father. Now the cuſtome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neereſt kinſeman ſhould make a funerall oration in their prayſe at their obſequies: he him ſelfe made the ſame oration in honour of his ſonne, and dyd openly ſpeake it in the market place, and moreouer wrote it, and deliuered it out abroade. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was ſent into SPAYNE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowen them in many battells, and had conquered many great cities, and greately aduaunced the honour and eſtimation of the ſtate of ROME: for the which at his returne, he was aſmuche, or rather more honoured, beloued and eſteemed, E Scipio Conſul. then any other that was in the cittie of ROME. Hereupon Scipio being made Conſul, conſidered that the people of ROME looked for ſome great matter at his handes, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight againſt Hannibal in ITALIE, he ſhould but followe the olde manner, and treade to muche in the ſteppes of the olde man: whereupon he reſolued immediately to make warres in AFRICKE, and to burne and deſtroye the countrie euen vnto CARTHAGE gates, and ſo to transferre the warres out of ITALIE into LIBYA, procuring by all poſſible deuiſe he could, to put it into the peoples heades, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarilie, perſuading him ſelfe Fabius was againſt the counſell and deuiſe of Scipio African. that the enterpriſe this young raſhe youthe tooke in hande, was vtterly to ouerthrowe the common weale, or to put the ſtate of ROME in great daunger: deuiſed to put ROME F in the greateſt feare he could poſſible, without ſparing ſpeache or dede he thought might ſerue for his purpoſe, to make the people chaunge from that minde. Now
he

A he could ſo cunningly worke his purpoſe, what with ſpeaking and doing, that he had drawen all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the ſecret enuie he bare to Scipioes glorie, that drue him to encounter this deuiſe, only to bleamiſh Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, leaſt if he ſhould happen to doe ſome honorable ſeruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwiſe to draw Hannibal out of ITALIE) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene to ſofte, or to negligent, to drawe this warre out to ſuche a length. For my parte, me thinkes the only matter that moued Fabius from the beginning to be againſt Scipio, was the great care he had of the ſafetie of the cõmon weale, by reaſon of the great daũger depending vpon ſuch a reſolution. And yet I doe thinke alſo, that afterwards he went further then he ſhould, contending to ſore againſt him (whether it was through ambition or obſtinacie)
B ſeeking to hinder and ſuppreſſe the greatnes of Scipio: conſidering alſo he dyd his beſt to perſuade Craſſus, Scipioes companion in the Conſulſhippe, that he ſhould not graunte vnto him the leading of the armie, but if he thought good to goe into AFRICKE, to make warres vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he ſhould rather goe him ſelf. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no money for maintenaunce of theſe warres. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furniſh him ſelfe as he could: he leauied great ſummes of money in the citties of THVSCAN, who for the great loue they bare him, made contribution towardes his iorney. And Craſſus remained at home, both bicauſe he was a ſofte, and no ambitious, nor contentious man of nature: as alſo, bicauſe he was the chiefeſt Prelate and highe biſhoppe, who by the lawe of their religion, was conſtrained to kepe ROME. Fabius ſeeing his labour loſt C that waye, tooke againe another courſe to croſſe Scipio, deuiſing to ſtaye the young men at home, that had great deſire to goe this iorney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all aſſemblies of the Senate & people, that Scipio was not contented only to flye Hannibal, but that he would carie with him beſides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youthe with ſweete baytes of vaine hope, and perſuading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their countrie, euen now when their enemie knocked at ROME gates, who dyd euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. Theſe wordes of Fabius dyd ſo dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio ſhould furniſhe his iorney only with the armie that was in SICILIA, ſauing that he might ſupply to them if he would, three hundred of the beſt ſouldiers that had ſerued him faithfully in SPAYNE. And ſo it doth appeare euen to this D preſent, that Fabius both dyd and ſayed all things, according to his wonted manner, and naturall diſpoſition. Now Scipio was no ſooner arriued in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exployes, and noble ſeruice done beyond meaſure: and of great ſpoyles taken by him, which argued the trothe of the newes. As, the king of the NVMIDIANS taken priſoner, two campes of the enemies burnt & deſtroyed at a time, with loſſe of a great number of people, armour, and horſes, that were conſumed in the ſame: letters and poſtes for life ronning in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, and to praye him to hunte no longer after vayne hope that would neuer haue ende, haſting him ſelfe with all ſpeede poſſible to come to the reſcue of his countrie. Theſe wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of ſuche renowme and fame within ROME, that there was E no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithſtanding deſiſted not to make a newe requeſt, being of opinion they ſhould ſend him a ſucceſſour, alledging no other cauſe nor reaſon, but a common ſpeache of euery bodie: that it was a daungerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, ſo great exceeding proſperitie and good ſucceſſe, bicauſe it is a rare matter to ſee one man happie in all things. Theſe wordes dyd ſo muche miſlike the people, that they thought him an enuious troubleſome man, or els they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his corage failed with his ſtrength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunte, that the peoples ioye and ſecuritie they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and miſtruſte: but gaue it out that then F they were in greateſt daunger, and that the common weale was breeding more miſchief now, then before. For when Hannibal (ſayed he) ſhall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE walles, the ROMAINES ſhall be leſſe able to abide him there, Craſſus, highe biſhoppe of Rome.

then they haue bene before: and Scipio moreouer, ſhall meete with an armie yet warme, and embrued with the bloude of ſo many Prætors, Dictators, and Conſuls of Rome, which they haue ouercome, and put to the ſword in Italie. With theſe vncomfortable ſpeaches, he ſtill troubled & diſquieted the whole cittie, perſuading them that notwithſtanding the warre was transferred out of Italie into Africke, yet that the occaſion of feare was no leſſe neere vnto Rome, then it was euer before. But within ſhorte ſpace after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hannibal in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pryde of Carthage, he brought a greater ioye to Rome, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victorie of his, he ſhored vp again the declining ſtate of the empire of Rome, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the ende of this warre, nor euer heard while he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrowe, neither were his yeres prolonged to ſee the happy aſſured proſperitie of his countrie: for about that time that Hannibal departed out of Italie, a ſicknes tooke him, whereof he dyed. The ſtories declare, that the Thebans buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people: bicauſe he dyed in ſo great pouertie, that when he was dead, they founde nothing in the houſe but a litle iron ſpit. Now the Romaines buried not Fabius ſo, at the common charge of the cittie, but euery man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charges, a pece of coyne that caried the leaſt value of their currant money: not for that he lacked abillitie to bring him to the grounde, but only to honour his memorie: in making his obſequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honorable ende and buriall.

THE COMPARISON OF Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written, of theſe two great perſones. And foraſmuche as they haue both left behinde them, many noble examples of vertue, aſwell in martiall matters, as in ciuill gouernmēt, let vs beginne to compare them together. Firſt of all, Pericles begāne to gouerne the common weale at what time the people of Athens were in their chiefeſt proſperitie, and of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or ſince. The which might ſeeme to be a cauſe of the continuall maintenance of the ſame in ſecuritie without daunger of falling, not ſo muche for their worthines, as for their common power and felicitie: where contrariwiſe Fabius acts fell out in the moſt diſhonorable & vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrie, in the which he dyd not only keepe the cittie in good ſtate from declining, but raiſed it vp, and deliuered it from calamitie, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and ſucceſſe, the victories and triumphes of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valliant dedes

A dedes of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cauſe to Peritles, to entertaine his cittie in feaſtes, and playes, whileſt he dyd gouerne the ſame: and he dyd not finde it in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe, that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to cõquer that againe which he had loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſawe before him many ouerthrowes, great flying awaye, muche murder, great ſlaughters of the generalles of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the playnes, the woddes filled with ſcattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds and riuers ronning all a gore bloude (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtreame carying downe the dead bodies to the mayne ſea: dyd take in hande the gouernment of his countrie, and a courſe farre contrarie to all other: ſo as he dyd vnderproppe and ſhore vp the ſame, that he kept it from flat falling to the grounde, amongeſt thoſe ruines and ouerthrowes other had B brought it to, before him. Yet a man maye ſaye alſo, that it is no great matter of difficultie to rule a cittie already brought lowe by aduerſitie, and which compelled by neceſſitie, is contented to be gouerned by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the inſolencie of a people, puſte vp with pryde, and preſumption of long proſperitie, as Pericles founde it amongeſt the ATHENIANS. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, dyd playnely ſhewe Fabius to be a graue and a conſtant man, which would neuer geue waye vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remoued from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning & recouering againe of TARENTVM, maye well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wanne by force: and the citties of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOEA: excepting the cittie of CAPVA, C which the Conſuls Fuluius and Appius recouered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius neuer wanne battell, ſaue that only for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet vp nine triumphes, of battels and victories he had wonne, aſwell by ſea as by lande. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an acte done by Pericles, as Fabius dyd, when he reſcued Minutius out of the handes of Hannibal, and ſaued a whole armie of the ROMAINES: which doubtles was a famous acte, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wiſdome, and an honorable harte. But Pericles, againe dyd neuer commit ſo groſſe an errour as Fabius dyd when he, was outreached, & deceyued by Hannibals fine ſtratageame of his oxen: who hauing founde his enemie by chaunce to haue ſhut him ſelfe vp in the ſtraight of a vallye, dyd ſuffer him to eſcape in the night by a ſubtiltie, & in the daye by playne force. For he was preuented by ouermuch delaye, D and fought withall by him he kept incloſed. Now if it be requiſite, a good captaine doe not only vſe well that he hath in his handes, but that he wiſely iudge alſo what will followe after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in ſuche ſorte, as Pericles ſayed they would come to paſſe: for with ambition to imbrace to muche, they ouerthrewe their eſtate. But the ROMAINES contrariwiſe, hauing ſent Scipio into AFRICKE to make warres with the CARTHAGINIANS, wanne all that they tooke in hande: where their generall dyd not ouercome the enemie by fortune, but by valliantnes. So that the wiſedome of the one is witneſſed, by the ruine of his countrie: and the errour of the other teſtified, by the happy euent of that he would haue let. Now the faulte is a like in a generall, to fall into daunger, for lacke of forecaſte: as for cowardlines to let ſlippe a fit oportunitie offred, to doe any notable pece of ſeruice. For like E defaulte and lacke of experience, maketh the one to hardie, and the other to fearefull. And thus muche touching the warres. Now for ciuill gouernment: it was a fowle blotte to Pericles, to be the author of warres. For it is thought, that he alone was the cauſe of the ſame, for that he would not haue them yeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any reſpect. And yet me thinkes Fabius Maximus alſo would no more geue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but ſtood firme & bold in all daũger, to mainteine thempire of his countrie againſt them. But the goodnes & clemency Fabius ſhewed vnto Minutius, doth much condẽne Pericles accuſations & practiſes, againſt Cimon and Thucydides: bothe of them being noble & good men, & taking parte with the Nobilitie, whõ he expulſed out of ATHENS, & baniſhed for a time. So was Pericles power & authoritie in the cõmon weale greater: by reaſon whereof he dyd euer foreſee, F that no generall in all his time dyd raſhely attempt any thing hurteful vnto the cõmon weale, except Tolmides onely: who fled from him, & in deſpight of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS where he was ſlaine. As for all other generals, they wholy put theſelues into his hãds, & dyd obey him for the greatnes of his authoritie. But Fabius, although for his parte he neuer committed any faulte, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet bicauſe he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it ſeemeth in this reſpect he was defectiue. For if Fabius had caried like authoritie in ROME, as Pericles dyd in ATHENS: the ROMAINES had not fallen into ſo great miſerie as they dyd. And for liberalitie: the one ſhewed it, in refuſing the money offred him: and the other, in geuing vnto thoſe that needed, and redeeming his poore captiue contry men. And yet Fabius might diſpend no great reuenue: for his whole receiptes came only to ſixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to ſaye howe riche he was, who had comming in to him, great preſents by his authoritie, aſwel of the ſubiects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as alſo of Kings and ſtraunge Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any perſone liuing. And to conclude, as for the ſumptuous building of temples, the ſtately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cæſars, they are not to be compared with thoſe, wherewith Pericles dyd beawtifie & adorne the cittie of ATHENS. For neither in qualitie nor quantitie was there any proportion or like compariſon, betweene the exceeding ſumptuouſnes of the one, and of the other.

THE LIFE OF Alcibiades.

Alcibiades ſtocke.

ALCIBIADES by his fathers ſide, was aunciently deſcended of Euryſaces, that was the ſonne of Aiax, and by his mothers ſide, of Alcmeon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed, and ſet forth a gallye, at his owne proper coſtes and charges, dyd winne great honour in the battell by ſea, that was fought alongeſt the coaſte of ARTEMISIVM, and he was ſlaine afterwardes in another battell fought at CORONEA, againſt the BOEOTIANS. His ſonne Alcibiades tutours, were Pericles, and Ariphron Xanthippus ſonnes: who were alſo his neere kinſemen. They ſaye, and truely: that Socrates good will and friendſhippe dyd greatly further Alcibiades honour. For it

A it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thrasibulus, & of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrarie, we finde the nource of Alcibiades, that she was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his schoolemaster was called Zopyrus: of the which, Antisthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beawtie, it made no matter if we speake not of it, yet I will a litle touche it by the waye: for he was wonderfull fayer, being a child, a boye, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruelous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides sayeth, that of all the fayer times of the yere, the Autumne or latter season is the fayrest: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in fewe other: for he was pas-

B sing fayer euen to his latter time, & of good temperature of bodie. They write of him also, that his tongue was somewhat fatte, and it dyd not become him ill, but gaue him a certen naturall pleasaunt grace in his talke: which Aristophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that dyd counterfeat a lisping grace with his tongue.

The mothers of famous we neuer knowen what they were.

Alcibiades beawtie.

Alcibiades lisped by nature.

This Alcibiades, vvith his fat lisping tongue, into mine eares, this trusty tale, and songe full often songe.
Looke vpon Theolus (quoth he) lo there he bovves, *beholde his comely crovvebright face vvith fat and*flatling blovves.*
The sonne of Clinias, vvould lispe it thus somevvhiles, and sure he lisped neuer a lye, but rightly hyt his vviles.

The equinocatiō of these two Greeke wordes* Κορα and Κολα, is harde to be expressed in Inglishe, in stead whereof I haue set flatling blowes, for flattering browes, obseruing the grace of lisping, as neere as I could, like to the Latin and French translations, likewise Theolus for Theorus.

C And Archippus another poet also, mocking the sonne of Alcibiades, sayeth thus,

Bicause he vvould be like his father euerie vvaye in his long trayling govvne he vvould goe ietting daye by daye.
And counterfeate his speache, his countenaunce and face:
as though dame nature had him geuen, therein a perfect grace.
To lispe and looke aside, and holde his head avvrye, euen as his father lookt and lispt, so vvould he prate and prye.

For his manners they altered and chaunged very oft with time, which is not to be wondred at, seing his maruelous great prosperitie, as also aduersitie that followed him afterwards. But of all the great desiers he had, and that by nature he was most inclined to, was ambition,

D seeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best persone: as appeareth by certaine of his dedes, and notable sayings in his youthe, extant in writing. One daye wrestling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue geuen him the fall: he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit so harde, as he would haue eaten it of. The other feeling him bite so harde, let goe his holde straight, and sayed vnto him: what Alcibiades, biteste thou like a woman? No mary doe I not (quoth he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boye, he played at skayles in the middest of the streete with other of his companions, and when his turne came about to throwe, there came a carte loden by chaunce that waye: Alcibiades prayed the carter to staye a while, vntill he had played out his game, bicause the skailes were set right in the high way where the carte should passe ouer. The carter

E was a stubborne knaue, and would not staye for any requeste the boye could make, but draue his horse on still, in so much as other boyes gaue backe to let him goe on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the grounde before the carte, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durste. The carter being afeard, plucked backe his horse to staye them: the neighbours flighted to see the daunger, ranne to the boye in all haste crying out. Afterwards when he was put to schoole to learne, he was very obedient to all his masters that taught him any thing, sauing that he disdained to learne to playe of the flute or recorder: saying, that it was no gentlemanly qualitie. For, sayed he, to playe on the vyoll with a sticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor disgraceth any gentleman: but otherwise, to playe on the flute, his countenaunce altereth and chaungeth so ofte, that his familliar friends can scant knowe him. Moreouer, the harpe or vyoll doth not let him

F that playeth on them, from speaking, or singing as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth so harde to it, that it taketh not only his wordes from him, but his voyce. Therefore, sayed he, let the children of the THEBANS playe on the flute, that cannot tell howe to ſpeake: as for vs ATHENIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectours and patrones of our countrie, the goddeſſe Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in olde time (as it is ſayed) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpon the flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging theſe reaſons, partely in ſporte, and partely in good earneſt: dyd not only him ſelfe leaue to learne to playe on the flute, but he turned his companions mindes alſo quite from it. For theſe wordes of Alcibiades, ranne from boye to boye incontinently: that Alcibiades had reaſon to deſpiſe playing of the flute, and that he mocked all thoſe that learned to play of it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to playe of the flute, was put out of the number of honeſt and liberall exerciſes, and the flute it ſelfe was thought a vile inſtrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accuſations Antiphon wrote againſt Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boye, he fled out of his tutours houſe, into the houſe of Democrates one of his louers, and howe Ariphron one of his tutours thought to haue made a beadle crie him through the cittie. But Pericles would not ſuffer him, ſaying: that if he were dead, they ſhould knowe it but one daye ſooner by crying of him: and if he were aliue, that it would be ſuch a ſhame to him while he liued, that he had bene better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The ſame Antiphon accuſeth him further, that he had killed a ſeruaunt of his that attended on him, in the wreſtling place of Sibyrtius, with a blowe of a ſtaffe. But there is no reaſon to credit his writing, who confeſſeth he ſpeaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he dyd beare him. Now ſtraight there were many great & riche men that made muche of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another ende and cauſe, which witneſſed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceyuing that vertue dyd appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beawtie of his face and bodye, and feating the corruption of riches, dignitie and authoritie, and the great number of his companions, aſwell of the chiefeſt of the cittie, as of ſtraungers, ſeeking to entiſe him by flatterie, and by many other pleaſures: he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to ſuffer ſo goodly an ympe to loſe the hope of the good fruite of his youthe. For fortune doth neuer ſo intangle nor ſnare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let & hinder him ſo, that philoſophie ſhould not take holde on him with her free, ſeuere, and quicke reaſons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, aſſayed with all delightes, and ſhut vp as it were in their companie that feaſted him with all pleaſures, only to turne him that he ſhould not hearken to Socrates wordes, who ſought to bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithſtanding, hauing a good naturall wit, knewe what Socrates was, and went to him, refuſing the companie of all his riche friendes and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familliar friendſhippe with Socrates. Whom when he had heard ſpeake, he noted his wordes very well, that they were no perſuaſions of a man ſeeking his diſhoneſty, but one that gaue him good counſell, & went about to reforme his faultes and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and preſumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe ſayeth, Socrates loue to Alcibiades.

Like to the crauen cocke, he drouuped douune his vuinges, vuhich couuardly doth ronne auuaye, or from the pit out flinges.

And dyd thinke with ſelfe, that all Socrates loue and following of young men, was in dede a thing ſent from the goddes, and ordeined aboue for them, whom they would haue preſerued, & put into the pathe waye of honour. Therefore be beganne to deſpiſe him ſelfe, and greatly to reuerẽce Socrates, taking pleaſure of his good vſing of him, & much imbraced his vertue: ſo as he had (he wiſt not howe) an image of loue grauen in his harte, or rather (as Plato ſayeth) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy & honeſt affection towards Socrates. Inſomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to ſee him commonly at Socrates borde, to playe, to wreſtle, & to lodge in the warres with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well willers, who could not ſo much as haue a good looke at his handes, and beſides became daungerous to ſome, as it is ſayed he was vnto Anytus, the ſonne of Anthemion, being one of thoſe that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certen ſtraungers his friendes that were come to ſee him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refuſed to goe. For he went to make merie with certen of his companions at his own houſe, and after he had well taken

A taken in his cuppes, he went to Anytus houſe to counterfeate the foole amongeſt them, and ſtaying at the halle doore, and ſeeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of ſiluer & gold, he commaunded his ſeruants to take awaye half of it, and carie it home to his houſe. But when he had thus taken his pleaſure, he would come no neerer into the houſe, but went his waye home. Anytus friendes and gueſtes miſliking this ſtraunge parte of Alcibiades, ſayed it was ſhamefully and boldly done ſo to abuſe Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, ſayed Anytus: for he hath left vs ſome, where he might haue taken all. All other alſo that made much of him, he ſerued after that ſorte. Sauing a ſtraunger that came to dwell in ATHENS: who being but a poore man as the voyce went, ſold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred ſtateres which he brought vnto Alcibiades, & prayed him to take it at his handes. Alcibiades beganne
B to be merie, and being very glad to vnderſtand his good will towards him, tooke his honeſt offer, and prayed him to come to ſupper to him: ſo he welcomed him very hartely, and made him good cheere. When ſupper was done, he gaue him his money againe, and commaunded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and landes of the cittie are wont to be let out to thoſe that byd moſt, and charged him he ſhould out byd all. The poore man would fayne haue excuſed him ſelf, ſaying, the farmes were to great for him to hyre: but Alcibiades threatned to whippe him, if he would not doe it. For beſides the deſire he had to pleaſure him, he bare a priuate grudge againſt the ordinary farmers of the cittie. The next morning the ſtraunger was ready in the market place, where they dyd crie out the letting of their farmes, and he raiſed one to a talent more, then all other dyd offer. The other farmers C were as mad with him as they could be, that they all dyd ſet vpon him, crying out: let him put in ſuertie ſtraight, ſuppoſing he could haue founde none. The ſtraunger was maruelous blancke thereat, and beganne to ſhrincke backe. Then cried Alcibiades out alowde to the officers that ſate there to take the beſt offers: I will be his ſuertie, ſayeth he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him ſaye ſo, were at their wittes ende, and wiſte not what to doe. For they being allwayes accuſtomed to paye their yerely rent as it went before, by the helpe of the reſt of the yeres that followed after: perceyuing now that they ſhould not be able to paye the arrerages of the rentes due to the common weale, and ſeeing no other remedie, they prayed him to take a pece of money, and to leaue the bargaine. Then Alcibiades would in no wiſe he ſhould take leſſe then a talent, which they gaue him willingly.
D So Alcibiades ſuffered the ſtraunger then to departe, and made him gaine by his deuiſe. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mightie and great aduerſaries, yet it dyd ſtaye much Alcibiades, ſomtime by his gentle nature, ſomtime by his graue counſell and aduiſe: ſo as the reaſon thereof tooke ſo deepe roote in him, and dyd ſo pearce his harte, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time alſo being caried awaye with the intiſement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleaſure and delightes, he ſtale awaye from Socrates, and made him ronne after him to fetche him againe, as if he had bene a E ſlaue that had ronne awaye from his maſters houſe: for Alcibiades ſtoode in awe of no man but of Socrates only, and in deede he dyd reuerence him, and dyd deſpiſe all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to ſaye, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers holde, which Socrates neuer ſought for: for to ſaye truely, Alcibiades was muche geuen ouer to luſt and pleaſure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides ment of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of bodie, and diſſolute of life. Thoſe that marred Alcibiades quite, dyd ſtill pricke forward his ambition and deſire of honour, and dyd put him in the head to thruſt him ſelfe into great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he dyd but once beginne to ſhewe him ſelfe to deale in matters of ſtate, he would not only bleamiſhe and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authoritie and power among the F GRÆCIANS. For like as iron by fire is made ſofte, to be wrought in to any forme, and by colde alſo doth ſhut and harden in againe: euen ſo Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanitie & opinion of him ſelf, as ofte as Socrates tooke him in hande, was made faſte & firme againe by his good perſuaſions, inſomuch that when he ſawe his owne faulte and follie, and how farre wide he had ſtrayed from vertue, he became ſodainely very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growen to mans ſtate, he went into a grammer ſchoole; and asked the ſchoolemaſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaſter aũſwered him, he had none of thē: Alcibiades vp with his fiſte, & gaue him a good boxe on the eare, & went his waye. Another grammarian tolde him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teache young men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: aunſwer was made him, he was not at leyſure now, for that he was buſilie occupied by him ſelf, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſayed he, going his waye: it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boye, he was at the iorney of POTIDÆA, where he laye ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battells and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one, very whotte & bloody, where they both fought valliantly, and Alcibiades was hurte. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and dyd defend him ſo valliantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies handes. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, bicauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates, bicauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honour, & would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore prayed the captaines to iudge him the crowne and complet armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receyued the ouerthrowe, Socrates retired with a fewe other a foote. Alcibiades being a horſe backe, and ouertaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and ſlue many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a boxe of the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the cittie, being a noble man borne, and of great poſſeſſions, which was done vpon a brauery and certaine luſtines, as hauing layed a wager with his companions he would doe it, and for no malice or quarrell that he bare the man. This light parte was ſtraight ouer all the cittie, and euery one that heard it, ſayed it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping him ſelfe before him, deliuered him his bodie to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwards in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſaye, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him: but Callias ſonne, with tenne talēts of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of his firſt child he had by her, he asked tenne talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leaſt this was an occaſiō ſought of him to lye in wayte to kill him for his goodes: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he dyed without heires ſpeciall of his bodie. This gētlewoman Hipparete, being an honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband dyd ſo muche miſuſe her, as to entertaine common light ſtrumpets, aſwell cittizens as ſtraungers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, and tolde him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, and made no further reckoning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorſe before the iudge. So ſhe went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce betwene them, according to the lawe: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hande, & caried her through the market place home to his houſe, and no man durſt medle betwene them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhe continued with him all the dayes of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe dyed, when Alcibiades was in his iorney he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, bicauſe it ſeemeth that the lawe was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife which would be diuorced from her husband, ſhould goe her ſelfe openly before the iudge to put vp her complainte, to the ende, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtaye her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruelous fayer great dogge, that coſt him three ſcore and tenne minas, and he cut of his taile that was his chief beawtie. When his friendes reproued him, and tolde him how euery man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and tolde them he had that he ſought. For, ſayeth he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſaye worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſayed, the firſt time that Hipparete ſueth to be diuorced from Alcibiades.

Alcibiades great dogge.

A that Alcibiades spake openly in the common weale, and beganne to deale in matters, was vpon a gifte of money he gaue to the people, and nos of any pretence, or former purpose he had to doe it. One daye as he came through the market place, hearing the people very lowde, he asked what the matter was: they tolde him it was about money certen men had geuen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them money out of his owne purse. The people were so glad at that, as they fell to showting and clapping of their handes, in token of thankfullnes: and him selfe was so glad for companie, that he forgat a quayle he had vnder his gowne, which was so afeard of the noyse, that she tooke her flight away. The people seeing the quayle, made a greater noyse then before, and many rose out of their places to runne after her: so that in the ende, it was taken vp by a master of a shippe called Antiochus, who brought B him the quayle againe, and for that cause Alcibiades dyd loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobilitie of his house, his goodes, his worthines, & the great number of his kinsemen & friends made his waye open to take vpon him gouernment in the common weale. Yet the only waye he desired to winne the fauour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets doe testifie it: and besides them, Demosthenes the prince of orators also doth saye, in an oration he made against Midias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we maye beleeue Theophrastus, the greatest searcher of antiquities, & best historiographer aboue any other philosopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a witte to deuise and consider what he would saye, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit somtimes studying what he should saye, as also to deliuer C good wordes, not hauing them very readilie at his tongues ende: he many times tooke breath by the waye, and paused in the middest of his tale, not speaking a worde, vntill he had called it to minde, that he would saye. His charge was great, and muche spoken of also, for keeping of ronning horses at games: not only bicause they were the best & swiftest, but for the number of coches he had besides. For neuer priuate persone, no nor any prince, that euer sent seuen so well appointed coches, in all furniture, vnto the games Olympicall, as he dyd: nor that at one course hath borne awaye the first, the second, and the fourth prise, as Thucydides sayeth: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euer striued for victorie therein. For Euripides pronounced his praise, in a songe he made of him, as followeth:

D O sonne of Clinias, I vvill resounde thy praise:

E Howbeit the good affection diuers citties did beare him, contending which should gratifie him best, dyd muche increase his fame and honour. For the Ephesians dyd set vp a tente for him, very sumptuously and richely furnished. Those of the cittie of Chio, furnished him with prouinder for his horse, and gaue him muttons besides, and other beastes to sacrifice withall. They of Lesbos also sent him in wine and other prouision for vittells, to helpe him to defraye the great charges he was at in keeping open house, & feeding such a nũber of mouthes daylie. Yet the spite they dyd beare him, or rather his breache of promise which he often made, with this magnificence and state he shewed, gaue the people more cause to speake of him then before. For they saye there was one Diomedes at Athens, a friend of Alcibiades, & no ill man, who desired once in his life to winne a game at the playes Olympicall. This man F being enformed that the Argiues had a coche excellently furnished, belonging to their cõmon weale, and knowing that Alcibiades could doe very much in the cittie of Argos, bicause he had many friends in the same: he came to intreate Alcibiades to buye this coche for him.

Alcibiades a breaker of promise.

ſchoolemaſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaſter aũſwered him, he had none of thẽ: Alcibiades vp with his fiſte, & gaue him a good boxe on the eare, & went his waye. Another grammarian tolde him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teache young men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: aunſwer was made him, he was not at leyſure now, for that he was buſilie occupied by him ſelf, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſayed he, going his waye: it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boye, he was at the iorney of POTIDÆA, where he laye ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battells and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one, very whotte & bloody, where they both fought valliantly, and Alcibiades was hurte. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and dyd defend him ſo valliantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies handes. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, bicauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates, bicauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honour, & would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore prayed the captaines to iudge him the crowne and complet armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receyued the ouerthrowe, Socrates retired with a fewe other a foote. Alcibiades being a horſe backe, and ouertaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and ſlue many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a boxe of the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the cittie, being a noble man borne, and of great poſſeſſions, which was done vpon a brauery and certaine luſtines, as hauing layed a wager with his companions he would doe it, and for no malice or quarrell that he bare the man. This light parte was ſtraight ouer all the cittie, and euery one that heard it, ſayed it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping him ſelfe before him, deliuered him his bodie to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwards in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſaye, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him: but Callias ſonne, with tenne talẽts of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of his firſt child he had by her, he asked tenne talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leaſt this was an occaſiõ ſought of him to lye in wayte to kill him for his goodes: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he dyed without heires ſpeciall of his bodie. This gẽtlewoman Hipparete, being an honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband dyd ſo muche miſuſe her, as to entertaine common light ſtrumpets, aſwell cittizens as ſtraungers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, and tolde him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, and made no further reckoning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorſe before the iudge. So ſhe went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce betwene them, according to the lawe: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hande, & caried her through the market place home to his houſe, and no man durſt medle betwene them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhe continued with him all the dayes of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe dyed, when Alcibiades was in his iorney he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, bicauſe it ſeemeth that the lawe was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife which would be diuorced from her husband, ſhould goe her ſelfe openly before the iudge to put vp her complainte, to the ende, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtaye her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruelous fayer great dogge, that coſt him three ſcore and tenne minas, and he cut of his taile that was his chief beawtie. When his friendes reproued him, and tolde him how euery man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and tolde them he had that he ſought. For, ſayeth he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſaye worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſayed, the firſt time that

A than Alcibiades spake openly in the common weale, and beganne to deale in matters, was vpon a gifte of money he gaue to the people, and not of any pretence, or former purpose he had to doe it. One daye as he came through the market place, hearing the people very lowde, he asked what the matter was: they tolde him it was about money certen men had geuen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them money out of his owne purse. The people were so glad at that, as they fell to showting and clapping of their handes, in token of thankfullnes: and him selfe was so glad for companie, that he forgat a quayle he had vnder his gowne, which was so afeard of the noyse, that she tooke her flight away. The people seeing the quayle, made a greater noyse then before, and many rose out of their places to runne after her: so that in the ende, it was taken vp by a master of a shippe called Antiochus, who brought B him the quayle againe, and for that cause Alcibiades dyd loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobilitie of his house, his goodes, his worthines, & the great number of his kinsemen & friends made his waye open to take vpon him gouernment in the common weale. Yet the only waye he desired to winne the fauour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets doe testifie it: and besides them, Demosthenes the prince of orators also doth saye, in an oration he made against Midias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we maye beleeue Theophrastus, the greatest searcher of antiquities, & best historiographer aboue any other philosopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a witte to deuise and consider what he would saye, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit somtimes studying what he should saye, as also to deliuer C good wordes, not hauing them very readilie at his tongues ende: he many times tooke breath by the waye, and paused in the middest of his tale, not speaking a worde, vntill he had called it to minde, that he would saye. His charge was great, and muche spoken of also, for keeping of ronning horses at games: not only bicause they were the best & swiftest, but for the number of coches he had besides. For neuer priuate persone, no nor any prince, that euer sent seuen so well appointed coches, in all furniture, vnto the games Olympicall, as he dyd: nor that at one course hath borne awaye the first, the second, and the fourth prise, as Thucydides saieth: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euer striued for victorie therein. For Euripides pronounced his praise, in a songe he made of him, as followeth:

E Howbeit the good affection diuers citties did beare him, contending which should gratifie him best, dyd muche increase his fame and honour. For the Ephesians dyd set vp a tente for him, very sumptuously and richely furnished. Those of the cittie of Chio, furnished him with prouinder for his horse, and gaue him muttons besides, and other beastes to sacrifice withall. They of Lesbos also sent him in wine and other prouision for vittells, to helpe him to defraye the great charges he was at in keeping open house, & feeding such a nũber of mouthes daylie. Yet the spite they dyd beare him, or rather his breache of promise which he often made, with this magnificence and state he shewed, gaue the people more cause to speake of him then before. For they saye there was one Diomedes at Athens, a friend of Alcibiades, & no ill man, who desired once in his life to winne a game at the playes Olympicall. This man F being enformed that the Argiues had a coche excellently furnished, belonging to their cõmon weale, and knowing that Alcibiades could doe very much in the cittie of Argos, bicause he had many friends in the same: he came to intreate Alcibiades to buye this coche for him.

Alcibiades thereupon bought it, but kept it to him ſelfe, not regarding Diomedes requeſt he had made. Diomedes ſeeing that fell ſtarke mad for anger, and called the goddes & men to witneſſes, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it ſeemeth, that there fell out ſuite in lawe vpon the ſame. For Iſocrates wrote an oration, and drue a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a childe, touching a couple of horſes: yet in this plea, his aduerſarie was called Tiſias, and not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practiſe and pleade publikly, he put all other Oratours to ſilence, but only two that were euer againſt him: the one was Phæax the ſonne of Eraſiſtratus, and the other Nicias, the ſonne of Niceratus. Of theſe two, Nicias was a man growen, and had wonne the name & reputation of a good captaine. And Phæax beganne alſo to come forward as he dyd, being of a good and honorable houſe: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence ſpecially. For, he could more properly talke and diſcourſe among his friends priuately, then he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis ſayeth:

Alcibiades aduerſaries in the commō wealth when he came to pleade.

Phæax lacked eloquence.

VVordes enovve, but no eloquence.

There is a certen oration extant in writing, againſt Alcibiades and Phæax: where among other acculations is brought in, howe Alcibiades was ordinarily ſerued in his houſe, with gold & ſiluer plate that belonged to the cōmon weale, and which were vſed to be borne for ſtate & magnificence, in ſolemne proceſſions before them, and how he vſed them as boldly, as if they had bene his owne. Now there was one Hyperbolus in Athens at that time borne in the village of Perithoide: of whom Thucydides maketh mencion, as of a naughty wicked man, whoſe tongue was a fit inſtrument to deliuer matter to all the Comicall poets of that time, to poore out all their tawnts and mockes againſt men. Howbeit he was ſo impudent a perſone, and cared ſo litle what men ſayed of him, that he paſſed not though he were defamed, neither dyd any thing greue him, whatſoeuer they reported of him: which ſome doe call boldnes, and corage, being no better in deede then plaine impudencie, extreme madnes, and deſperate follie. He would neuer pleaſe any man: & if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magiſtrate, whom they would any waye accuſe, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their inſtrument to vtter their ſpyte. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being aſſembled, were ready to proceede to the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon by moſt voyces. The manner & cuſtome of this kynde of baniſhment was for a time to baniſh out of their cittie ſuch a one, as ſeemed to haue to great authoritie and credit in the cittie: and that was, rather to ſatisfie their enuie, then for to remedy their feare. And bicauſe it was manifeſt it would fall out to one of them three to be baniſhed (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phæax) Alcibiades found meanes to ioyne all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another: and hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus ſelf to be baniſhed, who was the chief inſtrument to prepare the waye of their baniſhment. Howbeit other ſaye, he ſpake not with Nicias about it, but with Phæax, and ioyning his parte with Phæax, he cauſed Hyperbolus to be baniſhed, who feared nothing leſſe: for it was neuer ſeene before, that a man of meane countenaunce, and of ſmall authoritie, fell into the happe of this baniſhment. As Plato the Comicall poet teſtifieth, ſpeaking of Hyperbolus.

Hyperbolus baniſhed for 10. yeres.

The manner of the puniſhment of the Oſtraciſmon.

Although for his deſerts, this payne to him is due,
or greater punishment prepard, the vvhich might make him rue:
Yet ſince he vvas by birth, a perſone meane and baſe, ſuch punishment therefore dyd ſeeme (for him) to great of grace.
Since Oſtraciſmon vvas, not made at firſt to be, nor yet deuiſde as punishment, for ſuche meane folke as he.

But of this matter, we haue ſpoken more at large before: and now to returne againe to Alcibiades. Nicias had great reputation among ſtraungers, and his enemies greued at it no leſſe, then at the honour the cittizens ſelues dyd vnto him. For his houſe was the common inne for all Lacedæmonians when they came to Athens, and they euer laye with him: moreouer he had very well entertained the Lacadæmon priſoners that were taken at the ſorte of Pyle. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene Lacedæmon and Athens, and their priſoners redeliuered home againe by Nicias meanes only & procurement: they they loued him more then euer they dyd before. This was blowen abroade through GREECE, that Pericles had kindled the warres amongest them, and Nicias had quenched it: so some called this peace Nicium, as one would saye, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades sto- making this, and enuying Nicias glorie, determined to breake the peace whatsoeuer came of it. Wherefore to compasse this matter, knowing first of all that the ARGIVES had no liking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they dyd but seeke matter to fall out with them: he secretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreouer he dyd persuade them to it, both by letters and worde of mouthe, speaking with the magistrates, and suche as had greatest authoritie and credit amongest the people: declaring vnto them, that they should not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeld to them at all, but to sticke to the ATHENIANS, who would sone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwardes when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the cittie of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and spoyled, contrarie to the league: Alcibiades perceyuing how the people were muche offended thereat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in disgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of great likelyhood. As at that time, when he was generall: that he would neuer take any of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were shut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and muche lesse distresse them when he might: and moreouer that when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had founde the meanes to deliuer them, and send them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friende, he dyd not his duety to dissuade the people from making of league offensiue, and defensiue with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe also, if there were any people of GREECE that had a desire to become friendes and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he dyd the best he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in disgrace with the people, for the causes aboue sayd: in the middest of this sturre, ambassadours came by chaunce from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their comming gaue very good wordes, saying they had full power and commission to compound all controuersies, vnder reasonable and equall conditions. The Senate heard them, and receaued them very curteously, and the people the next daye should assemble in counsell to geue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing muche, he went to labour the ambassadours, and spake with them aparte in this sorte. What meane you, my Lordes of SPARTA: doe ye not knowe that the Senate hath allwayes accustomed to be gracious and fauorable vnto those that sue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarilie are of a prowde nature, and desirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the first sighte, ye doe geue them to vnderstand that you are come hither with full power, to treate freely with them in all manner of causes: doe you not thinke that they make you stretche your authoritie farre, to graunte them all that they will demaunde. Therefore, my Lordes ambassadours, if you looke for indifferencie at the ATHENIANS handes, and that they shall not preasse you to farre against your willes, to graunte them any thing of aduantage: I would wishe you a litle to couer your full commission, and in open manner to propound certen articles, and reasonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my parte, I will assure you of my good will in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had tolde them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promise, and vowed as it were to performe his worde. Herevpon Alcibiades turned the Ambassadours from the trust they reposed in Nicias, and wanne them on his side: in so muche as they geue credit to no man but to him, wondering muche at his great wisedome and readye wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were assembled to geue the ambassadours audience. They were sent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their comming. They answered that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then Nicias preach Alcibiades breaketh the peace of the Gracians.

Alcibiades beguileth the Lacedæmonians.

beganne Alcibiades to be angrie with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he vnto them: calling them vnfaithfull, vnconstant, and fickle men, that were come neither to doe nor saye any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughely: whereat Nicias was so ashamed and amased withall, that he could not tell what to saye, to see so sodaine a chaunge, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and subtill practise with the ambassadours. So the ambassadours of LACEDÆMON were dispatched, without any thing done, and Alcibiades chosen generall: who presently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, and the MANTINIANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man dyd commend this practise of his, in working it after this sorte: yet was it a maruelous thing of him to deuise to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, and to procure such a number of souldiers against the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he dyd before the cittie of MANTINEA, and to shifte of the miseries of warre and hazard of battell, so farre from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDÆMONIANS dyd winne, could not profit them muche: and if they lost it, they could hardely saue their cittie of SPARTA. After this battell of MANTINEA, the thousand men whom the cittie by an auncient order dyd keepe continually in paye, aswell in peace as in warre, within the cittie of ARGOS, thinking now oportunitie serued them very trimly: attempted to take the soueraine authoritie from the common people, and to make them selues Lords of the cittie. And to bring this to passe, the LACEDÆMONIANS comming in the meane time, dyd ayde them in their purpose, and so dyd put downe the gouernment of the people: notwithstanding, immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades comming thither euen at that time, dyd warrant them the victorie, and to set vp againe the authoritie of the people. Then he persuaded them to make their walles longer to ioyne their cittie to the sea, to the ende they might more easely be ayded by sea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many carpinters, masons, stone hewers, and other workemen: and to conclude, he shewed them by all the meanes and wayes he could, that he dyd beare good will vnto them, and thereby wanne him selfe no lesse fauour particularly emong them, then generally he dyd good vnto his countrie. He dyd persuade also the cittizens of PATRAS to ioyne their towne to the sea, by making long walles, which they built out euen to the clyffes of the sea. And when one sayed vnto them, alas, poore people of PATRAS, what doe ye meane? the ATHENIANS will eate you out. Alcibiades aunswered him, it maye well be, but it shalbe by litle and litle, beginning first at the feete: but the LACEDÆMONIANS will deuoure you all at once, and beginne at the head. Now although Alcibiades dyd make the cittie of ATHENS strong by sea, yet he dyd not leaue to persuade the ATHENIANS also, to make them selues strong by lande. For he dyd put the young men oftentimes in minde of the othe they were made to sweare in AGRAVLOS, and dyd aduise them to accomplishe it in deede. Which was, that they should take all corne fields, vines, and olyue trees, to be the borders and confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all lande theirs, that was manured, and dyd bring forth fruite. Yet with all these goodly dedes and fayer wordes of Alcibiades, and with this great corage and quicknes of vnderstanding, he had many great faultes and imperfections. For he was to daintie in his fare, wantonly geuen vnto light women, riotous in bankets, vaine and womanishe in apparell: he ware euer a long purple gowne that swept the market place as he walked vp and downe, it had suche a traine, and was so riche and costely for him to weare. And following these vaine pleasures and delightes, when he was in his galley, he caused the planckes of the poope thereof to be cutte and broken vp, that he might lye the softer: for his bed was not layed apon the ouerloppe, but laye vpon girthes strained ouer the hole, cut out and fastened to the sides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded scutchion, wherein he had no cognizaunce nor ordinary deuise of the ATHENIANS, but only had the image of Cupide in it, holding lightning in his hande. The noble men, and best cittizens of ATHENS perceyuing this, they hated his facions and conditions, and were muche offended at him, and were afeard withall of his rashnes and insolencie: he dyd so contemne the lawes and customes of their countrie, being manifest tokens of a man that aspired to be King, and would subuert and turne all ouer hand. And as for the good will

Alcibiades chosen generall.

The walles brought to the sea by the Argiues.

Alcibiades ryot.

A good will of the common people towards him, the poet Aristophanes doth plainely expresse it in these wordes:

The people most desire, vvhat most they hate to haue:
and vvhat their minde abhorres, euen that they seeme to craue.

And in another place he sayed also, aggrauating the suspition they had of him.

For state or common vveale, muche better should it be, to keepe vvithin the countrie none suche lyons lookes as he.
But if they nedes vvill keepe a lyon to their cost, then must they nedes obeye his vvill, for he vvill rule the roste.

For to saye truely: his curtesies, his liberallities, and noble expences to shewe the peo-B ple so great pleasure and pastime as nothing could be more: the glorious memorie of his auncestors, the grace of his eloquence, the beawtie of his persone, the strength and valliant-nes of his bodie, ioyned together with his wisedome and experience in marshall affayers, were the very causes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS dyd paciently endure all his light partes, and dyd couer his faultes, with the best wordes and termes they could, calling them youthfull, and gentlemens sportes. As when he kept Agartharchus the painter prisoner in his house by force, vntill he had painted all his walles within: and when he had done, dyd let him goe, and rewarded him very honestly for his paines. Againe when he gaue a boxe of the eare to Taureas, who dyd paye the whole charges of a companie of common players, in spite of him, to carie awaye the honour of the C games. Also when he tooke awaye a young woman of MELIA by his authoritie, that was taken among certaine prisoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a childe, which he caused to be brought vp. Which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burdened him, that he was the only cause of murdering of the poore MELIANS, sauing the litle children, bicause he had fauored and persuaded that vnnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewise where phos Aristophon a painter, had painted a curtisan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and sitting in her lappe, which all the people ranne to see, and tooke great pleasure to behold it: the graue and auncient men, were angrie at these foolishe partes, accompting them impudent things, and done against all ciuill modestie and temperancie. Wherefore it seemed Archestratus words
D were spoken to good purpose, when he sayed, that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a daye as he came from the counsaill and assembly of the citie, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obteined the thing he desired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon, surnamed Misanthropus (as who would saye, Loup-garou, or the manhater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, dyd not passe by him, nor gaue him waye (as he was wont to doe to all other men) but went straight to him, and tooke him by the hande, and sayed, O, thou dost well my sonne, I can thee thancke, that thou goest on, and climest vp still: for if euer thou be in authoritie, woe be vnto those that followe thee, for they are vtterly vndone. When they heard these wordes, those that stoode by fell a E laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his wordes, and thought of them many a time after, suche sundry opinions they had of him for the vnconstantie of his life, and waywardnes of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of SICILIA, the ATHENIANS dyd maruelously couet it in Pericles life, but yet they dyd not medle with all, vntill after his death: and then they dyd it at the first vnder cullor of friendshippe, as ayding those cities which were oppressed, and spoyled by the SYRACVSANS. This was in maner a plaine bridge made, to passe afterwardes a greater power and armie thither. Howbeit the F only procurer of the ATHENIANS, and persuader of them, to send small companies thither no more, but to enter with a great armie at once to conquer all the countrie together, was Alcibiades: who had so allured the people with his pleasaunt tongue, that vpon his persuasion, they built castells in the ayer, and thought to doe greater wonders, by winning only of SICILIA. For where other dyd set their mindes vpon the conquest of SICILIA, Alcibiades the author of the warres in Sicilia.

being that they only hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enter- A prises. And where Nicias commonly in all his persuasions, dyd turne the ATHENIANS from their purpose to make warres against the SYRACVSANS, as being to great a matter for them to take the cittie of SYRACVSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reache in his head, to goe conquer LIBYA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to passe from thence into ITALIE, and so to PELOPONNESVS: so that SICILIA should serue but to furnishe them with vittells, and to paye the souldiers for their conquestes which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently caried awaye with a maruelous hope and opinion of this iorney, and gaue good eare to olde mens tales that tolde them wonders of the countries: insomuche as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to set rounde together, drawe plattes of SICILE, and des- B cribe the situation of LIBYA and CARTHAGE. And yet they saye, that neither Socrates the philosopher, nor Meton the astronomer dyd euer hope to see any good successe of this iorney. For the one by the reuealing of his familliar spirite, who tolde him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: & Meton, whether it was for the feare of the successe of the iorney he had by reason, or that he knew by diuination of his arte what would followe, he counterfeated the mad man, & holding a burning torche in his hand, made as though he would haue set his house a fyer. Other saye, that he dyd not counterfeate, but like a mad ma in deede dyd set his house a fyre one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to praye the people, that in consideration of his great losse and his grie-uous calamitie so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his sonne for going C this voyage. So by this mad deuise, he obteined his request of the people for his sonne, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these warres: who misliked this iorney, aswell for his companion and associate in the charge of these warres, as for other misfortunes he foresawe therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they dyd not commit it wholy to Alcibiades rashnes and hardines, but dyd ioyne with him the wisedome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third captaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat olde, as one that had shewed him selfe no lesse venturous and hardie in some battells, then Alcibiades him selfe. Now when they came to resolue of the number of souldiers, the furniture and order of these warres, Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iorney, and to breake D it of altogether: but Alcibiades withstoode him, and gate the better hande of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moued the people also that the captaines whom they had chosen for these warres, might haue full power and authoritie to leauy men at their discretion, and to make suche preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condescended, and dyd authorise them. But when they were euen readie to goe their waye, many signes of ill successe lighted in the necke one of another: and amongest the rest this was one. That they were commaunded to take shippe, on the daye of the celebration of the feast of Adonia, on the which the custome is, that women doe set vp in diuers places of the cittie, in the middest of the streates, images, like to dead corses which they carie to buriall, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funeralles of the E dead, with blubbering, and beating them selues, in token of the sorowe the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis. Moreouer, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercurie, and were wont to be set vp in euery lane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled specially in their faces: but this put diuers in great feare and trouble, yea euen those that made no accompt of suche toyes. Whereupon it was alledged that it might be the CORINTHIANS that dyd it, or procured that lewde acte to be done, fauoring the SYRACVSANS, who were their neere kynsemen, and had bene the first fownders of them, imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake of the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hande. Ne-uertheles, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their wordes that sayed, F they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, and that they were but some light brai-ned youthes, that being tippled, had played this shamefull parte in their brauerie, or for sporte.

The diuination of Socrates & Meton.

Images hewē and mangled at Athens.

But

A But for all these reasons, they tooke these signes very greuously, and were in deede not a litle afeard, as thinking vndoutedly that no man durst haue bene so bolde to haue done suche an abhominable facte, but that there was some conspiracie in the matter. Hereupon they looked apon euery suspition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely soeuer it were) and that very seuerely: and both Senate and people also met in counsell vpon it very ofte, and in a fewe dayes. Now whilest they were busilie searching out the matter, Androcles a common counseller, and orator in the common wealth, brought before the counsell certaine slaues and straungers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that sorte, and in a mockerie had counterfeated also in a banket that he made, the ceremonies
B of the holy mysteries, declaring these matters particularly. How one Theodorus counterfeated the herauld, that is wonte to make the proclamations: Polytion the torche bearer, and Alcibiades the priest, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries: and that his other companions were the assistantes, as those that make sute to be receyued into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. These very wordes are written in the accusation Thessalus (Cimons sonne) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddesses, Ceres, & Proserpina. Whereat the people being maruelously moued and offended, and the orator Androcles his mortall enemie aggrauating & stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a litle at the first beganne to be amased at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were C prepared for the voyage of SICILIA, and the souldiers also that were gathered, dyd beare him great good will, and specially how the ayde, and that bande that came from ARGOS, and Mantinea (being a thousand footemen, well armed and appointed) dyd saye openly, how it was for Alcibiades sake they dyd take vpon them so long a voyage beyond sea, & that if they went about to doe him any hurte or wrong, they would presently returne home againe from whence they came: he beganne to be of a good corage againe, and determined with this good fauorable oportunitie of time, to come before the counsell, to aunswer to all suche articles and accusations as should be layed against him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing least the people in this iudgement would haue shewed him more fauour, bicause they stoode in nede of him. Wherefore to preuent this daunger, they D had fed other Oratours who set a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, and yet bare him no lesse good will, then the rankest enemies he had. These fine fellowes rose vp in open assembly, and sayed: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the generalles of so mightie and puissant an armie (being ready to hoyse sayle and the ayde also of their allies and friendes) should be driuen to staye now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilest they should goe about to choose iudges, and appointe him his howres and time of aunswer. Therefore, they sayed, it was fit he should take his iorney betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present him selfe to requier iustice, and to purge him selfe of suche matters as should be obiected against him. But Alcibiades smelling streight their fetche, and perceyuing the practise of his staye, stept vp,
E and declared how they dyd him great wrong, to make him departe with the charge of a generall of so great an armie, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, as he should leaue apon him: and that he deserued death, if he could not purge and iustifie him selfe, of all the vniust and surmised accusations against him. And if he had once clered him selfe of all thinges, and had published his innocencie: he should then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to goe on lustely to fight with his enemies, and to cast behinde him the daunger of all his slaunderous detracters. But all this could not persuade them. And so he was presently commaunded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke, & shippe awaye his men. Thus he was compelled to take the seas with his other companions, hauing in their nauie about a hundred and forty gallyes, all hauing three F owers to a bancke: & fiue thousand one hundred footemen very well armed and appointed, & throwers with slinges, archers, & other light armed men to the number of thirteene hundred, sufficiently furnished of all warlicke and necessarie munition. Now after they were arriued on the coaſte of ITALIE, they landed in the cittie of RHEGIO: where, holding counſell in what ſorte they ſhould direct theſe warres, it was reſolued in the ende that they ſhould goe ſtraight vnto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias dyd contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his conſent thereunto: and at his firſt comming, he was the occaſion of winning the cittie of CATANA. But he neuer after dyd any exployte, for he was called home immediatly by the ATHENIANS, to come and aunſwer certaine accuſations layed to his charge. For as we tolde you before, there was at the beginning, certaine light ſuſpitions and accuſations put vp againſt him, by ſome ſlaues and ſtraungers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burdened him more cruelly, adding to his former faulte, that he had broken the images of Mercurie: and had committed ſacriledge in counterfeating in ieaſt and mockery the holy ceremonies of the myſteries: and blue into the eares of the people, that both the one and the other proceeded of one ſet conſpiracie, to chaunge and alter the gouernment of the ſtate of the cittie. Vpon theſe informations, the people tooke it in ſo ill parte, that they committed all to priſone, that were in any ſorte accuſed or ſuſpected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their aunſwer: and moreouer dyd much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon ſo great complaintes and informations as were exhibited againſt him, while his offenſe was in queſtion before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was ſuch towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their daunger, they were the worſe handled for his ſake. Thucydides dyd not name his accuſers, but ſome other doe name Dioclides and Teucer: amongeſt whom, Phrynicus the Comicall poet is one, who diſcouereth it in his verſes, by bringing in one that ſpeaketh thus to the image of Mercury.

Phrynicus the Comicall poet.

My good friend Mercury, I praye thee take good heede, that thou fall not, and breake thy necke: for ſo thou mightſt me breede, both daunger and diſtruſt, and though I giltles be, ſome Dioclides falſely might accuſe and trouble me.
Mercury aunſwereth.
Take thou no thought for me, my ſelfe I ſhall vvell ſaue:
and vvill foreſee full vvell therevvith that Teucer (that falſe knaue) ſhall not the money get, vvhich he by lavve hath vvonne, for his promovvters bribing parte, and accuſation.

And yet for all this, theſe tokens doe ſhowe no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, howe he could knowe them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced theſe images? he aunſwered, that he knewe them well enough by the brightnes of the moone. And hereby it appeareth playnely that he was periured, bicauſe that the ſame night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the moone. This dyd a litle trouble and ſtaye men of iudgement: howbeit the common ſorte of people this notwithſtanding, dyd not leaue to be as ſharpe ſet, to receyue all accuſations and informations, that were brought in againſt him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the priſoners whoſe cauſe was hanging before them, the orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the hiſtoriographer deſcribeth to deſcend of the race of Vlyſſes) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the gouernment of the common people, and bent altogether to fauour the ſmall number of the nobilitie. But one of the chiefeſt occaſions why he was ſuſpected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his houſe there was a fayer great image ſet vp in olde time, by the familie or tribe of the Ægeides, and that alone amongeſt all the reſt of ſo many famous images, was lefte whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this daye, the Mercury of Andocides, and is ſo called generally of euery bodye, albeit the inſcription ſheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in priſone, chaunced to fall in acquaintaunce with one Timæus, with whom he was more familliar then with all the reſt, who was alſo priſoner with him for the ſelf cauſe. This Timæus was a man not ſo well knowen as he, but beſides, a wiſe man, and very hardie. He perſuaded him, and put into his head, that he ſhould accuſe him ſelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confeſſing it, he ſhould receyue grace & pardone, according to the courſe and promiſe of the lawe. Where contrarilie, if he ſhould

A ſtande vpon the curteſie of the iudges ſentence, he might eaſely endaunger him ſelf: bicauſe iudgements in ſuch caſes are vncertaine to all people, and moſt to be doubted and feared toward the riche. And therefore he told him it were his beſt waye, if he looked into the matter wiſely, by lying to ſaue his life, rather then to ſuffer death with ſhame, and to be condemned apon this falſe accuſation. Alſo he ſayed if he would haue regarde to the cõmon wealth, that it ſhould in like caſe be wiſely done of him, to put in daunger a fewe of thoſe (which ſtood doubtfull whether in trothe they were any of them or not) to ſaue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honeſt men, who in deede were innocent of this lewde fact. Timæus wordes and perſuaſions wrought ſuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeld vnto them, & brought him to accuſe him ſelfe, & certaine other with him: by meanes where-

B of Alcibiades according to the lawe had his pardone. But all ſuche as he named and accuſed, were euery man put to death, ſauing ſuche as ſaued them ſelues by ronning awaye. Furthermore, to ſhadowe his accuſation with ſome apparaunce of trothe, Andocides among thoſe that were accuſed, dyd accuſe alſo certen of his owne ſeruaunts. Now though the people had no more occaſion to occupie their buſie heades about the breakers of theſe images, yet was not their malice thus appeaſed againſt Alcibiades, vntill they ſent the galley called Salaminiana, commaunding thoſe they ſent by a ſpeciall cõmiſſion to ſeeke him out, in no caſe to attempt to take him by force, nor to laye holde on him by violence: but to vſe him with all the good wordes and curteous manner that they poſſibly could, & to will him only to appeare in perſone before the people, to aunſwer to certaine accuſations put vp againſt him. If otherwiſe

Alcibiades ſent for to abſwer to his accuſation.

C they ſhould haue vſed force, they feared muche leaſt the armie would haue mutined on his behalfe within the countrie of their enemies, and that there would haue growen ſome ſedition amongeſt their ſouldiers. This might Alcibiades haue eaſely done, if he had bene diſpoſed. For the ſouldiers were very ſorie to ſee him departe, perceyuing that the warres ſhould be drawen out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, ſeeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only ſpurre that pricked Nicias forward to doe any ſeruice: and that Lamachus alſo, though he were a valliant man of his handes, yet he lacked honour and authoritie in the armie, bicauſe he was but a meane man borne, and poore beſides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, diſapointed the ATHENIANS of winning the cittie of MESSINA: for they hauing intelligence by certaine priuate perſones within the cittie, that it would yeld vp into

D their handes, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto thoſe that were the SYRACVSANS friendes: whereupon all this practiſe was broken vtterly. Afterwards when he came to the cittie of THVRIES, ſo ſone as he had landed, he went and hid him ſelfe incontinently in ſuche ſorte, that ſuch as ſought for him, could not finde him. Yet there was one that knewe him where he was, and ſayed: Why, how now Alcibiades, dareſt thou not truſt the iuſtice of thy countrie? Yes very well (ꝙ he) and it were in another matter: but my life ſtanding vpon it, I would not truſt mine own mother, fearing leaſt negligẽtly ſhe ſhould put in the blacke beane, where ſhe ſhould caſt in the white. For by the firſt, condemnation of death was ſignified: and by the other, pardone of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, ꝙ he, they ſhall knowe I am yet aliue.

E Now the manner of his accuſation and inditement framed againſt him, was found written in this ſorte. Theſſalus the ſonne of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accuſed, and doth accuſe Alcibiades, the ſonne of Clinias, of the village of SCAMBONIDES, to haue offended againſt the goddeſſes, Ceres & Proſerpina, counterfeating in mockery their holy myſteries, & ſhewing them to his familliar friends in his houſe, him ſelfe apparrelled and arrayed in a long veſtemẽt or cope, like vnto the veſtemẽt the prieſt weareth when he ſheweth theſe holy ſacred myſteries: & naming him ſelfe the prieſt, Polytion the torche bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PHYGEA the verger, & the other lookers on, brethern, and fellowe ſcorners with them, & all done in manifeſt contẽpt & deriſion, of holy ceremonies and myſteries of the Eumolpides, the religious prieſts & miniſters of the ſacred tẽple of the cittie of ELEVSIN. So Alcibiades for

F his contẽpt & not appearing, was condẽned, and his goodes confiſcate. Beſides this condemnation, they decreed alſo, that all the religious prieſtes & women ſhould bãne & accurſe him. But hereunto aunſwered, one of the Nunnes called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of Aoravla, saying: that she was professed religious, to praye and to blesse, not to curse and banne. After this most grieuous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades, departed out of the cittie of Thvries, & went into the countrie of Peloponnesvs; where he continued a good season in the cittie of Argos. But in the ende fearing his enemies, and hauing no hope to returne againe to his owne countrie with any safety: he sent vnto Sparta to haue safe conduct and licence of the Lacedæmonians, that he might come and dwell in their countrie, promising them he would doe them more good being now their friend, then he euer dyd them hurte, while he was their enemie. The Lacedæmonians graunted his request, & receyued him very willingly into their cittie: where euen vpon his first comming, he dyd three things. The first was: That the Lacedæmonians by his persuasion & procurement, dyd determine speedily to send ayde to the Syracvsans, whom they had long before delayed: & so they sent Gylippus their captaine, to ouerthrowe the Athenians armie, which they had sent thither. The secõd thing he did for them, was: That he made them of Greece to beginne warre apon the Athenians. The third, & greatest matter of importance, was: That he dyd counsell them to fortifie the cittie of Decelea, which was within the territories of Attica selfe: which consumed, and brought the power of the Athenians lower, then any other thing whatsoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, & well esteemed in Sparta, for the seruice he dyd to the cõmon wealth: muche more he wanne the loue & good willes of priuate men, for that he liued after the Laconian manner. So as they that sawe his skinne scraped to the flesshe, & sawe him washe him selfe in cold water, & howe he dyd eate browne bread, & suppe of their blacke brothe: would haue doubted (or to saye better, neuer haue beleeued) that suche a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so muche as a perfuming panne, or had touched clothe of tissue made at Miletvm. For among other qualities & properties he had (wherof he was full) this as they saye was one, whereby he most robbed mens hartes: that he could frame altogether with their manners and facions of life, transforming him selfe more easely to all manner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white culler: but Alcibiades could put apon him any mãners, customes or facions, of what nation soeuer, & could followe, exercise, & counterfeate them when he would, aswell the good as the bad. For in Sparta, he was very paynefull, & in continuall exercise: he liued sparingly with litle, & led a straight life. In Ionia, to the cõtrary: there he liued daintely & superfluously, & gaue him self to all mirthe & pleasure. In Thracia, he dranke euer, or was allwayes a horse backe. If he came to Tissaphernes, lieutenaunt of the mightie king of Persia: he farre exceeded the magnificence of Persia in pompe & sumptuousnes. And these things notwithstanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one facion to another, neither dyd his manners (to saye truely) receyue all sortes of chaunges. But bicause peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended those whose companie he kept, he dyd with such a viser & cloke disguise him selfe, to fit their manners, whom he companied with, by transforming him selfe into their naturall countenaunce. As he that had seene him when he was at Sparta, to haue looked apon the outward man, would haue sayed as the common prouerbe sayeth:

Alcibiades flyeth to Sparta.

Alcibiades more chaungeable then the camelion.

It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe:

Euen so it is euen he, whom Lycurgus brought vp. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, and good will in deede lye naked before him: would haue sayed contrarilie, as they saye commonly in another language.

This vvoman is no chaungeling.

For he entertained Queene Timæa, King Agis wife of Sparta, so well in his absence, he being abroade in the warres: that he got her with childe, & she her selfe denied it not. For she being brought a bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when she was amongest her familliars & very friends, she called him sofetly Alcibiades, she was so farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades ieasting out the matter, sayed he had done it for no hurte, nor for any lust of flesshe to satisfie his desire: but only to leaue of his race, to reigne amongest the Lacedæmonians. This matter was brought by diuers vnto king Alcibiades got Timæa, king Agis wife with childe.

A king Agis eares, who at the length beleeued it: but specially when he beganne to make a reckoning of the time, how long it was sence he laye with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was tenne moneths after ere he laye again with her. Whereupon, her sonne Leotychides being borne at the ende of tenne moneths, he sayed he was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides dyd not succede afterwards in the Kingdome, bicause he was not of the bloude royall. After the vtter ouerthrowe of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Iles of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENIANS, dyd send all about a tene ambassadours to SPARTA: to let the LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, so they would send them ayde to defend them. The B BOEOTIANS fauored those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the king of PERSIANS lieutenaunt, fauored the CYZICENIANS. This notwithstanding, the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to helpe those of CHIO first, by the persuasion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matters in hande. And he tooke sea him self and went into ASIA, where he almost turned the countrie of IONIA against the ATHENIANS: and keeping allwayes with the generalles of the LACEDÆMONIANS, he dyd muche hurte the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, king Agis dyd beare him ill will, partely for the iniurie he dyd him in dishonoring and defiling his wife, and partely also, for that he enuied his glorie: bicause the rumour rāne all about, that the most parte of the goodly exploytes of these warres dyd happen well, by Alcibiades meanes. Other also of the greatest authoritie among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious emong them, be- C ganne in their mindes to be angrie with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were of so great power, that they procured their gouernours to write their letters to their captaines in the field, to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, dyd no whit desist to doe all he could for the benefit of the LACEDÆMONIANS: yet he had an eye behind him, flying all occasiōs to fall into their handes. So in the ende, for more suerty of his persone, he went vnto Tisaphernes, one of the king of PERSIANS lieutenantes, with whom he wanne incontinently suche credit, that he was the first & chiefest persone he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple persone, but rather malicious, & subtill of nature, and that loued fine & crafty men: dyd wonder how he could so easely turne from one manner of liuing to another, and also at his quicke witte and vnderstanding. Moreouer, his company and manner to passe the time awaye, was D commonly maruelous full of mirthe and pleasure, and he had suche pleasaunt comely deuises with him, that no man was of so sullen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor so churlishe, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, and also enuied him: they were yet glad to see him, & it did them good to be in his companie, & vse talke with him. In so muche as this Tisaphernes (that otherwise was a churlishe man, and naturally hated the GRECIANS) dyd geue him selfe so muche vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well: that he him selfe dyd studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make muche of him. For he called Alcibiades his fayer house of pleasure, & goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly gardens, sweete springes, grene arbours and pleasaunt meadowes, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing vtterly to finde any safetie or friend- E shippe emong the SPARTANS, and fearing on thother side king Agis also: he beganne to speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they dyd, to Tisaphernes. By this practise he stayed Tisaphernes from ayding them so friendly as he might: moreouer, he dyd not vtterly destroye the ATHENIANS. For he persuaded him that he should furnishe the LACEDÆMONIANS but with litle money, to let them diminishe and consume by litle and litle: to the ende that after one had troubled and weakned the other, they both at the length should be the easier for the King to ouercome. This barbarous man dyd easely consent to this deuise. All the world then sawe he loued Alcibiades, and esteemed of him very muche: in so muche as he was sought to, and regarded of all handes of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS sorie, and repented them when they had receyued so great losse & hurte, for that they had decreed so seuerely F against Alcibiades, who in like manner was very sorowfull, to see them brought to so harde termes, fearing, if the cittie of ATHENS came to destruction, that he him selfe should fall in the ende into the handes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS were almoſt in the Ile of SAMOS, from A whēce with their armie by ſea, they ſought to ſuppreſſe the rebelles that were vp againſt them, and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily ſtrong to reſiſt their enemies, at the leaſt by ſea: but they ſtoode in great feare of the power of Tiſaphernes, and of the hundred & fiftie gallyes which were reported to be comming out of the countrie of PHENI-CIA, to the ayde of their enemies, which if they had come, the cittie of ATHENS had hene vtterly ſpoyled, and for euer without hope of recouery. The which Alcibiades vnderſtanding, ſent ſecretly vnto the chiefeſt men that were in the armie of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to geue them hope he would make Tiſaphernes their friende: howbeit not of any deſire he had to gratifie the people, nor that he truſted to the communaltie of ATHENS, but only to the honorable, and honeſt cittizens, and that conditionally ſo as they had the harte and corage, to B bridell a litle the ouer licentiouſnes and inſolencie of the common people, & that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redreſſe their ſtate, and to preſerue the cittie of ATHENS, from finall and vtter deſtruction. Vpon this aduertiſement, all the heades & chief men dyd geue very good eare vnto it: ſauing only Phrynichus, one of the captaines, and of the towne of DIRADES. Who miſtruſting (that was true in deede) that Alcibiades cared not which ende went forward, nor who had the chief gouernment of ATHENS, the nobilitie, or the communaltie, and dyd but ſeeke all the deuiſes and wayes he could, to returne againe if it might be poſſible, in any manner of ſorte, and that he dyd but currie fauour with the Nobilitie, blaming and accuſing the people: he ſtoode altogether againſt the motion, whereupon Alcibiades de-uiſe was not followed. And hauing now ſhewed him ſelfe open enemie to Alcibiades, he dyd C C ſecretly aduertiſe Aſtiochus then admirall to the LACEDÆMONIANS, of Alcibiades practiſe, and warned him to take heede of him, and to laye him vp ſafe, as a double dealer, and one that had intelligence with both ſides: but he vnderſtoode not how it was but one traitour to ſpeake to another. For this Aſtiochus was a follower of Tiſaphernes for his priuate commodities: and perceyuing Alcibiades in ſuche credit with him, he dyd diſcouer to Alcibiades all that Phry- nichus had aduertiſed him. Alcibiades ſtraight ſent men of purpoſe to SAMOS, vnto the captains there, to accuſe Phrynichus of the treaſon he had reuealed againſt them. Thoſe of the counſaill there, receyuing this intelligēce: were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he ſeeing no better waye to ſaue him ſelfe for making of this faulte, went about to make amends with committing a worſe faulte. Thereupon he ſent againe to Aſtiochus, complaining muche he had diſcloſed D D him: and yet neuertheles he promiſed him, if he would keepe his counſaill, that he would deli-uer the whole fleete and armie of the ATHENIANS into his handes. Howbeit this treaſon of Phrynichus dyd the ATHENIANS no hurte at all, by reaſon of Aſtiochus counter treaſon: for he dyd let Alcibiades againe vnderſtand what offer Phrynichus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe, the ſecond time before the counſell, by meanes of Alcibiades dyd firſt aduertiſe the chief of the armie of the ATHENIANS. That their enemies would come and ſet vpon them, and where, and howe: and gaue them therefore warning to keepe neere their ſhippes, to make a ſtrong watche, and to fortifie them ſelues with all ſpeede, the which forthwith they dyd. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he dyd warne them againe to take heede of Phrynichus, becauſe he had practiſed againe E with their enemies, to deliuer the whole armie of ATHENS into their handes. But they gaue no credit to his ſecond letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparations and mindes of the enemies, would ſerue his own turne with the falſe accuſing of Phrynichus. Notwithſtanding this, there was ſome falſehood in fellowſhippe: for one Hermon, openly in the market throughly conſidered of: the deadbodie by the ſentence of the people was condemned for a traitour: and Hermon the murtherer, and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their facte they had done, to kill a traitour to the common wealth. Wherefore thoſe that were Al- cibiades friends, being at that time the ſtronger, and greateſt men of the counſell in the armie at SAMOS: they ſent one Piſander to ATHENS, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to en- F corage the noble men to take vpon them the authoritie, & to plucke it from the people; aſſu-ring them that Tiſaphernes would giue them ayde to doe it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who would make him their friende. This was the cullet and cloke wherewith they ſerued their turnes, that dyd chaunge the gouernment of ATHENS, and that brought it into the handes of a ſmall number of nobilitie: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called them ſelues fiue thouſand. But ſo ſone as they felt them ſelues ſtrong, and that they had the whole authoritie of gouernment, without contradiction in their handes: they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades, and ſo they made warres more coldly and ſlackly then before. Partely bicauſe they miſtruſted their cittizens, who founde the chaunge of gouernment very ſtrange: and partely alſo bicauſe they were of opinion that the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at all times dyd moſt fauour the gouernment of Nobilitie) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained ſtill in the cittie, ſturred not, but were quiet againſt their willes, for feare of daunger, bicauſe there were many of them ſlaine, that boldely tooke apon them in open preſence to reſiſt theſe foure hundred. But thoſe that were in the campe, in the Ile of SAMOS, hearing theſe newes, were ſo grieuouſly offended: that they reſolued to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauen of PIRÆA. Firſt of all, they ſent for Alcibiades, whom they choſe their captaine: then they commaunded him ſtraightly to leade them againſt theſe tyrantes, who had vſurped the libertie of the people of ATHENS. But neuertheles he dyd not therein, as another would haue done in this caſe, ſeeing him ſelfe ſo ſodainely crept againe in fauour with the common people: for he dyd not thinke he ſhould incontinently pleaſe and gratifie thē in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their ſhippes and ſo great an armie, being before but a baniſhed man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrarie, as it became a generall worthie of ſuche a charge, he conſidered with him ſelfe, that it was his parte wiſely to ſtaye thoſe, who would in a rage and furie careleſly caſt them ſelues awaye, and not ſuffer them to doe it. And truely Alcibiades was the cauſe of the preſeruing of the cittie of ATHENS at that time, from vtter deſtruction. For if they had ſodainly (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to goe to ATHENS: the enemies finding no man to let them, might eaſely haue wonne all the countrie of IONIA, of HELLESPONT, and of all the other Iles without ſtroke ſtriking, whileſt the ATHENIANS were buſie fighting one againſt another in ciuill warres, and within the compaſſe of their owne walles. This Alcibiades alone, & no other, dyd preuent, not only by perſuading the whole armie, and declaring the inconueniēce thereof, which would fall out apon their ſodaine departure: but alſo by intreating ſome particularly aparte, and keeping a number backe by very force. To bring this about, one Thraſibulus of the towne of STIRA, dyd helpe him muche: who went through the armie, and cried out apon them that were bent to enterpriſe this iorney. For he had the biggeſt and lowdeſt voyce as they ſaye, of any man that was in all the cittie of ATHENS. This was a notable acte, and a great pece of ſeruice done by Alcibiades: that he promiſed fiue hundred ſaile of the PHENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS aſſuredly looked for, in their ayde from the king of PERSIA) ſhould not come at all, or els if they came, it ſhould be in the fauour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediatly, and went with great ſpeede to Tiſaphernes: whom he handled in ſuche ſorte, that he brought not the ſhippes that laye at rode before the cittie of ASPENDA, and ſo he brake promiſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was maruelouſly blamed and accuſed, both of the one & the other ſide, to haue altered Tiſaphernes minde, but chiefly of the LACEDÆMONIANS: who ſayed that he had perſuaded this barbarous captaine, he ſhould neither ayde the one nor the other, but rather to ſuffer them one to deuoure and deſtroye eache other. For it had bene out of doubt, if this great fleete and nauy of the Kings had come, to ioyne their force with either partie: that they had taken from the one of them, the ſigniorie and domination of the ſea. Shortely after, the foure hundred noble men that had vſurped the authoritie and gouernment of ATHENS, were vtterly driuen awaye and ouerthrowen, by meanes of the friendly ayde, & aſſiſtaunce that Alcibiades friends gaue thoſe that tooke the peoples parte. So the cittizens were very well pleaſed with Alcibiades, in ſo muche as they ſent for him to returne when he thought good. But he iudging with him ſelfe it would be no honour nor grace vnto him to returne without ſome well deſeruing, & before he had done ſome greater exployte, as only vpon the peoples fauour and good will, whereas otherwiſe his returne might be both glorious and triumphant: departed firſt from SAMOS

with a ſmall number of gallyes, and went ſailing vp and downe the Iles of Cos and of Gnidos. There he was aduertiſed, that Mindarus, the admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was gone with all his fleete vnto the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and that the captaines of the ATHENIANS gaue chaſe vnto him. Thereupon he went alſo and ſayled thither with ſpeede, to ayde the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eighteene gallyes euen at the very inſtant, whē they were both in the middeſt of their fight, with all their ſhippes before the cittie of ABYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten betwene them from morning till night, both the one and the other hauing the better in one parte of the battell, and the worſt in another place. Now at the firſt diſcouerie of Alcibiades comming, both partes had in deede contrarie imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke harte vnto them: and the ATHENIANS beganne to be afeard. But Alcibiades ſet vp ſtraight his flagge in the toppe of the galley of his admirall, to ſhewe what he was. Wherewithall, he ſet vpon the PELOPONNESIANS that had the better, & had certen gallyes of the ATHENIANS in chaſe: whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gaue ouer their chaſe, & fled. But Alcibiades followed them ſo luſtely, that he ranne diuers of them a ground, & brake their ſhippes, & ſlue a great number of men that lept into the ſea, in hope to ſaue them ſelues by ſwimming a lande. So notwithſtanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to ayde the LACEDÆMONIANS, and dyd his beſt indeuour to ſaue their gallyes by the ſea ſhore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wāne thirtie gallyes of their enemies, and ſaued all their owne, and ſo dyd ſet vp certaine flagges of triumphe and victorie. Alcibiades hauing now happely gotten this glorious victorie, would nedes goe ſhewe him ſelfe in triumphe vnto Tiſaphernes. So hauing prepared to preſent him with goodly riche preſents, and appointed alſo a conuenient traine & number of ſayle mete for a generall, he tooke his courſe directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for. For Tiſaphernes ſtanding in great hazard of diſpleaſure, and feare of puniſhment at the Kings handes, hauing long time before bene defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had cōplained of him, that he dyd not fulfill the Kings commaundement, thought that Alcibiades was arriued in very happy howre: whereupon he kept him priſoner in the cittie of SARDIS, ſuppoſing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes eaſely diſcharge, and purge him to the King. Yet at the ende of thirtie dayes, Alcibiades by fortune got a horſe, and ſtealing from his keepers, fled vnto the cittie of CLAZOMENES: and this dyd more increaſe the ſuſpition they had of Tiſaphernes, bicauſe they thought that vnder hand he had wrought his libertie. Alcibiades toke then ſea again, and went to ſeeke out the armie of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had founde, & heard newes that Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together in the cittie of CIZICVM: he made an oration to his ſouldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requiſite they ſhould fight with their enemies, both by ſea and by lande, and moreouer that they ſhould aſſault them within their fortes and caſtells, bicauſe otherwiſe they could haue no money to defraye their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoyſe ſayle, and ſo to goe lye at anker in the Ile of PROCONESVS: where he tooke order that they ſhould keepe in all the pinnaſes and brigantines emong the ſhippes of warre, that the enemie might haue no manner of intelligence of his cōming. The great ſhowers of rayne alſo, with thunder and darke weather that fell out ſodainely vpon it, dyd greatly further him in his attempt & enterpriſe: in ſo muche as not only his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knewe nothing of his comming. So ſome made their reckoning, that they could doe litle or nothing all that daye: yet he made them ſodainely imbarke, and hoyſe ſayle. They were no ſooner in the mayne ſea, but they diſcried a farre of the gallyes of their enemies, which laye at rode before the hauen of CYZICVM. And fearing leaſt the great number of his fleete would make them flye, and take lande before he could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to ſtaye behinde, & to rowe ſoftely after him, and him ſelfe with fortie gallyes with him, went towards the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies ſuppoſing there had bene no more ſhippes, then thoſe that were in ſight: dyd ſet out preſently to fight with them. They were no ſooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades ſhippes that came behinde, were alſo deſcried: the enemies were ſo afeard thereat, that they caſt about, and fled ſtraight. Alcibiades leauing his fleete, followed the chaſe with twentie of the beſt gallyes he had, and draue them a lande. Thereupon he landed alſo, and purſued Alcibiades victorie of the Lacedæmonians by ſea.

Alcibiades taken priſoner at Sardis, flyeth from Tiſaphernes.

A sued them so corageously at their heeles, that he slue a great nũber of them on the mayne lãde, who thought by flying to haue saued them selues. Moreouer, Mindarus, & Pharnabazus, being come out of the cittie to rescue their people, were ouerthrowen both. He slue Mindarus in the field, fighting valliantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS spoyled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and tooke besides all their enemies shippes. After they tooke the cittie of CIZYCVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being slaine, they had not only the possession of the whole countrie of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemies by force, out of all partes of the sea. There were at that time certaine letters intercepted, whereby a secretarie gaue aduertissement vnto the Ephori at SPARTA, of the ouerthrowe in this sorte. All Alcibiades victorie at Cyzicum.

B is lost, Mindarus is slaine, our people dye for hunger, and we knowe not what to doe. Now the souldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this iorney and ouerthrowe, grewe to suche a pryde and reputation of them selues, that they would not, and disdained also to serue with the other souldiers that had bene beaten many times, & went away with the worse. Where they to the contrarie had neuer bene ouercome, as a litle before it happened, that the captaine Thrasyllus had bene ouerthrowen by the cittie of EPHESVS. And for this ouerthrowe, the EPHESIANS had set vp a triumphe, and token of brasse, to the vtter shame and ignominie of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades souldiers did very muche rebuke Thrasyllus men, and dyd exceedingly extoll their captaine and them selues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to doe with them, nor yet keepe them companie. Vntill suche time as Pharnabazus

C came with a great armie against them, aswell of footemen as horsemen, when they rãne a forraging apon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the rescue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrewe him once againe, and dyd together with Thrasyllus chase him euen vntill darke night. Then both Alcibiades and Thrasyllus souldiers dyd companie together, one reioycing with another: and so returned all with great ioye into one campe. The next morning Alcibiades set vp a triumphe for the victorie he had the daye before, and then went to spoyle and destroye Pharnabazus countrie, where he was gouernour, & no man durst once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken prisoners, certaine prieستes and Nunnes of the coũtrie: but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ransome. And preparing to make warres against the CHALCEDONIANS, who were reuolted frõ the ATHE-

D NIANS, & had receyued a garrison & gouernour of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their cittie: he was aduertissed that they had brought in all their goods & cattells out of the fieldes, & had deliuered them to the safe custodie of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbours & frieds. Hereupon he led his armie into their borders, & sent a herauld before to summone the BITHYNIANS, to make amends for the wrõg they had done the ATHENIANS. The BITHYNIANS, fearing least Alcibiades would set apon them, dyd straight deliuer him the goodes they had afore in their custodie, & moreouer, made a league with the ATHENIANS besides. That done, he went & layed seige to the cittie of CHALCEDON, the which he enuironned all about from Alcibiades victorie at Chalcedonia.

E the one side of the sea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thincking to haue raised the seige. And Hippocrates, a captain of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was gouernour of the cittie, assembled all the force he was able to make within the same, & made a salye out also vpon the ATHENIANS at the very same time. Whereupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battell, so as they might geue a charge vpon them both at one instant: he fought so valliantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to runne his waye with shame enough, & slue Hippocrates in the field, with a great number of his men. Then tooke he the seas againe, to goe towardes the countrie of HELLESPONT, to get some money, where vpon the sodaine he did take the cittie of SELYBRIA: bicause he valliantly put him selfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certain of his frieds within, with whom he had secret practise, had geuen him a token, that when time serued, they would shewe a burning torche in the ayer at midnight: but they were Alcibiades tooke the cittie of Selybria.

F cõpelled to shew this fyer in the ayer before they were readie, for feare least one of their cõfederacie would bewraye the matter, who sodainly repented him. Now this torche burning in the ayer, was set vp before Alcibiades was readie with his cõpanie. But he perceyuing the signe set, tooke about thirtie men with him in his cõpanie, & rãne with them to the walles of the cittie, hauing commaunded the reſt of his armie to followe him with all ſpeede poſſible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirtie men: beſides them there followed twentie other light armed men. Howbeit they were no ſoner entered the cittie, but they heard the cittizens armed come againſt them: ſo that there was no hope to ſcape, if he dyd tarie their comming. Neuertheles, cõſidering that vntill that preſent time he was neuer ouercome in battell, where he had taken charge, it greued him very muche to flye: wherefore it ſtraight came in his head to make ſilence by ſound of trumpet, and after ſilence made, he cauſed one of them that were about him to make proclamation with a lowde voyce, that the SELYBRIANIANS ſhould not take armes againſt the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a litle that would fayne haue bene doing, bicauſe they ſuppoſed that all the armie of the ATHENIANS had bene already in the cittie: the other on the contrarie ſide, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further daunger. And as they beganne to parle vpon compoſition, the reſt of Alcibiades armie was come on. Now he thincking in deede (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS ſought nothing but peace, and fearing leaſt the THRACIANS which were many in number (& came with good will to ſerue him in that iorney) would ſacke and ſpoyle the cittie, he made them all to goe out againe: and ſo concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he dyd them no more hurte, apon their hũble ſubmiſſion, but made them paye him a ſumme of money, and ſo leauing a garriſon of the ATHENIANS within the cittie, he departed thence. Whileſt Alcibiades was in treatie with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that laye at the ſiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he ſhould geue them a ſumme of money, & giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS handes, to enioye it as they had before. And with expreſſe condition alſo, that the ATHENIANS ſhould make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurte or ſpoyle any of his: and likewiſe ſhould be bounde to geue good ſafe conduyte vnto the ambaſſadours of the ATHENIANS, to goe and come ſafe from time to time, to the king of PERSIA. The other captaines being ſworn to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned alſo, that Alcibiades at his returne ſhould likewiſe be ſworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades ſayed, he would not be ſworne at all, vnles Pharnabazus were firſt ſworne for his parte. Thus when othes were taken of either ſide, Alcibiades went alſo againſt thoſe of BYZANTIVM, who in like caſe had rebelled againſt the ATHENIANS. At his firſt comming thither, he enuironned the cittie round about with a walle. Afterwards he practiſed with two ſecret friends of his, Anaxilaus, & Lycurgus, & certen other within the cittie, who promiſed him to deliuer it into his handes, ſo they might be aſſured he would doe them no hurte. To culler this practiſe, he gaue it out, that he muſt nedes leaue the ſiege, & departe with ſpeede, for certain newes that were come out of IONIA: & thereupon he imbarked preſently, & wẽt out of the hauen at none dayes with all his ſhippes, howbeit he returned again the ſame night. And going a lande with the choyceſt & beſt armed men he had, he approched the walles of the cittie, without any manner of noyſe, hauing left order with them that remained in the ſhippes, that in the meane ſeaſon they ſhould rowe with all force into the hauen, with as great cries and ſhowtes as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies partely to feare the BIZANTINES the more with their ſodaine cõming amõg them, & partely that his cõfederates within the cittie, might with better oportunitie receyue him & his cõpanie, into the towne with the more aſſured ſafety, whileſt euery man ranne to the hauen, to reſiſt them that were vpõ the gallyes. Neuertheles they wẽt not away vnfought with. For thoſe that laye in garriſon within the cittie, ſome of thẽ PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, dyd ſo valliãtly repulſe them that came out of their gallyes, that they draue thẽ to retire abord againe. Afterwardes hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred: the cittie on thother ſide, they put them ſelues in battell raye, & went to mete them. The battell was terrible of both partes: but Alcibiades in the ende obtained victorie, leading the right winge of his battell, & Theramenes the lefte. The victorie being gotten, he tooke 300. of his enemies priſoners, who had eſcaped the furie of the battell. But after the battell, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither baniſhed, nor his good cõfiſcated: bicauſe it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his cõfederats, that neither he, nor his, ſhould hurt any of the BIZANTINES either in perſone or goodes, nor any way ſhould riſle them. And Anaxilaus being afterwards accuſed of treaſon in

A LACEDÆMON, for this practise: he aunswered, and iustified him selfin suche sorte, that they could not finde he had committed the faulte layed vnto his charge. For he sayed, that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: & that he sawe not LACEDÆMON in daunger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compassed about with a walle they had built, that it was vnpossible to bring any thing into the cittie. Moreouer he alleaged, that they hauing very smal store of corne within the cittie (as was true in dede) the PELOPONNESIANS, and BOEOTIANS, that laye there in garrison dyd eate it vp, while the poore BYZANTINES them selues, their wiues and children, dyed for very hunger. Therefore it could not be sayed of him, that he had betrayed his countrie, but rather that he had deliuered it from the miseries and calamities the warres brought vpon it: wherein he had followed the example of the honestest men of B LACEDÆMON, who dyd acknowledge nothing honest and iuste, but that which was necessarie and profitable for their countrie. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reasons he alleaged for his purgation, were ashamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him goe. Now Alcibiades desirous in the ende to see his natiue countrie againe (or to speake more truely, that his contrymen should see him) after he had so many times ouerthrowen their enemies in battell: he hoysed saile, and directed his course towardes ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallyes of the ATHENIANS richely furnished, and decked all about, with skutchines and targettes, and other armour and weapon gotten amongest the spoyles of his enemies. Moreouer, he brought with him many other shippes, which he had wonne & broken in the warres, besides many ensignes and other ornaments: all which being compted together one with the C other, made vp the number of two hundred shippes. Furthermore, where Duris SAMIAN writeth (who challengeth that he came of his house) that at his returne one Chrysogonus, an excellent player of the flute (that had wonne certaine of the Pythian games) dyd playe suche a note, that at the sounde thereof the galley slaues would keepe stroke with their owers, and that Callipides another excellent player of tragedies, playing the parte of a comedie, dyd sturre them to rowe, being in suche players garments as euery master of suche science vseth commonly to weare, presenting him selfe in Theater or stage before the people to shewe his arte: and that the admirall galley wherein him self was, entred the hauen with a purple saile, as if some maske had come into a mans house after some great banket made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus, nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, me thinkes it should not be true, D that he returning from exile after so long a banishment, & hauing passed ouer such sorowes & calamities as he had susteined, would so prowdly & presumptuously shewe him selfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But merely contrarie, it is most certain, that he returned in great feare & doubt. For when he was arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not set foote a lande, before he first sawe his nephewe Euryptolemus, & diuers other of his friendes from the hatches of his shippe, standing apon the sandes in the hauen mouthe. Who were come thither to receyue and welcome him, & tolde him that he might be bolde to lande, without feare of any thing. He was no soner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to see him, with so great loue and affection, that they tooke no heede of the other captaines that came with him, but clustred all to him only, & cried out for ioye to see him. Those that could come neere him, dyd welcome E & imbrace him: but all the people wholy followed him. And some that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: & those that could not come neere him, sawe him a farre of, & the olde folkes dyd pointe him out to the yonger sorte. But this cõmon ioye was mingled notwithstanding, with teares & sorowe, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, & to cõpare them with their present prosperitie: waying with them selues also how they had not lost SICILIA, nor their hope in all things els had failed thẽ, if they had deliuered them selues & the charge of their armie into Alcibiades hands, when they sent for him to appeare in persone before them. Cõsidering also how he found the cittie of ATHENS in manner put from their seigniorie & cõmandement on the sea, & on the other side how their force by lãde was brought vnto such extremitie, that ATHENS scatly could defend her suburbes, the F cittie self being so deuided & turmoiled with ciuill dissention: yet he gathered together those fewe, & small force that remained, & had now not only restored ATHENS to her former power & soueraintie on the sea, but had made her also a conquerer by lande. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was past before by the people, at the instant request of Callias, the sonne of Callæschrus, who dyd preferre it: as he him selfe dyd testifie in his elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembraunce of the good turne he had done him, saying:

I vvas the first that moued in open conference, the peoples voyce to call thee home, vvhen thou vvert banisht hence.
So vvas I eke the first, vvhich thereto gaue consent, and therefore maye I boldly saye, by truthe of suche intent:
I vvas the only meane, to call thee home againe, by suche request so rightly made, to moue the peoples vayne.
And this maye serue for pledge, vvhat friendshippe I thee beare:
fast sealed vvith a faithfull tongue, as plainely shall appeare.

But notwithstanding, the people being assembled all in counsaill, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he first lamented all his mishappes, and founde him selfe grieued a litle with the wronges they had offred him, yet he imputed all in the ende to his cursed fortune, and some spightfull god that enuied his glorie and prosperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall persuaded the people to be of good corage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of golde, and chose him generall againe of ATHENS, with soueraine power and authoritie both by lande as by sea. And at that very instant it was decreed by the people, that he should be restored againe to all his goodes, and that the priestes Eumolpides should absolue him of all their curses, and that the herauldes should with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and cursinges they had thundered out against him before, by commaundement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, saiuing Theodorus the bishoppe, who sayed: I dyd neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurte to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades florished in his chiefest prosperitie, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliked very muche the time of his landing: saying it was very vnluckie and vnfortunate. For the very daye of his returne and arriuall, fell out by chaunce on the feast which they call Plynteria, as you would saye, the washing daye, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which daye, the priestes that they call Praxiergides, doe make certen secret and hidden sacrifices and ceremonies, being the fiue and twenty daye of the moneth of September, and doe take from the image of this goddesse all her rayment and iuells, and keepe the image close couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS doe ascribe that daye, for a most vnfortunate daye, & are very circumspect to doe any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly scanned abroade of euery bodye, that it seemed the goddesse was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that she dyd hide her selfe, bicause she would not see him, nor haue him come neere her. Notwithstanding all these toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would haue wished it: he armed a hundred gallyes presently, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wisely regarded the time and solemnitie of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately stayed vntill they had finished all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken and fortified the cittie of DECELEA, within the territorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the stronger in the field, dyd keepe the waye going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, so as by no possible meanes they could make their solemne procession by lande, with suche honour and deuotion as they were before accustomed to doe: and thereby all the sacrifices, dawnces, and many other holy deuowte ceremonies they were wonte to doe by the waye, in singing the holy songe of Iacchus, came of very necessitie to be left of, and cleane layed a side. Then Alcibiades thought he should doe a meritorious dede to the godds, and an acceptable to men, to bring the olde ceremonies vp againe vpon the said feast: and thereupon purposed to accompanie the procession, & defend it by power, against all inuasion & disturbaunce by the enemies. As one that foresawe one of those two things would come to passe. Either that Agis king of the LACEDÆMONIANS would not sturre at all against the sacred ceremonies, and by this meanes should much imbase and diminishe his reputation and glorie: or if he dyd come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the goddes,

A goddes, considering it should be in defence of their most holy feast and worshippe, and in the sight of his countrie, where the people should see and witnesse both, his valliantnes, and also his corage. Alcibiades being fully resolued apon this processiõn, went and made the priestes Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their ministers and officers of these mysteries, priuie to his determination. Then he sent out skowtes to watche on the side of the hilles thereabouts, and to viewe the waye of their perambulation. The next morning very early he sent out light horsemen also to scowre the countrie. Then he made the priestes, the professed, and all the ministers of religion, goe in processiõn, together with those that followed the same: and he him selfe compassed them about with his armie on euery side, marching in battell raye, and very good order, and with great silence. This was an honorable and deuoute leading of an armie, B and suche as if his greatest enemies would confesse a trothe, they could not but saye, Alcibiades had as muche shewed the office of a highe bishoppe, as of a noble souldier and good captaine. So he ended this processiõn, returning to ATHENS in all safe order againe, and not an enemie that durst once looke out into the field to set vpon him. Now this dyd more increase the greatnes of his minde, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his sufficiencie, and wise conduction of an armie: in so much as they thought him vnuincible, hauing the soueraine power and authoritie of a generall. Furthermore, he spake so fayer to the poore people, and meaner sorte, that they chiefly wished and desired he would take vpon him like a King: yea, and many went to him to persuade him in it, as though he should thereby withstand all enuie, and driue awaye the lawes and customes of trying of matters by the voyces of C the people, and all suche fond deuises, as dyd destroye the state of the common weale. And furthermore, they sayed it was very needefull that he alone should take vpon him the whole rule and gouernment of the cittie, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stande in feare of slaunderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any minde to vsurpe the Kingdome, the matter is somewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greatest men of the cittie, fearing least in deede he ment some suche thing, dyd hasten his departure as sone as they could possible, doing all other things according to his minde: and dyd assigne him suche associates in his charge of generall, as he him selfe best liked. So in the ende, he departed with a fleete of a hundred gallyes, and first of all he fell with the Ile of ANDROS, where he ouercame by fight, the inhabitantes of the said Ile, and certaine LACEDÆ-D MONIANS that were amongest them: but he tooke not the cittie, which was one of the first matters his enemies dyd accuse him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowen and enuied, for the estimation they had of his vallure and sufficiency, truely Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and sundry seruices he had done, wanne him suche estimation of wisedome and valliantnes, that where he slacked in any seruice whatsoeuer, he was presently suspected, iudging the ill succesſe not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he vndertooke any enterprise, nothing could withstand or lye in his waye. Hereupon the people persuading them selues, that immediatly after his departure, they should heare that the Ile of CHIO was taken, with all the countrie of IONIA: they were angrie they could haue no newes so sodainely from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they dyd not consider the E lacke of money he had, and specially making warre with suche enemies, as were euer relieued with the great king of PERSIANS ayde, and that for necessities sake he was sundrie times driuen to leaue his campe, to seeke money where he could get it, to paye his souldiers, and to mainteine his armie. Now for testimony hereof, the last accusation that was against him, was only for this matter. Lysander being sent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for admirall and generall of their armie by sea, vsed suche policie with Cyrus, the king of PERSIANS brother, that he got into his handes a great some of money: by meanes whereof he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a daye for their wages, where before they were wont to haue but three, and yet Alcibiades had muche a doe to furnishe his with three only a daye. For this cause, to get money, Alcibiades sailed into CARIA. But in the meane time Antio-
F chus, whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenaunt behind him, and had geuen him charge of all the shippes in his absence, being a very skilfull sea man, but otherwise a hastie harebraynd foole, and of small capacitie: he being expressely commaunded by Alcibiades not to fight in any case, though the enemies offred him battell, was so fooliſhe rashe, and made so litle reckoning of his straight commaundement, that he armed his owne gallye, whereof him selfe was captaine, and another besides, and went to the cittie of EPHESVS, passing all alonge his enemies gallyes, reuiling & offering villany to those that stoode apon the hatches of their gallyes. Lysander being maruelously prouoked by those wordes, went and encountered him at the first with a fewe shippes. The other captaines of the gallyes of the ATHENIANS, seeing Antiochus in daunger, went to ayde him, one after another. Then Lysander of his parte also set out all his whole fleete against him, and in the end ouercame them, Antiochus self was killed in the conflict, and many gallyes and men were taken prisoners: wherefore Lysander set vp shewes of triumphe in token of victorie. Alcibiades hearing these ill fauored newes, returned presently with all possible speede to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the rest of his fleete to offer Lysander battell. But Lysander quietly contenting him selfe with his first victorie: went not out against him. Now this victorie was no soner wonne, but one Thrasybulus the sonne of Thraso, Alcibiades enemie, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuse Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had lost many shippes, for that he regarded not his charge, carelesly putting men in truste, whom he gaue to great credit to, bicause they were good fellowes, and would drincke droncke with him, & were full of mariners mockes and knauishe ieastes, such as they vse commonly amongest them selues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroade, here, and there, scraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheere, and feasting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN courtisans, when the enemies armie was so neere theirs as it was. Moreouer, they layed to his charge, that he dyd fortifie a castell in the countrie of THRACIA, neere vnto the cittie of BISANTHE, for a place to retire him selfe vnto, either bicause he could not, or rather that he would not, liue any lenger in his owne countrie. Vpon those accusations, the ATHENIANS geuing ouer credit to the reporte: dyd immediatly choose newe captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing least they would doe him some worse harme, dyd leaue straight the ATHENIANS campe, and gathering a certaine number of straungers together, went of him selfe to make warre apon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were subiect to no prince nor state: where he got a maruelous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he dyd assure the GRÆCIANS inhabiting those marches, from all inuasion of forreine enemies. Now Tydeus, Menander, and Adimanthus the ATHENIANS captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goates riuer, with all the gallyes the cittie of ATHENS had at that time apon that coast: vsed euery morning commonly to goe to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at an ancker before the cittie of Lampsacus, with all the LACEDÆMONIANS armie by sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watche or warde, as men that were careles of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the lande nor farre of, and finding their great faulte and negligence: tooke his horse, & went to them, and told them that they laye on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to seeke their vittells, as farre as to the cittie of SESTOS, & that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, & goe a lande when they laye at ancker, straggling vp and downe the countrie as they would them selues, without regarde that there laye a great armie of their enemies before them, readie to be set out at their generalles commaundement: and therefore he aduised them to remoue thence, and to goe cast ancker before the cittie of SESTOS. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydeus, one of the captaines, stowtely commaunded him to get him awaye, as one that had nothing to doe with the matter, & that other had charge of the armie. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, dyd departe presently from them. And as he went his waye, he sayed to some of his friendes which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not bene so rounde with him, he would haue forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to haue come to the battell in despight of their beardes, or els he would haue driuen them to forsake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, bicause he could haue brought

A brought from lande a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horſemen, with whom he might haue geuen a charge vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great miſchief vnto their campe. But now, how wiſely Alcibiades dyd foreſee the faultes he tolde the ATHENIANS captaines of: their great misfortune & loſſe that followed incontinently, did to plainely witneſſe it to the worlde. For Lyſander came ſo fiercely apon them on a ſodaine, that of all the ſhippes they had in their whole fleete, only eight gallyes were ſaued, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much leſſe then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried awaye, with three thouſand priſoners whom Lyſander put to death. Shortely after, he tooke the cittie ſelf of ATHENS, and raſed their long walles euen to the ground. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing ſore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then

B without let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by ſea and by lande: he went into the countrie of BITHYNIA, and cauſed great good to be brought after him, and tooke a maruelous ſume of money with him, beſides great riches he left alſo in the caſtells of THRACIA, where he dyd remaine before. Howbeit he loſt much of his goodes in BITHYNIA, which certaine THRACIANS dwelling in that countrie had robbed him of, & taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the King had once proued him, he ſhould finde him a man of no leſſe ſeruice, then he had found Themiſtocles before him: beſides that the occaſion of his going thither, ſhould be muche iuſter then his was. For he dyd not goe thither, to make warre againſt the cittie of ATHENS and his countrie, as Themiſtocles did: but of a cõtrarie intent, to make interceſſion to the King, that it would pleaſe

C him to ayde them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could vſe no better meane, then Pharnabazus helpe only, to ſee him ſafely conducted to the Kings courte: he propoſed his iorney to him, into the countrie of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certaine time to attẽd vpon him, & was very honorably entertained and receyued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS founde them ſelues deſolate, & in miſerable ſtate to ſee their empire loſt: but then much more, when Lyſander had taken all their liberties, and dyd ſet thirtie gouernours ouer their cittie. Now to late, after all was loſt (where they might haue recouered againe, if they had bene wiſe) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miſeries and wretched ſtate, looking backe apon all their wilfull faultes and follies committed: emong which, they dyd reckon their ſecond time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greateſt faulte. So they baniſhed him only of ma-

And yet they had ſome litle poore hope lefte, that they were not altogether caſt awaye, ſo long as Alcibiades liued, and had his health. For before, when he was a forſaken man, and led a baniſhed life: yet he could not liue idely, and doe nothing. Wherefore now much more, ſayed they to them ſelues: if there be any helpe at all, he will not ſuffer out of doubt the inſolencie & pryde of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abyde the cruelties and outrages of theſe thirtie tyrauntes. And ſurely the common people had ſome reaſon to haue theſe thoughts in their heades, conſidering that the thirtie gouernours them

In ſo muche as Critias at the laſt, declared to Lyſander, that ſo long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon them ſelues Lordes ouer all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the cittie of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithſtanding the people of ATHENS could well awaye to liue like ſubiects vnder the gouernment of a fewe: yet Alcibiades whileſt he liued, would neuer ſuffer them ſo to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuiſe he could to bring a chaunge and innouation emong them. Yet Lyſander would not credit theſe perſuaſions, before ſpeciall commandement was ſent to him from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, vpon his alle-

The Lacedemonians will Lyſander to kill Alcibiades.

F giaunce, that he ſhould deuiſe to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either bicauſe in trothe they feared the ſubtiltie of his wit, and the greatnes of his corage, to enterpriſe matters of great weight and daunger, or els that they ſought to gratifie king Agis by it. Lyſander being thus ſtraightly commaunded, dyd ſend and practiſe incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the facte: who gaue his brother Magæus, and his vncle Susamithres, commission to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certen village of PHRYGIA, with a concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how she dandling him in her armes, had dressed his head, friseling his heare, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other saye, that he thought Magæus strake of his head, and made his bodie to be burnt: and the voyce goeth, this vision was but a litle before his death. Those that were sent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it a fire round about. Alcibiades spying the fire, got suche apparell and hanginges as he had, and threwe it on the fire, thincking to haue put it out: and so casting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked sworde in his other hande, and ranne out of the house, him selfe not once touched with fyer, sauing his clothes were a litle singed. These murderers so sone as they spied him, drewe backe, and stoode a sonder, and durst not one of them come neere him, to stande and fight with him: but a farre of, they bestowed so many arrowes and dartes of him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his bodie which she wrapped vp in the best linnen she had, and buried him as honorably as she could possible, with suche things as she had, and could get together. Some holde opinion that Lais, the only famous curtisan, which they saye was of CORINTHE (though in deede she was borne in a litle towne of SICILIA, called HYCCARA, where she was taken) was his doughter. Notwithstanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are some that agree to all the rest I haue written, sauing that they saye, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lysander, nor the LACEDÆMONIANS, which causèd him to be slaine: but that he keeping with him a young gentlewoman of a noble house, whom he had stolen awaye, and intised to follie: her brethern to reuenge this iniurie, went to set fire vpon the house where he was, and that they killed him as we haue tolde you, thinking to leape out of the fyre.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS Martius Coriolanus.

THE houſe of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which hath ſprong many noble perſonages: whereof Ancus Martius was one, king Numaes daughters ſonne, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hoſtilius. Of the ſame houſe were Publius, and Quintus, who brought to ROME their beſt water they had by conducts. Cenſorinus alſo came of that familie, that was ſo ſurnamed, bicauſe the people had choſen him Cenſor twiſe. Through whoſe perſuaſion they made a lawe, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enioye the Cenſorshippe twiſe. Caius Martius, whoſe life we intend now to write, being left an orphan by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widowe, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many diſcommodities to a childe, but doth not hinder him to become an honeſt man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common ſorte: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully doe complayne, that it is the occaſion of their caſting awaye, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to ſee them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man alſo is a good proofe to confirme ſome mens opinions. That a rare and excellent witte vntaught, doth bring forth many good and euill things together: like as a fat ſoile bringeth forth herbes & weedes that lieth vnmanured. For this Martius naturall wit and great harte dyd marueloufly ſturre vp his corage, to doe and attempt notable actes. But on the other ſide for lacke of education, he was ſo cholericke and impacient, that he would yeld to no liuing creature: which made him churliſhe, vnciuill, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuerſation. Yet men marueling much at his conſtancy, that he was neuer ouercome with pleaſure, nor money, and howe he would endure eaſely all manner of paynes and trauailles: thereupon they well liked and commended his ſtowtnes and temperancie. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one cittizen vſeth to be with another in the cittie. His behauiour was ſo vnpleaſaunt to them, by reaſon of a certaine inſolent and ſterne manner he had, which bicauſe it was to lordly, was diſliked. And to ſaye truely, the greateſt benefit that learning bringeth men vnto, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compaſſe and rule of reaſon, to be ciuill and curteous,& to like better the meane ſtate,then the higher.Now in thoſe dayes,valliantnes was honoured in Rome aboue all other vertues: which they called Virtus, by the name of vertue ſelfe,as including in that generall name,all other ſpeciall vertues beſides.So that Virtus in the Latin,was aſmuche as valliantnes.But Martius being more inclined to the warres,then any other gentleman of his time: beganne from his Childehood to geue him ſelf to handle weapons,and daylie dyd exerciſe him ſelfe therein. And outward he eſteemed armour to no purpoſe,vnles one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he dyd ſo exerciſe his bodie to hardnes,and all kynde of actiuitie,that he was very ſwift in ronning,ſtrong in wreſtling,& mightie in griping,ſo that no man could euer caſt him. In ſo much as thoſe that would trye maſteries with him for ſtrength and nimblenes,would ſaye when they were ouercome: that all was by reaſon of his naturall ſtrength,and hardnes of warde,that neuer yelded to any payne or toyle he tooke apon him.The firſt time he went to the warres,being but a ſtrippling,was when Tarquine ſurnamed the prowde (that had bene king of Rome, and was driuen out for his pride, after many attemptes made by ſundrie battells to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouercome)dyd come to Rome with all the ayde of the Latines, and many other people of Italie: euen as it were to ſet vp his whole reſt apon a battell by them, who with a great & mightie armie had vndertaken to put him into his Kingdome againe,not ſo much to pleaſure him, as to ouerthrowe the power of the Romaines,whoſe greatnes they both feared and enuied. In this battell,wherein were many hotte and ſharpe encounters of either partie,Martius valliantly fought in the ſight of the Dictator: & a Romaine ſouldier being throwen to the groũd euen hard by him,Martius ſtraight beſtrid him, and ſlue the enemie with his owne handes that had before ouerthrowen the Romaine. Hereupon,after the battell was wonne, the Dictator dyd not forget ſo noble an acte,& therefore firſt of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oken boughs. For whoſoeuer ſaueth the life of a Romaine,it is a mãner among them, to honour him with ſuch a garland. This was, either bicauſe the lawe dyd this honour to the oke,in fauour of the Arcadians,who by the oracle of Apollo were in very olde time called eaters of akornes: or els bicauſe the ſouldiers might eaſely in euery place come by oken boughes: or laſtely,bicauſe they thought it very neceſſarie to geue him that had ſaued a cittizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of their citties,and thought amongeſt other wilde trees to bring forth a profitable fruite,and of plantes to be the ſtrongeſt. Moreouer, men at the firſt beginning dyd vſe akornes for their bread, and honie for their drincke: and further, the oke dyd feede their beaſtes,and geue them birdes, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made birdlime to catche ſeely birdes.They ſaye that Caſtor,and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and how incontinently after the battell, men ſawe them in the market place at Rome, all their horſes being on a white ſome: and they were the firſt that brought newes of the victorie, euen in the ſame place,where remaineth at this preſent a tẽple built in the honour of them neere vnto the fountaine.And this is the cauſe,why the daye of this victorie (which was the fiftenth of Iulye) is conſecrated yet to this daye vnto Caſtor and Pollux.Moreouer it is daylie ſeene, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, and before they haue no great corage by nature: the deſire to winne more,dieth ſtraight in them,which eaſely happeneth,the ſame hauing no deepe roote in them before. Where contrariwiſe, the firſt honour that valliant mindes doe come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, haſting them forward as with force of winde,to enterpriſe things of highe deſeruing praiſe.For they eſteeme,not to receaue reward for ſeruice done, but rather take it for a remembraunce and encoragement, to make them doe better in time to come: and be aſhamed alſo to caſt their honour at their heeles,not ſeeking to increaſe it ſtill by like deſerte of worthie valliant dedes. This deſire being bred in Martius,he ſtrained ſtill to paſſe him ſelfe in manlines: and being deſirous to ſhewe a daylie increaſe of his valliantnes,his noble ſeruice dyd ſtill aduaunce his fame, bringing in ſpoyles apon ſpoyles from the enemie.Whereupon,the captaines that came afterwards(for enuie of them that went before) dyd contend who ſhould moſt honour him, and who ſhould beare moſt honorable teſtimonie of his valliantnes.In ſo much the Romaines hauing many warres and battells in thoſe dayes,Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence

A whence he returned not without ſome rewarde of honour. And as for other, the only reſpect that made them valliant, was they hoped to haue honour: but touching Martius, the only thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioye he ſawe his mother dyd take of him. For he thought nothing made him ſo happie and honorable, as that his mother might heare euery bodie praiſe and commend him, that ſhe might allwayes ſee him returne with a crowne vpon his head, and that ſhe might ſtill embrace him with teares ronning downe her cheekes for ioye. Which deſire they ſaye Epaminondas dyd auowe, and confeſſe to haue bene in him: as to thinke him ſelfe a moſt happie and bleſſed man, that his father and mother in their life time had ſeene the victorie he wanne in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good happe, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioye and proſpe-
B ritie. But Martius thinking all due to his mother, that had bene alſo due to his father if he had liued: dyd not only content him ſelfe to reioyce and honour her, but at her deſire tooke a wife alſo, by whom he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers houſe therefore. Now he being growen to great credit & authoritie in ROME for his valliantnes, it fortuned there grewe ſedition in the cittie, bicauſe the Senate dyd fauour the riche againſt the people, who dyd cõplaine of the ſore oppreſſion of vſerers, of whom they borowed money. For thoſe that had litle, were yet ſpoyled of that litle they had by their creditours, for lacke of abilitie to paye the vſerie: who offered their goodes to be ſolde, to them that would geue moſt. And ſuche as had nothing left, their bodies were layed holde of, and they were made their bonde men, notwithſtanding all the woundes and cuttes they ſhewed, which they had receyued in many bat-
C tells, fighting for defence of their countrie and common wealth: of the which, the laſt warre they made, was againſt the SABYNES, wherein they fought apon the promiſe the riche men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate them more gently, and alſo vpon the worde of Marcus Valerius chief of the Senate, who by authoritie of the counſell, and in the behalfe of the riche, ſayed they ſhould performe that they had promiſed. But after that they had faithfully ſerued in this laſt battell of all, where they ouercame their enemies, ſeeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would geue no eare to them, but make as though they had forgotten their former promiſe, and ſuffered them to be made ſlaues and bonde men to their creditours, and beſides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutine, and to ſturre vp daungerous D tumultes within the cittie. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion, dyd ſtraight enter the territories of ROME with a maruelous great power, ſpoyling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by ſounde of trumpet, that all thoſe which were of lawfull age to carie weapon, ſhould come and enter their names into the muſter maſters booke, to goe to the warres: but no man obeyed their commaundement. Whereupon their chief magiſtrates, and many of the Senate, beganne to be of diuers opinions emong them ſelues. For ſome thought it was reaſon, they ſhould ſomewhat yeld to the poore peoples requeſt, and that they ſhould a litle qualifie the ſeueritie of the lawe. Other held hard againſt that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alleaged, that the credi-
E tours loſing their money they had lent, was not the worſt thing that was thereby: but that the lenitie that was fauored, was a beginning of diſobedience, and that the prowde attempt of the communaltie, was to aboliſh lawe, and to bring all to confuſion. Therefore he ſayed, if the Senate were wiſe, they ſhould betimes preuent, & quenche this ill fauored & worſe ment beginning. The Senate met many dayes in conſultation about it but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore cõmon people ſeeing no redreſſe, gathered them ſelues one daye together, & one encoraging another, they all forſooke the cittie, & encamped them ſelues vpon a hill, called at this daye the holy hill, alongeſt the riuer of Tyber, offering no creature any hurte or violence, or making any ſhewe of actuall rebellion: ſauing that they cried as they went vp and down, that the riche men had driuen them out of the cittie, and that all PEACE through they ſhould finde ayer, water, & ground to burie them in. Moreouer, they ſayed, to dwell at ROME F was nothing els but to be ſlaine, or hurte with continuall warres, and fighting for defence of the riche mens goodes. The Senate being afeard of their departure, dyd ſend vnto them certaine of the pleaſaunteſt olde men, and the moſt acceptable to the people, among them. Of thoſe, Menenius Agrippa was he, who was ſent for chief man of the meſſage from the Senate. He, after many good perſuaſions and gentle requeſtes made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate: knit vp his oration in the ende, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans bodie, dyd rebell againſt the bellie, complaining of it, that it only remained in the middeſt of the bodie, without doing any thing, neither dyd beare any labour to the maintenaunce of the reſt: whereas all other partes and members dyd labour paynefully, & was very carefull to ſatisfie the appetites and deſiers of the bodie. And ſo the bellie, all this notwithſtanding, laughed at their follie, and ſayed. It is true, I firſt receyue all meates that noriſhe mans bodie: but afterwardes I ſend it againe to the noriſhement of other partes of the ſame. Euen ſo (q he) ô you, my maſters, and cittizens of Rome: the reaſon is a like betweene the Senate, & you. For matters being well digeſted, & their coũſells throughly examined, touching the benefit of the common wealth: the Senatours are cauſe of the common cõmoditie that cõmeth vnto euery one of you. Theſe perſuaſions pacified the people, conditionally, that the Senate would graunte there ſhould be yerely choſen fiue magiſtrates, which they now call Tribuni Plebis, whoſe office ſhould be to defend the poore people from violence and oppreſſion. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinius Vellutus, were the firſt Tribunes of the people that were choſen, who had only bene the cauſers & procurers of this ſedition. Hereupon the cittie being growen againe to good quiet and vnitie, the people immediatly went to the warres, ſhewing that they had a good will to doe better then euer they dyd, and to be very willing to obey the magiſtrates in that they would commaund, concerning the warres. Martius alſo, though it liked him nothing to ſee the greatnes of the people thus increaſed, conſidering it was to the preiudice, and imbaſing of the nobilitie, and alſo ſawe that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as him ſelfe: he dyd perſuade the Patricians, to ſhew them ſelues no leſſe forward and willing to fight for their countrie, then the common people were: and to let them knowe by their dedes and actes, that they dyd not ſo muche paſſe the people in power and riches, as they dyd exceede them in true nobilitie and valliantnes. In the countrie of the Volsces, againſt whom the Romaines made warre at that time, there was a principall cittie & of moſt fame, that was called Coriоles, before the which the Conſul Cominius dyd laye ſeige. Wherefore all the other Volsces fearing leaſt that cittie ſhould be taken by aſſault, they came from all partes of the countrie to ſaue it, entending to geue the Romaines battell before the cittie, and to geue an onſet on them in two ſeuerall places. The Conſul Cominius vnderſtanding this, deuided his armie alſo in two partes, and taking the one parte with him ſelfe, he marched towards them that were drawing to the cittie, out of the countrie: and the other parte of his armie he left in the campe with Titus Lartius (one of the valliantеſt men the Romaines had at that time) to reſiſt thoſe that would make any ſalye out of the cittie apon them. So the Coriolans making ſmall accompt of them that laye in campe before the cittie, made a ſalye out apon them, in the which at the firſt the Coriolans had the better, and draue the Romaines backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, ronning out of the campe with a fewe men with him, he ſlue the firſt enemies he met withall, and made the reſt of them ſtaye vpon a ſodaine, crying out to the Romaines that had turned their backes, and calling them againe to fight with a lowde voyce. For he was euen ſuch another, as Cato would haue a ſouldier and a captaine to be: not only terrible, and fierce to laye about him, but to make the enemie afeard with the ſounde of his voyce, and grimnes of his countenaunce. Then there flocked about him immedlatly, a great number of Romaines whereat the enemies were ſo afeard, that they gaue backe preſently. But Martius not ſtaying ſo, dyd chaſe and followe them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there, perceyuing that the Romaines retired backe, for the great number of dartes and arrowes which flewe about their eares frõ the walles of the cittie, & that there was not one man amongeſt them that durſt venter him ſelfe to followe the flying enemies into the cittie, for that it was full of men of warre, verie well armed, and appointed: he dyd encorage his fellowes with wordes and dedes, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the gates of the cittie more for the followers, then the flyers. But all this notwithſtanding, fewe had the hartes to followe him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng emong the enemies, thruſt him ſelfe into the gates of the cittie, and entred

A tred the ſame emong them that fled, without that any one of them durſt at the firſt turne their face vpon him, or els offer to ſtaye him. But he looking about him, & ſeeing he was entred the cittie with very fewe men to helpe him, & perceyuing he was enuironned by his enemies that gathered round about to ſet apon him: dyd things then as it is written, wonderfull & incredible, aſwell for the force of his hande, as alſo for the agillitie of his bodie, and with a wonderfull corage & valliantnes, he made a lane through the middeſt of them, and ouerthrewe alſo thoſe he layed at: that ſome he made ronne to the furtheſt parte of the cittie, & other for feare he made yeld them ſelues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Lartius that was gotten out, had ſome leyſure to bring the ROMAINES with more ſafety into the cittie. The cittie being taken in this ſorte, the moſt parte of the ſouldiers beganne incontinently to The cittie of Corioles take.
B ſpoyle, to carie awaye, & to looke vp the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was maruelous angry with them, and cried out on them, that it was no time now to looke after ſpoyle, & to ronne ſtraggling here and there to enriche them ſelues, whileſt the other Conſul and their fellowe cittizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and howe that leauing the ſpoyle they ſhould ſeeke to winde them ſelues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit, crie, and ſaye to them what he could, very fewe of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking thoſe that willingly offered them ſelues to followe him, he went out of the cittie, and tooke his waye towardes that parte, where he vnderſtoode the reſt of the armie was: exhorting and intreating them by the waye that followed him, not to be fainte harted, and ofte holding vp his handes to heauen, he beſought the goddes to be ſo gracious and fauorable
C vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in good hower to hazarde his life in defence of his country men. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell raye, and ready to take their targettes on their armes, and to guirde them vpon their arming coates, had a cuſtome to make their willes at that very inſtant, without any manner of writing, naming him only whom they would make their heire, in the preſence of three or foure Souldiers teſtaments.
witneſſes. Martius came iuſt to that reckoning, whileſt the ſouldiers were a doing after that ſorte, and that the enemies were approched ſo neere, as one ſtoode in viewe of the other. When they ſawe him at his firſt comming, all bloody, and in a ſwet, and but with a fewe men following him: ſome thereupon beganne to be afeard. But ſone after, when they ſawe him ronne with a liuely cheere to the Conſul, and to take him by the hande, decla-D ring howe he had taken the cittie of CORIOLES, and that they ſawe the Conſul Cominius alſo kiſſe and embrace him: then there was not a man but tooke harte againe to him, and beganne to be of a good corage, ſome hearing him reporte from poynte to poynte, the happy ſucceſſe of this exployte, and other alſo coniecturing it by ſeeing their geſtures a farre of. Then they all beganne to call vpon the Conſul to marche forward, and to delaye no lenger, but to geue charge vpon the enemie. Martius asked him howe the order of their enemies By Coriolanus meanes, the Volſci were ouercome in battell.
battell was, and on which ſide they had placed their beſt fighting men. The Conſul made him aunſwer, that he thought the bandes which were in the voward of their battell, were thoſe of the ANTIATES, whom they eſteemed to be the warlikeſt men, and which for valliant corage would geue no place, to any of the hoſte of their enemies. Then prayed Mar- E tius, to be ſet directly againſt them. The Conſul graunted him, greatly prayſing his corage. Then Martius, when both armies came almoſt to ioyne, aduaunced him ſelfe a good ſpace before his companie, and went ſo fiercely to geue charge on the voward that came right againſt him, that they could ſtande no lenger in his handes: he made ſuche a lane through them, and opened a paſſage into the battell of the enemies. But the two winges of either ſide turned one to the other, to compaſſe him in betweene them: which the Conſul Cominius perceyuing, he ſent thither ſtraight of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruelous bloudie about Martius, and in a very ſhorte ſpace many were ſlaine in the place. But in the ende the ROMAINES were ſo ſtrong, that they diſtreſſed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and ſcattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed F Martius that he would retire to the campe, bicauſe they ſawe he was able to doe no more, he was already ſo wearied with the great payne he had taken, and ſo fainte with the great woundes he had apon him. But Martius aunſwered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeld, nor to be fainte harted: and thereupon beganne a freshe to chase those A that fled, vntill suche time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowen, and numbers of them slaine, and taken prisoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Consul, and the other ROMAINES with him. There the Consul Cominius going vp to his chayer of state, in the presence of the whole armie, gaue thankes to the goddes for so great, glorious, and prosperous a victorie: then he spake to Martius, whose valliantnes he commended beyond the moone, both for that he him selfe sawe him doe with his eyes, as also for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martius, he should choose out of all the horses they had taken of their enemies, and of all the goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of euery sorte which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this great honorable offer he had B made him, he gaue him in testimonie that he had wonne that daye the price of prowes aboue all other, a goodly horse with a cappariſon, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, dyd maruelously praise and commend. But Martius stepping forth, tolde the Consul, he most thanckefully accepted the gifte of his horse, and was a glad man besides, that his seruice had deserued his generalls commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenary reward, then an honorable recompence, he would none of it, but was contented to haue his equall parte with other souldiers. Only, this grace (sayed he) I craue, and beseeche you to graunt me. Among the VOLSCES there is an olde friende and hoste of mine, an honest wealthie man, and now a prisoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrie, liueth now a poore prisoner in the handes of C his enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his miserie and misfortune, it would doe me great pleasure if I could saue him from this one daunger: to keepe him from being solde as a slaue. The souldiers hearing Martius wordes, made a maruelous great showte among them: and they were moe that wondred at his great contentation and abstinence, when they sawe so litle couetousnes in him, then they were that highely praised and extolled his valliantnes. For euen they them selues, that dyd somewhat malice and enuie his glorie, to see him thus honoured, and passingly prayſed, dyd thincke him so muche the more worthy of an honorable recompence for his valliant seruice, as the more carelesly he refused the great offer made him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse suche rewards, then that which made them to be offred him, D as vnto a worthie persone. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valliant: and yet it is better not to desire them, then to vse them well. After this showte and noyse of the assembly was somewhat appeased, the Consul Cominius beganne to speake in this sorte. We cannot compell Martius to take these giftes we offer him, if he will not receaue them: but we will geue him suche a rewarde for the noble seruice he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we doe order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, onles his valliant acts haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And so euer since, he stil bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the ROMAINES haue, as Caius: was our Christian name now. The second, as Martius: was the name of the house and familie they came of. The third, was some addition geuen, either for some acte or E notable seruice, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their bodie, or els for some speciall vertue they had. Euen so dyd the GRÆCIANS in olde time giue additions to Princes, by reason of some notable acte worthie memorie. As when they haue called some, Soter, and Callinicos: as muche to saye, sauiour and conquerour. Or els for some notable apparaunt marke on ones face, or on his bodie, they haue called him Phiſcon, and Grypos: as ye would saye, gorebelley, and hooke nosed: or els for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Phyladelphos: to wit, a Benefactour, and louer of his brethern. Or otherwise for ones great felicitie, as Eudæmon: as muche to saye, as fortunate. For so was the second of the * Battes surnamed. And some Kings haue had surnames of ieast and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was called Doſon, to saye, the Geuer: who was euer promising, and neuer geuing. And one F of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to saye, conceitiue. The ROMAINES vse more then any other nation, to giue names of mockerie in this sorte. As there was one Metellus

A surnamed Diadematus, the banded: bicause he caried a bande about his heade of longe time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne familie was called Celer: the quicke flye. Bicause a fewe dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fensers at vnrebated swordes, which they founde wonderfull for the shortnes of time. Other had their surnames deriued of some accident of their birthe. As to this daye they call him Proculeius, that is borne, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumius, that is borne after the deathe of his father. And when of two brethern twinnes, the one doth dye, and thother suruiueth: they call the suruiuer, Vopiscus. Somtimes also they geue surnames deriued of some marke or misfortune of the bodie. As Sylla, to saye, crooked nosed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cæcus, blinde: Claudus, lame. They dyd wisely B in this thing to accustome men to thincke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such misfortunes as maye chaunce to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to aunswer boldly to suche names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other stories then this. Now when this warre was ended, the flatterers of the people beganne to sturre vp sedition againe, without any newe occasion, or iust matter offered of complainte. For they dyd grounde this seconde insurrection against the Nobilitie and Patricians, apon the peoples miserie & misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discorde and sedition betweene them and the Nobilitie. Bicause the most parte of the errable lande within the territorie of Rome, was become heathie and barren for lacke of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cause corne, C to be brought them out of other countries to sowe, by reason of their warres which made the extreme dearth they had emõg them. Now those busie pratlers that sought the peoples good will, by suche flattering wordes, perceyuing great scarsitie of corne to be within the cittie, and though there had bene plenty enough, yet the common people had no money to buye it: they spread abroad false tales and rumours against the Nobilitie, that they in reuenge of the people, had practised and procured the extreme dearthe emong them. Furthermore, in the middest of this sturre, there came ambassadours to Rome from the cittie of Velitres, that offered vp their cittie to the Romaines, and prayed them they would send newe inhabitants to replenishe the same: bicause the plague had bene so extreme among them, & had killed such a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth persone of the people that had bene D there before. So the wise men of Rome beganne to thincke, that the necessitie of the Velitrians fell out in a most happy hower, and howe by this occasion it was very mete in so great a scarsitie of vittailes, to disburden Rome of a great number of cittizens: and by this meanes as well to take awaye this newe sedition, and vtterly to ryd it out of the cittie, as also to cleare the same of many mutinous and seditious persones, being the superfluous ill humours that greuously fedde this disease. Hereupon the Consuls prickt out all those by a bill, whom they intended to sende to Velitres, to goe dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out of all the rest that remained in the cittie of Rome, a great number to goe against the Volsces, hoping by the meanes of forreine warre, to pacifie their sedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the riche, and the E meane sorte with the nobilitie, should by this deuise be abroad in the warres, & in one campe, and in one seruice, and in one like daunger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two seditious Tribunes, spake against either of these deuises, and cried out apon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a colonie, they would cloke and culler the most cruell and vnnaturall facte as might be: bicause they sent their poore cittizens into a sore infected cittie and pestilent ayer, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there also to dwell vnder the tuytion of a straunge god, that had so cruelly persecuted his people. This were (said they) euen as muche, as if the Senate should hedlong cast downe the people into a most bottomles pyt. And are not yet contented to haue famished some of the poore cittizens hertofore to death, & to put other of them euen to the mercie of the plague:
F but a freshe, they haue procured a voluntarie warre, to the ende they would leaue behind no kynde of miserie and ill, wherewith the poore syllie people should not be plagued, and only bicause they are werie to serue the riche. The common people being set on a broyle Velitres made a colonie to Rome.

Two practises to remoue the sedition in Rome.

Sicinius and Brutus Tribunes of the people, against both those deuises.

and brauerie with theſe wordes, would not appeare when the Conſuls called their names by a bill, to preſt them for the warres, neither would they be ſent out to this newe colonie: in ſo muche as the Senate knewe not well what to ſaye, or doe in the matter. Martius then, who was now growen to great credit, and a ſtowte man beſides, and of great reputation with the nobleſt men of ROME, roſe vp, and openly ſpake againſt theſe flattering Tribunes. And for the repleniſhing of the cittie of VELITRES, he dyd compell thoſe that were choſen, to goe thither, and to departe the cittie, apon great penalties to him that ſhould diſobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or conſtrained. So Martius taking his friendes and followers with him, and ſuch as he could by fayer wordes intreate to goe with him, dyd ronne certen forreyes into the dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruelous great ſpoyle, aſwell of cattell, as of men he had taken priſoners, whom he brought awaye with him, and reſerued nothing for him ſelfe. Afterwardes hauing brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, ſafe and ſounde to ROME, and euery man riche and loden with ſpoyle: then the hometarriers and houſedoues that kept ROME ſtill, beganne to repent them that it was not their happe to goe with him, and ſo enuied both them that had ſped ſo well in this iorney, and alſo of malice to Martius, they ſpited to ſee his credit and eſtimation increaſe ſtill more and more, bicauſe they accompted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortely after this, Martius ſtoode for the Conſulſhippe: and the common people fauored his ſute, thinking it would be a ſhame to them to denie, and refuſe, the chiefeſt noble man of bloude, and moſt worthie perſone of ROME, and ſpecially him that had done ſo great ſeruice and good to the common wealth. For the cuſtome of ROME was at that time, that ſuche as dyd ſue for any office, ſhould for certen dayes before be in the market place, only with a poore gowne on their backes, and without any coate vnderneath, to praye the cittizens to remember them at the daye of election: which was thus deuiſed, either to moue the people the more, by requeſting them in ſuche meane apparell, or els bicauſe they might ſhewe them their woundes they had gotten in the warres in the ſeruice of the cõmon wealth, as manifeſt markes & teſtimonie of their valliantnes. Now it is not to be thought that the ſuters went thus loſe in a ſimple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and ſuſpition of the common people: for offices of dignitie in the cittie were not then geuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and ſelling fell out in election of officers, and that the voyces of the electours were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten waye into the election of offices, it hath ronne from man to man, euen to the very ſentence of iudges, and alſo emong captaines in the warres: ſo as in the ende, that only turned common wealthes into Kingdomes, by making armes ſubiect to money. Therefore me thinckes he had reaſon that ſayed: he that firſt made banckets, and gaue money to the common people, was the firſt that tooke awaye authoritie, and deſtroyed common wealth. But this peſtilence crept in by litle and litle, and dyd ſecretly winne ground ſtill, continuing a long time in ROME, before it was openly knowen and diſcouered. For no man can tell who was the firſt man that bought the peoples voyces for money, nor that corrupted the ſentence of the iudges. Howbeit at ATHENS ſome holde opinion, that Anytus, the ſonne of Anthemion, was the firſt man that fedde the iudges with money, about the ende of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, being accuſed of treaſon for yelding vp the forte of PYLE, at that time, when the golden and vnfoiled age remained yet whole in iudgement at Rome. Now Martius following this cuſtome, ſhewed many woundes and cuttes apon his bodie, which he had receyued in ſeuenteene yeres ſeruice at the warres, and in many ſundrie battells, being euer the formeſt man that dyd ſet out feete to fight. So that there was not a man emong the people, but was aſhamed of him ſelfe, to refuſe ſo valliant a man: and one of them ſayed to another, we muſt needes chuſe him Conſul, there is no remedie. But when the daye of election was come, and that Martius came to the market place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the cittie about him, who ſought to make him Conſul, with the greateſt inſtance and intreatie they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common people, Anytus the Athenian, the firſt that with money corrupted the ſentence of the iudge, and voyces of the people.

A people, turned ſtraight to an hate and enuie toward him, fearing to put this office of ſouereine authoritie into his handes, being a man ſomewhat partiall toward the nobilitie, and of great credit and authoritie amongeſt the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away alltogether the libertie from the people. Whereupon for theſe cõſiderations, they refuſed Martius in the ende, and made two other that were ſuters, Conſuls. The Senate being maruelouſly offended with the people, dyd accompt the ſhame of this refuſall, rather to redownd to them ſelues, then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worſe parte then the Senate, and was out of all pacience. For he was a man to full of paſſion and choller, and to muche geuen to ouer ſelfe will and opinion, as one of a highe minde and great corage, that lacked the grauity, and affabilitie that is gotten with iudgment of learning and reaſon, which only is to B be looked for in a gouernour of ſtate: and that remembred not how wilfulnes is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a cõmon wealth for pleaſing ſhould ſhõne, being that which Plato called ſolitarines. As in the ende, all men that are wilfully geuen to a ſelfe opinion & obſtinate minde, and who will neuer yeld to others reaſon, but to their owne: remaine without cõpanie, & forſaken of all men. For a man that will liue in the world, muſt nedes haue patience, which luſty bloudes make but a mocke at. So Martius being a ſtowte man of nature, that neuer yelded in any reſpect, as one thincking that to ouercome allwayes, and to haue the vpper hande in all matters, was a token of magnanimitie, and of no baſe and fainte corage, which ſpitteth out anger from the moſt weake and paſſioned parte of the harte, much like the matter of an impoſtume: went home to his houſe, full fraighted with ſpite and malice againſt the C people, being accompanied with all the luſtieſt young gentlemen, whoſe mindes were nobly bent, as thoſe that came of noble race, and commonly vſed for to followe and honour him. But then ſpecially they floct about him, and kept him companie, to his muche harme: for they dyd but kyndle and inflame his choller more and more, being ſorie with him for the iniurie the people offred him, bicauſe he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marſhall diſcipline, and ſtirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valliantnes, and yet without enuie, praiſing them that deſerued beſt. In the meane ſeaſon, there came great plenty of corne to Rome, that had bene bought, parte in Italie, and parte was ſent out of Sicile, as geuen by Gelon the tyranne of Syracvsa: ſo that many ſtoode in great hope, that the dearthe of vittells being holpen, the ciuill diſſention would alſo ceaſe.
D The Senate ſate in counſell apon it immediatly, the common people ſtoode alſo about the palice where the counſell was kept, gaping what reſolution would fall out: perſuading them ſelues, that the corne they had bought ſhould be ſolde good cheape, and that which was geuen, ſhould be deuided by the polle, without paying any pennie, and the rather, bicauſe certaine of the Senatours amongeſt them dyd ſo wiſhe and perſuade the ſame. But Martius ſtanding vp on his feete, dyd ſomewhat ſharpely take vp thoſe, who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people pleaſers, and traitours to the nobilitie. Moreouer he ſayed they nourriſhed againſt them ſelues, the naughty ſeede and cockle, of inſolencie and ſedition, which had bene ſowed and ſcattered abroade emongeſt the people, whom they ſhould haue cut of, if they had bene wiſe, and haue preuented their greatnes: and not to their owne
E deſtruction to haue ſuffered the people, to ſtabliſhe a magiſtrate for them ſelues, of ſo great power and authoritie, as that man had, to whom they had graunted it. Who was alſo to be feared, bicauſe he obtained what he would, and dyd nothing but what he liſted, neither paſſed for any obedience to the Conſuls, but liued in all libertie, acknowledging no ſuperiour to commaund him, ſauing the only heades and authours of their faction, whom he called his magiſtrates. Therefore ſayed he, they that gaue counſell, and perſuaded that the corne ſhould be geuen out to the common people gratis, as they vſed to doe in citties of Greece, where the people had more abſolute power: dyd but only nouriſhe their diſobedience, which would breake out in the ende, to the vtter ruine and ouerthrowe of the whole ſtate. For they will not thincke it is done in recompẽſe of their ſeruice paſt, ſithence they know well enough F they haue ſo ofte refuſed to goe to the warres, when they were cõmaunded: neither for their mutinies when they wẽt with vs, whereby they haue rebelled & forſaken their coũtrie: neither for their accuſations which their flatterers haue preferred vnto them, & they haue receyued, » yea, ſhall I ſaye more? we ſhould if we were wiſe, take from them their Tribuneſhippe, which like reaſons, wanne all the young men, and almoſt all the riche men to his opinion: in ſo much they range it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the cittie, who ſtoode out againſt the B people, & neuer flattered them. There were only a fewe olde men that ſpake againſt him, fearing leaſt ſome miſchief might fall out apon it, as in dede there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being preſent at this conſultation of the Senate, when they ſawe that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voyces, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would aſſemble to ſaue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ranne on head in tumult together, before whom the wordes that Martius ſpake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people ſo ſtoma-ked, that euen in that furie they were readie to flye apon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes layed all the faulte and burden wholy vpon Martius, and ſent their ſergeantes forthwith to arreſt him, preſently to appeare in perſone before the people, to aunſwer the wordes he had C C ſpoken in the Senate. Martius ſtowtely withſtoode theſe officers that came to arreſt him. Then Sedition at Rome for Coriolanus. the Tribunes in their owne perſones, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetche him by force, and ſo layed violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes geue backe, and layed it ſore apon the Ædiles: ſo for that time, the night parted them, & the tumult appeaſed. The next morning betimes, the Conſuls ſeing the people in an vprore, ronning to the market place out of all partes of the cittie, they were affrayed leaſt all the cittie would together by the eares: wherefore aſſembling the Senate in all haſt, they declared how it ſtoode them vpon, to appeaſe the furie of the people, with ſome gentle wordes, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wiſe men they ſhould conſider, it was now no time to ſtande at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for ho- D D nour againſt the communaltie: they being fallen to ſo great an extremitie, and offering ſuch imminēt daunger. Wherefore they were to conſider temperately of things, & to deliuer ſome preſent and gentle pacification. The moſt parte of the Senatours that were preſent at this counſaill, thought this opinion beſt, & gaue their conſents vnto it. Whereupon the Conſuls riſing out of counſaill, went to ſpeake vnto the people as gently as they could, and they dyd pacifie their furie & anger, purging the Senate of all the vniuſt accuſations layed vpon them, and vſed great modeſtie in perſuading them, and alſo in reprouing the faultes they had committed. And as for the reſt, that touched the ſale of corne: they promiſed there ſhould be no diſliking offred them in the price. So the moſt parte of the people being pacified, and appearing ſo plainely by the great ſilence and ſtill that was among them, as yelding to the Conſuls, E E and liking well of their wordes: the Tribunes then of the people roſe out of their ſeates, and ſayed. Foraſmuche as the Senate yelded vnto reaſon, the people alſo for their parte, as became them, dyd likewiſe geue place vnto them: but notwithſtanding, they would that Martius ſhould come in perſone to aunſwer to the articles they had deuiſed. Firſt, whether he had not Articles againſt Coriolanus. ſolicited and procured the Senate to chaunge the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and to take the ſoueraine authoritie out of the peoples handes. Next, when he was ſent for by autho-ritie of their officers, why he dyd contemptuouſly reſiſt and diſobey. Laſtely, ſeeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the worlde: if in doing this, he had not done as muche as in him laye, to raiſe ciuill warres, and to ſet one cittizen againſt another.

All this was ſpoken to one of theſe two endes, either that Martius againſt his nature ſhould F F be conſtrained to humble him ſelfe, and to abaſe his hawty and fierce minde: or els if he continued ſtill in his ſtowtnes, he ſhould incurre the peoples diſpleaſure and ill will ſo farre, that he

A he ſhould neuer poſſibly winne them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out ſo, then otherwiſe: as in deede they geſt vnhappely, conſidering Martius nature and diſpoſition. So Martius came, and preſented him ſelfe, to aunſwer their accuſations againſt him, & the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would ſaye. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly wordes come from him, he beganne not only to vſe his wonted boldnes of ſpeaking (which of it ſelfe was very rough and vnpleaſaunt, and dyd more aggrauate his accuſation, then purge his innocencie) but alſo gaue him ſelfe in his wordes to thunder, and looke therewithall ſo grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This ſtirred coales emong the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grewe ſo toward him, that they could holde no lenger, beare, nor indure his bra-

Coriolanus ſtowtnes in defence of him ſelfe.

B uery and careles boldnes. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruelleſt and ſtowteſt of the Tribunes, after he had whiſpered a litle with his companions, dyd openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to dye. Then preſently he commaunded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and carie him ſtraight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to caſt him hedlong downe the ſame. When the Ædiles came to laye handes vpon Martius to doe that they were commaunded, diuers of the people them ſelues thought it to cruell, and violent a dede. The noble men alſo being muche troubled to ſee ſuch force and rigour vſed, beganne to crie alowde, helpe Martius: ſo thoſe that layed handes of him being repulſed, they compaſſed him in rounde emong them ſelues, and ſome of them holding vp their handes to the people, beſought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their wordes, nor crying out could Sicinius the Tribune, pronounceth ſentence of death vpō Martius.

C ought preuaile, the tumulte and hurly burley was ſo great, vntill ſuche time as the Tribunes owne friendes and kinſemen weying with them ſelues the impoſſiblenes to conuey Martius to execution, without great ſlaughter & murder of the nobilitie: dyd perſuade and aduiſe not to proceede in ſo violent and extraordinary a ſorte, as to put ſuch a man to death, without lawfull proceſſe in lawe, but that they ſhould referre the ſentence of his death, to the free voyce of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking him ſelf a litle, dyd aske the Patricians, for what cauſe they tooke Martius out of the officers handes that went to doe execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of them ſelues, ſo cruelly and wickedly put to death, ſo noble and valliant a Romaine, as Martius was, and that without lawe or iuſtice? Well, then ſayed Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no more quarrell or diſſention againſt the peo-

Coriolanus hath daye geuen him to aunſwer the people.

D ple: for they doe graunt your demaūde, that his cauſe ſhalbe heard according to the law. Therfore ſayed he to Martius, we doe will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third daye of our next ſitting and aſſembly here, to make your purgation for ſuch articles as ſhalbe obiected againſt you, that by free voyce the people maye geue ſentence apon you as ſhall pleaſe them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were muche pleaſed they had gotten Martius out of this daunger. In the meane ſpace, before the third day of their next ceſſion came about, the ſame being kept euery nineth daye continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latin, Nundinæ: there fell out warre againſt the Antiates, which gaue ſome hope to the nobilitie, that this adiornment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them ſo longe, as that the furie of the people againſt him would be well

E ſwaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reaſon of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expectation, the peace was concluded preſently with the Antiates, and the people returned again to Rome. Then the Patricians aſſembled oftentimes together, to conſult how they might ſtande to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occaſion to cauſe the people to mutine againe, and riſe againſt the nobilitie. And there Appius Clodius (one that was taken euer as an heauy enemie to the people) dyd auowe and proteſt, that they would vtterly abaſe the authoritie of the Senate, and deſtroye the common weale, if they would ſuffer the common people to haue authoritie by voyces to geue iudgment againſt the nobilitie. On thother ſide againe, the moſt auncient Senatours, & ſuche as were geuen to fauour the cōmon people ſayed: that when the people ſhould ſee they had authoritie of life and death in their handes, they would

F not be ſo cruell & fierce, but gentle and ciuill. More alſo, that it was not for contempt of nobilitie or the Senate, that they ſought to haue the authoritie of iuſtice in their handes, as a preheminence and prerogatiue of honour: but bicauſe they feared, that them ſelues ſhould be contemned and hated of the nobilitie. So as they were perſuaded, that ſo ſone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voyces: ſo ſone would they leaue all enuie and malice to condemne anye. Martius ſeeing the Senate in great doubt how to reſolue, partely for the loue and good will the nobilitie dyd beare him, and partely for the feare they ſtoode in of the people: asked alowde of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden him with? The Tribunes aunſwered him, that they would ſhewe howe he dyd aſpire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer ROME. Martius with that, riſing vp on his feete, ſayed: that thereupon he dyd willingly offer him ſelf to the people, to be tried apon that accuſation. And that if it were proued by him, he had ſo muche as once thought of any ſuche matter, that he would then refuſe no kinde of puniſhment they would offer him: conditionally (q he) that you charge me with nothing els beſides, and that ye doe not alſo abuſe the Senate. They promiſed they would not. Vnder theſe conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people aſſembled. And firſt of all the Tribunes would in any caſe (whatſoeuer became of it) that the people would proceede to geue their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needy people (and all ſuche rable as had nothing to loſe, and had leſſe regard of honeſtie before their eyes) came to be of greater force (bicauſe their voyces were numbred by the polle) then the noble honeſt cittizens, whoſe perſones and purſe dyd duetifully ſerue the common wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes ſawe they could not proue he went about to make him ſelf King: they beganne to broache a freſhe the former wordes that Martius had ſpoken in the Senate, in hindering the diſtribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, and perſuading alſo to take the office of Tribuneſhippe from them. And for the third, they charged him a newe, that he had not made the common diſtribution of the ſpoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iorney. But this matter was moſt ſtraunge of all to Martius, looking leaſt to haue bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Wherupon being burdened on the ſodaine, and hauing no ready excuſe to make euen at that inſtant: he beganne to fall a praiſing of the ſouldiers that had ſerued with him in that iorney. But thoſe that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out ſo lowde, and made ſuche a noyſe, that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be baniſhed for life. After declaration of the ſentence, the people made ſuche ioye, as they neuer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were ſo braue and liuely, & went home ſo iocondly from the aſſembly, for triumphe of this ſentēce. The Senate againe in contrary manner were as ſad and heauie, repenting them ſelues beyond meaſure, that they had not rather determined to haue done & ſuffered any thing whatſoeuer, before the cōmon people ſhould ſo arrogantly, and outrageouſly haue abuſed their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrāt you, nor outward ſhowes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were eaſely decerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples ſide, looked cheerely on the matter: but he that was ſad, and honge downe his head, he was ſure of the noble mens ſide. Sauing Martius alone, who neither in his countenaunce, nor in his gate, dyd euer ſhowe him ſelfe abaſhed, or once let fall his great corage: but he only of all other gentlemen that were angrie at his fortune, dyd outwardly ſhewe no manner of paſſion, nor care at all of him ſelfe. Not that he dyd paciently beare and temper his good happe, in reſpect of any reaſon he had, or by his quiet condition: but bicauſe he was ſo caried awaye with the vehemencie of anger, and deſire of reuenge, that he had no ſence nor feeling of the hard ſtate he was in, which the common people iudge, not to be ſorow, although in dede it be the very ſame. For when ſorow (as you would ſaye) is ſet a fyre, then it is conuerted into ſpite and malice, and driueth awaye for that time all faintnes of harte and naturall feare. And this is the cauſe why the cholericke man is ſo altered, and mad in his actions, as a man ſet a fyre with a burning agewe: for when a mans harte is troubled within, his pulſe will beate maruelous ſtrongely. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true ſone after by his doinges. For when he was come home to his houſe againe, and had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping

A weeping, and ſhreeking out for ſorrowe, and had alſo comforted and perſuaded them to be content with his chaunce: he went immediatly to the gate of the cittie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his waye with three or foure of his friendes only, taking nothing with him, nor requeſting any thing of any man. So he remained a fewe dayes in the countrie at his houſes, turmoyled with ſundry ſortes and kynde of thoughtes, ſuche as the fyer of his choller dyd ſturre vp. In the ende, ſeeing he could reſolue no waye, to take a profitable or honorable courſe, but only was pricked forward ſtill to be reuenged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raiſe vp ſome great warres againſt them, by their neereſt neighbours. Whereupon, he thought it his beſt waye, firſt to ſtirre vp the VOLSCES againſt them, knowing they were yet able enough in ſtrength and riches to en-
B counter them, notwithſtanding their former loſſes they had receyued not long before, & that their power was not ſo muche impaired, as their malice and deſire was increaſed, to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the cittie of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Auſidius, who for his riches, as alſo for his nobilitie and valliantnes, was honoured emong the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knewe very well, that Tullus dyd more malice and enuie him, then he dyd all the ROMAINES beſides: bicauſe that many times in battells where they met, they were euer at the encounter one againſt another, like luſtie coragious youthes, ſtriuing in all emulation of honour, and had encountered many times together. In ſo muche, as beſides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruelous priuate hate one againſt another. Yet notwithſtanding, conſidering that Tullus Auſidius was a man of a great minde, C and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES, moſt deſired reuenge of the ROMAINES, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: he dyd an acte that confirmed the true wordes of an auncient Poet, who ſayed:

Tullus Auſidius, a greate perſone emõg the Volſces.

It is a thing full harde, mans anger to vvithſtand, if it be ſtiffely bent to take an enterpriſe in hande.
For then moſt men vvill haue, the thing that they deſire, although it coſt their liues therefore, ſuche force hath vvicked ire.

And ſo dyd he. For he diſguiſed him ſelfe in ſuche arraye and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowen him for the perſone he was, ſeeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer ſayed of Vlyſſes,

D So dyd he enter into the enemies tovvne.

It was euen twy light when he entred the cittie of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the ſtreetes, but no man knewe him. So he went directly to Tullus Auſidius houſe, and when he came thither, he got him vp ſtraight to the chimney harthe, and ſat him downe, and ſpake not a worde to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the houſe ſpying him, wondered what he ſhould be, and yet they durſt not byd him riſe. For ill fauoredly muffled and diſguiſed as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maieſtie in his countenance, and in his ſilence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at ſupper, to tell him of the ſtraunge diſguiſing of this man. Tullus roſe preſently from the borde, and comming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled him ſelfe, and after he had pauſed a while, ma-

If thou knoweſt me not yet, Tullus, and ſeeing me, doſt not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am in dede, I muſt of neceſſitie bewraye my ſelfe to be that I am. I am Caius Martius, who hath done to thy ſelf particularly, and to all the VOLSCES generally, great hurte and miſchief, which I cannot denie for my ſurname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefit nor recompence, of all the true and paynefull ſeruice I haue done, and the extreme daungers I haue bene in, but this only ſurname: a good memorie and witnes, of the malice and diſpleaſure thou ſhouldeſt beare me. In deede the name only remaineth with me: for the reſt, the enuie and crueltie of the people of ROME haue taken from me, by the ſufferance of the darſtardly nobilitie and magiſtrates, who haue forſaken me, & let me be baniſhed by the people. This extremitie hath now driuen me to come as a poore thou mayeſt hope alſo of greater things, at all the VOLSCES handes. So he feaſted him for that time, and entertained him in the honorableſt manner he could, talking with him in no o-what ſorte they ſhould beginne their warres. Now on thother ſide, the cittie of ROME was in alſo, came and declared to the Senate certaine ſightes and wonders in the ayer, which they had ſeene, and were to be conſidered of: amongeſt the which, ſuch a viſion happened. There was a cittizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane qualitie & condition, but otherwiſe an honeſt ſober man, geuen to a quiet life, without ſuperſtition, and much leſſe to vanitie C or lying. This man had a viſion in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commaunded him to ſignifie to the Senate, that they had cauſed a very vile lewde daunſer to goe before the proceſſion: and ſayed, the firſt time this viſion had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time into his minde, he made not muche more accompt of the matter then before. In the ende, he ſawe one of his ſonnes dye, who had the beſt nature and condition of all his brethern: and ſodainely he him ſelfe was ſo taken in all his limmes, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he tolde the whole circumſtãce of this viſion before the Senate, ſitting vpon his litle couche or bedde, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no ſooner reported this viſion to the Senate, but he preſently felt his bodie & limmes reſtored again, to their former ſtrẽgth & vſe. So D raiſing vp him ſelf vpon his couche, he got vp on his feete at that inſtant, & walked home to his houſe, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent en-quierie to vnderſtand the trothe: & in the ende they found there was ſuch a thing. There was one that had deliuered a bõdman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues & bondemen, & had commanded them to whippe him vp & down the market place, & afterwards to kill him: & as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they dyd ſo martyre the poore wretch, that for the cruell ſmarte & payne he felt, he turned & writhed his bodie in ſtraũge & pittifull ſorte. The proceſſion by chaunce came by euen at the ſame time, & many that followed it, were hartely moued & offended with the ſight, ſaying: that this was no good ſight to behold, nor mete to be met in proceſſiõ time. But for all this, there was nothing done E ſauing they blamed & rebuked him, that puniſhed his ſlaue ſo cruelly. For the ROMAINES at that time, dyd vſe their bondemen very gently, bicauſe they them ſelues dyd labour with their owne hands, and liued with them, & emong them: and therefore they dyd vſe them the more him Furcifer, bicauſe the LATINES call the wodd that ronneth into the axeltree of the coche,

A slaue that was so cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwardes put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the straunge and rare manner of his punishment. The priestes hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduise: they were wholy of opinion, that it was the whipping of the slaue. So they caused the slaues master to be punished, and beganne againe a newe procession, and all other showes and sightes in honour of Iupiter. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa dyd wisely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the goddes, and specially this custome which he stablished, to bring the people to religion. For when the magistrates, bishoppes, priestes, or other religious ministers goe about any diuine seruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out alowde, Hoc age: as to saye, doe this, or minde this. Hereby they are specially cōmaunded, B wholy to dispose them selues to serue God, leauing all other busines and matters a side: knowing well enough, that whatsoeuer most men doe, they doe it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES dyd euer vse to beginne againe their sacrifices, processions, playes, and suche like showes done in honour of the goddes, not only vpon suche an occasion, but apon lighter causes then that. As when they went a procession through the cittie, and dyd carie the images of their goddes, and suche other like holy relikes vpon open hallowed coches or charrets, called in LATIN Thensæ: one of the coche horses that drue them stoode still, and would drawe no more: and bicause also the coche man tooke the raynes of the bridle with the left hande, they ordained that the procession should be begonne againe a newe. Of later time also, they dyd renewe and beginne a sacrifice thirtie times one after another, bicause they thought C still there fell out one faulte or other in the same, so holy and deuout were they to the goddes. Now Tullus and Martius had secret conference with the greatest personages of the cittie of ANTIVM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in dissention one with another. They aunswered them, they were ashamed to breake the league, considering that they were sworne to keepe peace for two yeres. Howbeit shortely after, the ROMAINES gaue them great occasion to make warre with them. For on a holy daye common playes being kept in ROME, apon some suspition, or false reporte, they made proclamation by sound of trumpet, that all the VOLSCES should auoyde out of ROME before sunne set. Some thincke this was a crafte and deceipt of Martius, who sent one to ROME to the Consuls, to accuse the VOLSCES falsely, aduertising D them howe they had made a conspiracie to set apon them, whileste they were busie in seeing these games, and also to set their cittie a fyre. This open proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus agrauating the matter, dyd so inflame the VOLSCES against them, that in the ende they sent their ambassadours to Rome, to summone them to deliuer their landes and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruelously netled: and made no other aunswer but thus. If the VOLSCES be the first that beginne warre: the ROMAINES will be the last that will ende it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOLSCES ambassadours, and deliuerie of the ROMAINES aunswer: Tullus caused an assembly generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make warre apon E the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus dyd counsell them to take Martius into their seruice, and not to mistruste him for the remembraunce of any thing past, but boldely to truste him in any matter to come: for he would doe them more seruice in fighting for them, then euer he dyd them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in tongue, then warlike in showe: and declared him selfe both expert in warres, and wise with valliantnes. Thus he was ioyned in commission with Tullus as generall of the VOLSCES, hauing absolute authoritie betwene thē to follow & pursue the warres. But Martius fearing least tract of time to bring this armie togither with all the munitiō & furniture of the VOLSCES, would robbe him of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent: left order with the rulers and chief of the F cittie, to assemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary prouision for the campe. Then he with the lightest souldiers he had, and that were willing to followe him, stale awaye vpon the sodaine, and marched with all speede, and entred the territories of ROME, before the

ROMAINES heard any newes of his comming. In so much the VOLSCES found such spoyle in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to drive and carie awaye that they had. Howbeit the gayne of the spoyle and the hurte they dyd to the ROMAINES in this inuasion, was the least parte of his intent. For his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and dissention betweene the nobilitie, and the communaltie: and to drawe that on, he was very carefull to keepe the noble mens landes & goods safe from harme and burning, but spoyled all the whole countrie besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurte any thing of the noble mens. This made greater sturre and broyle betweene the nobilitie and people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, bicause they had so vniustly banished a man of so great valure and power. The people on thother side, accused the nobilitie, how they had procured Martius to make these warres, to be reuenged of them: bicause it pleased them to see their goodes burnt and spoyled before their eyes, whilest them selues were well at ease, and dyd behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, & knowing their owne goodes safe and out of daunger: and howe the warre was not made against the noble men, that had the enemie abroad, to keepe that they had in safety. Now Martius hauing done this first exploite (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and lesse fearefull of the ROMAINES) brought home all the armie againe, without losse of any man. After their whole armie (which was maruelous great, and very forward to seruice) was assembled in one campe: they agreed to leaue parte of it for garrison in the countrie about, and the other parte should goe on, and make the warre apon the ROMAINES. So Martius bad Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him aunswer, he knewe by experience that Martius was no lesse valliant then him selfe, and howe he euer had better fortune and good happe in all battells, then him selfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to haue the leading of those that should make the warres abroade: and him selfe would keepe home, to prouide for the safety of the citties and of his countrie, and to furnishe the campe also of all necessary prouision abroade. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all vnto the cittie of CIRCEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yelded them selues, and therefore had no hurte. From thence, he entred the countrie of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times sent vnto the ROMAINES for their ayde. But on the one side, the people of ROME were very ill willing to goe: and on the other side the Consuls being apon their going out of their office, would not hazard them selues for so small a time: so that the ambassadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and dyd no good. Then Martius dyd besiege their citties, and hauing taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made resistaunce: he sacked all their goodes, and tooke them prisoners. Suche as dyd yeld them selues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurte: and bicause they should receyue no damage by his will, he remoued his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the cittie of BOLES by assault, being about an hundred furlonge from ROME, where he had a maruelous great spoyle, and put euery man to the sword that was able to carie weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in garrison for defence of their countrie, hearing this good newes, would tary no lenger at home, but armed them selues, and ranne to Martius campe, saying they dyd acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all ITALIE, and euery one praised him for a valliant captaine, for that by chaunge of one man for another, suche and so straunge euents fell out in the state. In this while, all went still to wracke at ROME. For, to come into the field to fight with the enemie, they could not abyde to heare of it, they were one so muche against another, and full of seditious wordes, the nobilitie against the people, & the people against the nobilitie. Vntill they had intelligence at the length that the enemies had layed seige to the cittie of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples and images of the goddes their protectours, and from whence came first their auncient originall, for that Æneas at his first arriuall into ITALIE dyd build that cittie. Then fell there out a maruelous sodain chaunge of minde among the people, & farre more straunge & contrarie in the nobilitie. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and exile

A exile of Martius. The Senate assembled vpon it, would in no case yeld to that. Who either dyd it of a selfe will to be contrarie to the peoples desire: or bicause Martius should not returne through the grace and fauour of the people. Or els, bicause they were throughly angrie and offended with him, that he would set apon the whole, being offended but by a fewe, and in his doings would shewe him selfe an open enemie besides vnto his countrie: notwithstanding the most parte of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruelous ill parte, and as if the iniurie had bene done vnto them selues. Reporte being made of the Senates resolution, the people founde them selues in a straight: for they could authorise and confirme nothing by their voyces, vnles it had bene first propounded and ordeined by the Senate. But Martius hearing this sturre about him, was in a greater rage with them then be-
B fore: in so muche as he raised his seige incontinently before the cittie of LAVINIVM, and going towardes ROME, lodged his campe within fortie furlonge of the cittie, at the ditches called Cluiliæ. His incamping so neere ROME, dyd put all the whole cittie in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appeased the sedition and dissention betwext the Nobilitie and the people. For there was no Consul, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrarie the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they sawe the women in a maruelous feare, ronning vp and downe the cittie: the temples of the goddes full of olde people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the goddes: and finally, not a man either wise or hardie to prouide for their safetie: then they were all of o-C pinion, that the people had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile them selues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary parte, were in maruelous great faulte to be angrie and in choller with him, when it stoode them vpon rather to haue gone out and intreated him. So they all agreed together to send ambassadours vnto him, to let him vnderstand howe his countrymen dyd call him home againe, and restored him to all his goodes, and besought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambassadours that were sent, were Martius familliar friendes, and acquaintaunce, who looked at the least for a curteous welcome of him, as of their familliar friende and kynseman. Howbeit they founde nothing lesse. For at their comming, they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was set in his chayer of state, with a maruelous and an vnspeakable maiestie, hauing the chiefest men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commaunded them to de-D clare openly the cause of their comming. Which they deliuered in the most humble and lowly wordes they possiblie could deuise, and with all modest countenaunce and behauiour agreable for the same. When they had done their message: for the iniurie they had done him, he aunswered them very hottely, and in great choller. But as generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore vnto the VOLSCES, all their landes and cities they had taken from them in former warres: and moreouer, that they should geue them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before geuen to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to ende this warre, if they dyd not graunte these honest and iust conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirtie dayes respit to make him aunswer. So the ambassadours returned straight to ROME, and Martius forthwith depar-
E ted with his armie out of the territories of the ROMAINES. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most enuied Martius glorie and authoritie) dyd charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chief: who though he had receyued no priuate iniurie or displeasure of Martius, yet the common faulte and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to see his owne reputation bleamished, through Martius great fame and honour, and so him selfe to be lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES, then he was before. This fell out the more, bicause euery man honoured Martius, and thought he only could doe all, and that all other gouernours and captaines must be content with suche credit and authoritie, as he would please to countenaunce them with. From hence they deriued all their first accusations and secret murmurings F against Martius. For priuate captaines conspiring against him, were very angrie with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor fortes, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great importaunce, bicauſe it was that which in treaſon might both loſe and binde all, and preſerue the whole. Now Martius hauing geuen the ROMAINES thirtie dayes reſpit for their aunſwer, and ſpecially bicauſe the warres haue not accuſtomed to make any great chaunges, in leſſe ſpace of time then that: he thought it good yet, not to lye a ſleepe and idle all the while, but went and deſtroyed the landes of the enemies allies, and tooke ſeuen great citties of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES durſt not once put them ſelues into the field, to come to their ayde and helpe: they were ſo fainte harted, ſo miſtruſtfull, and lothe beſides to make warres. In ſo muche as they properly reſſembled the bodyes paralyticke, and loſed of their limmes and members: as thoſe which through the palſey haue loſt all their ſence and feeling. Wherefore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the ROMAINES againe with all his armie, they ſent another ambaſſade vnto him, to praye peace, and the remoue of the VOLSCES out of their countrie: that afterwardes they might with better leyſure fall to ſuche agreementes together, as ſhould be thought moſt mete and neceſſarie. For the ROMAINES were no men that would euer yeld for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any grounde to demaunde reaſonable articles and conditions, all that they would reaſonably aske ſhould be graunted vnto, by the ROMAINES, who of them ſelues would willingly yeld to reaſon, conditionally, that they dyd laye downe armes. Martius to that aunſwered: that as generall of the VOLSCES he would replie nothing vnto it. But yet as a ROMAINE cittizen, he would counſell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reaſon, if they were wiſe: and that they ſhould returne againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had firſt deliuered them. Or otherwiſe, that he would no more geue them aſſuraunce or ſafe conduite to returne againe into his campe, with ſuche vaine and friuolous meſſages. When the ambaſſadours were returned to ROME, and had reported Martius aunſwer to the Senate: their cittie being in extreme daunger, and as it were in a terrible ſtorme or tempeſt, they threw out (as the common prouerbe ſayeth) their holy ancker. For then they appointed all the biſhoppes, prieſtes, miniſters of the goddes, and keepers of holy things, and all the augures or ſoothſayers, which foreſhowe things to come by obſeruation of the flying of birdes (which is an olde auncient kynde of prophecying and diuination amongeſt the ROMAINES) to goe to Martius apparelled as when they doe their ſacrifices: and firſt to intreate him to leaue of warre, and then that he would ſpeake to his contrymen, and conclude peace with the VOLSCES. Martius ſuffered them to come into his campe, but yet he graunted them nothing the more, neither dyd he entertaine them or ſpeake more curteouſly to them, then he dyd the firſt time that they came vnto him, ſauing only that he willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the firſt conditions offered, or els to receyue warre. When all this goodly rable of ſuperſtition and prieſtes were returned, it was determined in counſell that none ſhould goe out of the gates of the cittie, and that they ſhould watche and warde vpon the walles, to repulſe their enemies if they came to aſſault them: referring them ſelues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwiſe howe to remedie the daunger. Now all the cittie was full of tumult, feare, and maruelous doubt what would happen: vntill at the length there fell out ſuche a like matter, as Homer oftetimes ſayed they would leaſt haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen ſeldome, Homer ſayeth, and crieth out in this ſorte,

But in wonderous and extraordinarie thinges, which are done by ſecret inſpirations and C motions, he doth not ſay that God taketh away, from man his choyce and freedom of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth worke deſire in vs, but obiecteth to our mindes certaine imaginations whereby we are lead to deſire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of ſucceſſe. For, either we muſt ſay, that the goddes meddle not with the cauſes and beginninges of our actions: or elſe what other meanes haue they to helpe and further men? It is apparaunt that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our feete and handes, when there is occaſion to vſe them: but that parte of our minde from which theſe motions proceede, is induced thereto, or caried away by ſuch obiectes and reaſons, as God offereth vnto it. griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reaſon of our particular misfortune: to feele the loſſe her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the VOLSCES campe: whome when they ſawe, they of them ſelues did both pitie and reuerence her, and there was not a man amonge them that once durſt ſay a worde vnto her. Nowe was Martius ſet then in his chayer of ſtate, with all the honours of a generall, kiſſed his mother, and imbraced her a pretie while, then his wife and litle children. And nature ſo wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he coulde not keepe him ſelfe from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloode, as if he had bene violently caried with the furie of a moſt ſwift running ſtreame. After he had thus louingly receiued them, and perceiuinge that his mother Volumnia would beginne to ſpeake

in

A in my life time doe make an ende of this warre. For if I cannot perſuade thee, rather to doe « good vnto both parties, then to ouerthrowe and deſtroye the one, preferring loue and na- « ture, before the malice and calamitie of warres: thou ſhalt ſee, my ſonne, and truſt vnto it, « thou ſhalt no ſoner marche forward to aſſault thy countrie, but thy foote ſhall treade vpon « thy mothers wombe, that brought thee firſt into this world. And I maye not deferre to ſee the « daye, either that my ſonne be led priſoner in triumphe by his naturall country men, or that he « him ſelfe doe triumphe of them, and of his naturall countrie. For if it were ſo, that my requeſt « tended to ſaue thy countrie, in deſtroying the VOLSCES: I muſt cõfeſſe, thou wouldeſt hardly « and doubtfully reſolue on that. For as to deſtroye thy naturall countrie, it is altogether vnmete « and vnlawfull: ſo were it not iuſt, and leſſe honorable, to betraye thoſe that put their truſt in « B thee. But my only demaunde conſiſteth, to make a gayle deliuerie of all euills, which deliue- « reth equall benefit and ſafety, both to the one and the other, but moſt honorable for the VOL- « SCES. For it ſhall appeare, that hauing victorie in their handes, they haue of ſpeciall fauour « graunted vs ſingular graces: peace, and amitie, albeit them ſelues haue no leſſe parte of both, « then we. Of which good, if ſo it came to paſſe, thy ſelfe is thonly authour, and ſo haſt thou « thonly honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrarie: thy ſelfe alone deſeruedly ſhall carie the « ſhamefull reproche and burden of either partie. So, though the ende of warre be vncertaine, « yet this notwithſtanding is moſt certaine: that if it be thy chaunce to conquer, this benefit « ſhalt thou reape of thy goodly cõqueſt, to be chronicled the plague & deſtroyer of thy coun- « trie. And if fortune alſo ouerthrowe thee, then the world will ſaye, that through deſire to re- « C C uenge thy priuate iniuries, thou haſt for euer vndone thy good friendes, who dyd moſt louing- « ly and curteouſly receyue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers wordes, without « interrupting her ſpeache at all: and after ſhe had ſayed what ſhe would, he held his peace a prety while, and aunſwered not a worde. Hereupon ſhe beganne againe to ſpeake vnto him, and ſayed. My ſonne, why doeſt thou not aunſwer me? doeſt thou thinke it good altogether « to geue place vnto thy choller and deſire of reuenge, and thinkeſt thou it not honeſtie for thee « to graunt thy mothers requeſt, in ſo weighty a cauſe? doeſt thou take it honorable for a no- « ble man, to remember the wronges and iniuries done him: and doeſt not in like caſe thinke it « an honeſt noble mans parte, to be thankefull for the goodnes that parents doe ſhewe to their « children, acknowledging the duety and reuerence they ought to beare vnto them? No man « D D liuing is more bounde to ſhewe him ſelfe thankefull in all partes and reſpects, then thy ſelfe: « who ſo vnnaturally ſheweth all ingratitude. Moreouer (my ſonne) thou haſt ſorely taken of thy « countrie, exacting grieuous payments apon them, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee: be- « ſides, thou haſt not hitherto ſhewed thy poore mother any curteſie. And therefore, it is not on- « ly honeſt, but due vnto me, that without compulſion I ſhould obtaine my ſo iuſt and reaſona- « ble requeſt of thee. But ſince by reaſon I cannot perſuade thee to it, to what purpoſe doe I de- « ferre my laſt hope? And with theſe wordes, her ſelfe, his wife and children, fell downe vpon « their knees before him. Martius ſeeing that, could refraine no lenger, but went ſtraight and « lifte her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the Coriolanus compaſſion of his mother. right hande, oh mother, ſayed he, you haue wonne a happy victorie for your countrie, but E E mortall and vnhappy for your ſonne: for I ſee my ſelf vanquiſhed by you alone. Theſe wordes being ſpoken openly, he ſpake a litle a parte with his mother and wife, and then let them re- turne againe to ROME, for ſo they dyd requeſt him: and ſo remaining in campe that night, the next morning he diſlodged, and marched homewardes into the VOLSCES countrie againe, Coriolanus withdraweth his armie from Rome. who were not all of one minde, nor all alike contented. For ſome miſliked him, and that he had done. Other being well pleaſed that peace ſhould be made, ſayed: that neither the one, nor the other, deſerued blame nor reproche. Other, though they miſliked that was done, dyd not thincke him an ill man for that he dyd, but ſayed: he was not to be blamed, though he yelded to ſuche a forcible extremitie. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeyed his commaundement, more for reſpect of his worthines and valiancie, then for feare of his au- F F thoritie. Now the cittizens of ROME plainely ſhewed, in what feare and daunger their cittie ſtoode of this warre, when they were deliuered. For ſo ſone as the watche vpon the walles of the cittie perceyued the VOLSCES campe to remoue, there was not a temple in the cittie but was presently set open, and full of men, wearing garlands of flowers vpon their heads, sacrificing to the goddes, as they were wont to doe vpon the newes of some great obteined victorie. And this common ioye was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honorable curtesies the whole Senate, and people dyd bestowe on their ladyes. For they were all throughly persuaded, and dyd certenly beleeue, that the ladyes only were cause of the sauing of the cittie, and deliuering them selues from the instant daunger of the warre. Whereupon the Senate ordeined, that the magistrates to gratifie and honour these ladyes, should graunte them all that they would require. And they only requested that they would build a temple of Fortune of the women, for the building whereof they offered them selues to defraye the whole charge of the sacrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the seruice of the goddes. Neuertheles, the Senate commending their good will and forwardnes, ordeined, that the temple and image should be made at the common charge of the cittie. Notwithstanding that, the ladyes gathered money emong them, and made with the same a second image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES saye dyd speake as they offred her vp in the temple, and dyd set her in her place: and they affirme, that she spake these wordes. Ladyes, ye haue deuoutely offered me vp. Moreouer, that she spake that twise together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were, and are not to be credited. For to see images that seeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humour red or blowdie, it is not a thing vnpossible. For wodde and stone doe commonly receyue certaine moysture, whereof is ingendred an humour, which doe yeld of them selues, or doe take of the ayer, many sortes and kyndes of spottes and cullers: by which signes and tokens it is not amisse we thincke, that the goddes sometimes doe warne men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these images and statues doe somtimes put forth soundes, like vnto sighes or mourning, when in the middest or bottome of the same, there is made some violent separation, or breaking a sonder of things, blowen or deuised therein: but that a bodie which hath neither life nor soule, should haue any direct or exquisite worde formed in it by expresse voyce, that is altogether vnpossible. For the soule, nor god him selfe can distinctly speake without a bodie, hauing necessarie organes and instrumentes mete for the partes of the same, to forme and vtter distinct wordes. But where stories many times doe force vs to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue testimonies: there we must saye, that it is some passion contrarie to our fiue naturall sences, which being begotten in the imaginatiue parte or vnderstanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfe, euen as we doe in our sleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we doe not heare: and we imagine we see, that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously geuen to thinke apon heauenly things, so as they can no waye be drawen from beleeuing that which is spoken of them, they haue this reason to grounde the foundation of their beleefe vpon. That is, the omnipotencie of God which is wonderfull, and hath no manner of resemblaunce or likelines of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrarie as touching our nature, our mouing, our arte, and our force: and therefore if he doe any thing vnpossible to vs, or doe bring forth and deuise things, without mans common reache and vnderstanding, we must not therefore thinke it vnpossible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrarie to vs, muche more in his workes and secret operations, he farre passeth all the rest: but the most parte of goddes doings, as Heraclitus sayeth, for lacke of faith, are hidden and vnknowen vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the cittie of ANTIVM from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no lenger abide him for the feare he had of his authoritie: sought diuers meanes to make him out of the waye, thinking that if he let slippe that present time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherefore Tullus hauing procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius might be deposed from his estate, to render vp accompt to the VOLSCES of his charge and gouernment. Martius fearing to become a priuate man againe vnder Tullus being generall (whose authoritie was greater otherwise, then any other emong all the VOLSCES) aunswered: he was willing to geue vp his charge, and would resigne it into the handes of the lordes of the VOLSCES, if they dyd all commaund him, as by all their commaundement he receyued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuse euen at that present to geue vp an accompt vnto the people,

A if they would tarie the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counsaill, in which assembly there were certen oratours appointed, that stirred vp the common people against him: and when they had tolde their tales, Martius rose vp to make them aunswer. Now, notwithstanding the mutinous people made a maruelous great noyse, yet when they sawe him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valliantnes, they quieted them selues, and gaue still audience to alledge with leysure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the honestest men of the ANTIATES, and who most reioyced in peace, shewed by their countenaunce that they would heare him willingly, and iudge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he dyd let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, bicause emongest other things he had an eloquent tongue, besides that the first good seruice
B he had done to the people of the VOLSCES, dyd winne him more fauour, then these last accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they layed to his charge, was a testimonie of the good will they ought him, for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the cittie of ROME, if they had not bene very neere taking of it, by meanes of his approche and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no lenger delaye his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarie for the mutining and rising of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, nor that they would not suffer a traytour to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeld vp his estate and authoritie. And in saying these wordes, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in C the market place, none of the people once offering to rescue him. Howbeit it is a clere case, that this murder was not generally consented vnto, of the most parte of the VOLSCES: for men came out of all partes to honour his bodie, and dyd honorably burie him, setting out his tombe with great store of armour and spoyles, as the tombe of a worthie persone and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderstanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, sauing that they graunted the ladyes the request they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they vsed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethern, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who stablished the same, as we haue enlarged more amplie in the description of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole state of the VOLSCES hartely wished him aliue againe. For first of all they fell D out with the ÆQVES (who were their friendes and confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrell grew on so farre betwene them, that frayes and murders fell out apon it one with another. After that, the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was slaine in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the sworde: so that they were compelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yelding them selues subiect vnto the conquerers, & promising to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF ALcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The acts done by both.

NOW that we haue written all the dedes of worthie memorie, done by either of them both: we maye preſently diſcerne, that in matters of warre, the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were a like hardie & valliant for their perſones, as alſo wiſe and politike in the warres: vnles they will ſaye, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battells with his enemies, both by ſea and lande, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had allwayes the victorie of his enemies. For otherwiſe, in this they were much a like: that where they were both preſent & had, charge and power to commaund, all things proſpered notably, and with good ſucceſſe on the parte they were of: and alſo when they tooke the contrary ſide, they made the firſt haue the worſe euery waye. Now for matters of gouernment, the noble men and honeſt cittizens dyd hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man moſt diſſolute, and geuen to flatterie: bicauſe he euer ſtudied by all deuiſe he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So dyd the ROMAINES malice alſo Coriolanus gouernment, for that it was to arrogant, prowde, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithſtanding, he is leſſe to be blamed, that ſeeketh to pleaſe and gratifie his common people: then he that deſpiſeth and diſdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and iniurie, bicauſe he would not ſeeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credit: euen ſo is it beſides diſhoneſty, and iniuſtice alſo, to atteine to credit and authoritie, for one to make him ſelfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honeſt natured man, plaine and ſimple, without arte or cunning: Howbeit Alcibiades merely contrarie, for he was fine, ſubtill, and deceiptfull. And the greateſt faulte they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceipt, wherewith he abuſed the ambaſſadours of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & that he was a let that peace was not cõcluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this acte he ſodainly brought the cittie of ATHENS into warres, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINIANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practiſe entred into league with the ATHENIANS. And Martius, as Dionyſius the hiſtoriographer writeth: dyd by craft and deceipt bring the ROMAINES into warres againſt the VOLSCES, cauſing the VOLSCES maliciouſly, and wrongfully to be ſuſpected, that went to ROME to ſee the games played. But the cauſe why he dyd it, made the fact ſo much more fowle and wicked. For it was not done for any ciuill diſſention, nor for any ielouzy and contention in matters of gouernment, as Alcibiades dyd: but only following his cholerike moode, that would be pleaſed with no thing, as Dion ſayed, he would

The manners of Alcibiades & Coriolanus.

A would needes trouble and turmoile the moſt parte of Italie, and ſo beinge angrie with his countrie, he deſtroyed many other townes and cities that could not helpe it, nor doe with all.
This is true alſo, that Alcibiades ſpite and malice did worke great miſchiefe and miſerie to his countrie: but when he ſaw they repented them of the iniurie they had done him, he came to him ſelfe, and did withdrawe his armie. An other time alſo, when they had baniſhed Alci- biades, he would not yet ſuffer the captaines of the Athenians to runne into great errours, neither would he ſee them caſt away, by followinge ill counſell which they tooke, neither would he forſake them in any daunger they put them ſelues into. But he did the very ſame that Ariſtides had done in olde time vnto Themiſtocles, for which he was then, and is yet ſo greatly praiſed. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the armie of the A-B thenians, although they were not his friendes, and tolde them wherein they did amiſſe, and what they had further to doe. Where Martius to the contrarie, did firſt great hurte vnto the whole citie of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him: yea, and when the beſt and chiefeſt parte of the citie were grieued for his ſake, and were very ſorie and angrie for the iniurie done him. Furthermore, the Romaines ſought to appeaſe one onely diſpleaſure and deſpite they had done him, by many ambaſſades, petitions and requeſtes they made, whereunto he neuer yelded, while his mother, wife, and children came, his harte was ſo hard-ned. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would harken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to deſtroy and ſpoyle his countrie, and not as though he ment to recouer it, or to returne thither againe. Here was in deede the difference betweene them: C that ſpialls being layed by the Lacedæmonians to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as alſo for that they were affrayed of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to Athens. Where Martius contrariwiſe, hauing bene ſo honorably receiued and entertained by the Volſces, he could not with honeſtie forſake them, conſideringe they had done him that honour, as to chooſe him their generall, and truſted him ſo farre, as they put all their whole armie and power into his handes: and not as thother, whome the Lacedæmonians rather abuſed, then vſed him, ſuffering him to goe vp and downe their citie (and afterwardes in the middeſt of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the ende Alcibiades was compelled to put him ſelfe into the handes of Tiſaphernes: vnleſſe they will ſay that he went thither of purpoſe to him, with intent to ſaue the citie of Athens from vt-D ter deſtruction, for the deſire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we read of Alci- biades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with money: and when he had it, he would moſt licentiouſly and diſhoneſtly ſpend it. Where Martius in contrarie maner would not ſo much as accept giftes lawefully offered him by his Captaines, to honour him for his valliantneſſe. And the cauſe why the people did beare him ſuch ill will, for the controuerſie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of dettes, grew: for that they knewe well enough it was not for any gayne or benefit he had gotten thereby, ſo much as it was for ſpite and diſpleaſure he thought to doe them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Ari- ſtotle the philoſopher, doth not without cauſe commend the ſingular giftes that were in Al- cibiades, and this ineſpecially: that he paſſed all other for winning mens good willes. Wheras E all Martius noble actes and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull euen to thoſe that receiued benefit by them, who could not abide his ſeueritie and ſelfe will: which cauſeth deſolation (as Plato ſayeth) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forſaken. Contrariwiſe, ſeeing Alcibiades had a trimme enterteinment, and a very good grace with him, and could facion him ſelfe in all companies: it was no maruell if his well doing were glorioufly commended, and him ſelfe much honoured and beloued of the people, conſidering that ſome faultes he did, were oftetimes taken for matters of ſporte, and toyes of pleaſure. And this was the cauſe, that though many times he did great hurte to the common wealth, yet they did ofte make him their generall, and truſted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius ſuing for an office of honour that was due to him, for the ſundrie good ſeruices he had done F to the ſtate, was notwithſtanding repulſed, and put by. Thus doe we ſee, that they to whome the one did hurte, had no power to hate him: and thother that honoured his vertue, had no liking to loue his perſone. Martius alſo did neuer any great exployte, being generall of his Alcibiades & Coriolanus manner for money.

Alcibiades & Coriolanus lose vnto their contrie.

contry men, but when he was generall of their enemies againſt his naturall contrie: whereas Alcibiades, being both a priuate perſone, and a generall, did notable ſeruice vnto the ATHENIANS. By reaſon whereof, Alcibiades whereſoeuer he was preſent, had the vpper hande euer of his accuſers, euen as he would him ſelfe, and their accuſations tooke no place againſt him: onleſſe it were in his abſcence. Where Martius being preſent, was condemned by the ROMAINES: and in his perſon murdered, and ſlaine by the VOLSCES. But here I can not ſay they haue done well, nor iuſtly, albeit him ſelfe gaue them ſome colour to doe it, when he openly denied the ROMAINE Ambaſſadors peace, which after he priuatly graunted, at the requeſt of women. So by this dede of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betwene both people: but leauing warre ſtill betwene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whome he was generall) to loſe the oportunity of noble victory. Where in deede he ſhould (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawen his armie with their counſaill & conſent, that had repoſed ſo great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that accompt of them, as their good will towards him did in duety binde him. Or elſe, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterpriſe of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it of, when his anger was blowen ouer: yet he had no reaſon for the loue of his mother to pardone his contrie, but rather he ſhould in pardoning his contrie, haue ſpared his mother, bicauſe his mother & wife were members of the bodie of his contrie and city, which he did beſiege. For in that he vncurteouſly reiected all publike petitions, requeſtes of Ambaſſadors, intreaties of the biſhoppes & prieſtes, to gratifie only the requeſt of his mother with his departure: that was no acte ſo much to honour his mother with, as to diſhonour his contrie by, the which was preſerued for the pitie and interceſſion of a woman, & not for the loue of it ſelfe, as if it had not bene worthie of it. And ſo was this departure a grace, to ſay truly, very odious and cruell, and deſerued no thankes of either partie, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the requeſt of the ROMAINES, againſt whom he made warre: nor with their conſent, at whoſe charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill happe, the auſteritie of his nature, and his hawtie obſtinate minde, was the onely cauſe: the which of it ſelfe being hatefull to the worlde, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churliſh, fierce, and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, ſeeming thereby as though they made no eſtimacion or regard of the people: and yet on thother ſide, if the people ſhould not geue them honour and reuerence, they would ſtraight take it in ſcorne, and litle care for the matter. For ſo did Metellus, Ariſtides, and Epaminondas, all vſed this manner: not to ſeeke the good will of the common people by flatterie and diſſimulation: which was in deede, bicauſe they deſpiſed that which the people coulde geue or take awaye. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and ſet at any fines, or that they baniſhed them, or gaue them any other repulſe: but they loued them as wel as they did before, ſo ſoone as they ſhewed any token of repentaunce, & that they were ſorie for the wrong they had done them, and were eaſely made frendes againe with them, after they were reſtored from their baniſhment. For he that diſdaineth to make much of the people, and to haue their fauour, ſhoulde much more ſcorne to ſeeke to be reuenged, when he is repulſed. For, to take a repulſe and deniall of honour, ſo inwardly to the hart: commeth of no other cauſe, but that he did too earneſtly deſire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not diſſemble at all, that he was not very glad to ſee him ſelfe honored, and ſory to be reiected and denied any honour: but alſo he ſought all the meanes he could to make him ſelfe beloued of thoſe amongeſt whome he liued. Whereas Martius ſtowtnes, and hawty ſtomake, did ſtay him from making much of thoſe, that might aduaunce and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnawe him ſelfe for ſpite and anger, when he ſawe he was deſpiſed. And this is all that reaſonably may be reproued in him: for otherwiſe he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperaunce, and cleane handes from taking of bribes and money, he may be compared with the moſt perfect, vertuous, and honeſt men of all GRÆCE: but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vndoutedly alwayes too licentious & loſely geuen, and had too ſmall regard of his credit and honeſtie.

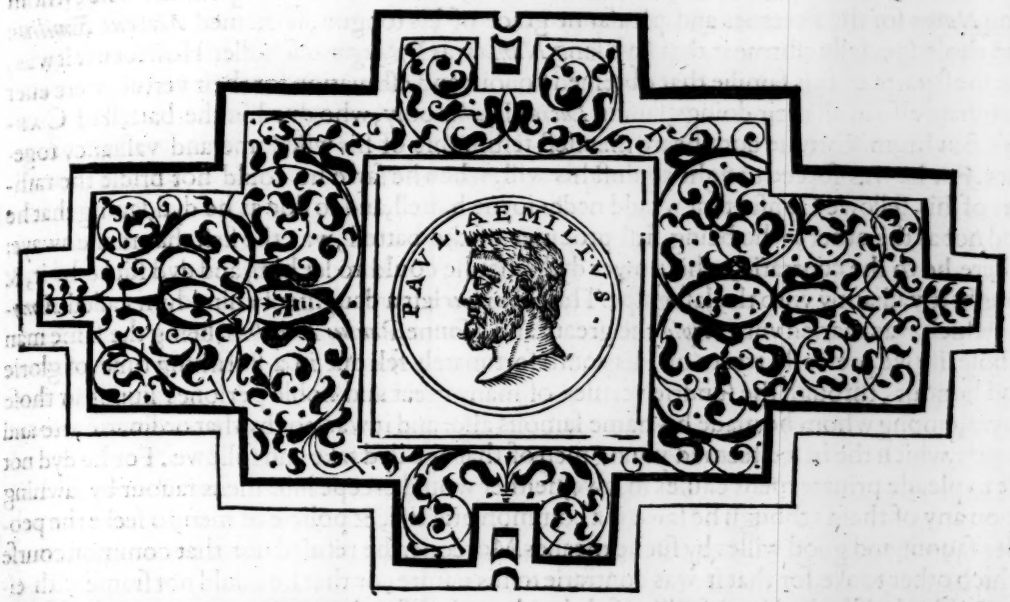
Paulus Æmilius.



A WHEN I firſt beganne to write theſe liues, my intent was to profit o-ther: but ſince, continuing and going on, I haue muche profited my ſelf by looking into theſe hiſtories, as if I looked into a glaſſe, to frame and facion my life, to the mowld and patterne of theſe vertuous noble men. For ronning ouer their manners in this ſorte, and ſeeking alſo to deſcribe their liues: me thinkes I am ſtill conuerſaunt and familliar with them, and doe as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruſe their hiſtories, and to waye the vertues and qualities they haue had, and what ſingularitie eche of them poſſeſſed: and to chooſe and culle out the chiefeſt things of note in them, and their beſt ſpea-B ches and doings moſt worthie of memorie: Then I crie out,

O godds, can there be more paſsing pleaſure in the vvorlde?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill māners, & a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the philoſopher writeth, that we ſhould praye we might euer ſee happy images and ſightes in the ayer, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, maye rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: preſuppoſing a falſe opinion and doctrine in philoſophie, which allureth men to infinite ſuperſtitions. That there are good and bad images flying in the ayer, which geue a good or ill impreſſion vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient hiſtories, and gathering theſe liues together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping allwayes in minde
C the actes of the moſt noble, vertuous, and beſt genen men of former age, and worthie memorie: I doe teache and prepare my ſelfe to ſhake of & baniſhe from me, all lewde and diſhoneſt condition, if by chaunce the companie and conuerſation of them whoſe companie I keepe, and muſt of neceſſitie haunte, doe acquainte me with ſome vnhappie or vngratious touche. This is eaſie vnto me, that doe diſpoſe my quiet minde, & not troubled with any paſſion, vnto the deepe conſideration of ſo many noble examples. As I doe preſent vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Æmilius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good & an vpright minde with them, but were alſo fortunate and happie, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you ſhall hardly iudge, when you haue red ouer their liues, whether wiſedome, or good fortune brought them to atchieue to ſuche honorable actes and exployctes as they dyd. Many (& the moſt parte of hiſtoriographers) doe write, that the houſe and familie of the Æmilians in Rome, was allwayes of the moſt auncient of the nobilitie, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme alſo, that the firſt of the houſe that gaue name to all the poſteritie after, was Marcus, the ſonne of Pythagoras the wiſe, whom king Numa for the ſweetnes and pleaſaunt grace of his tongue, ſurnamed Marcus Æmilius: and thoſe ſpecially affirme it, that ſaye king Numa was Pythagoras ſcholler. Howſoeuer it was, the moſt parte of this familie that obteined honour and eſtimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate alſo in all their doings, ſauing Lucius Paulus only, who dyed in the battell of Cannes. But his misfortune doth beare manifeſt teſtimonie of his wiſedome and valliancy together. For he was forced to fight againſt his will, when he ſawe he could not bridle the rathnes of his fellowe Conſul that would nedes ioyne battell, and to doe as he dyd, ſauing that he fled not as the other, who being firſt procurer of the battell, was the firſt that ranne awaye: where he to the contrarie, to his power dyd what he could to let him, and dyd ſticke by it, & fought it valliantly vnto the laſt gaſpe. This Æmylius left a daughter behind him called Æmylia, which was maried vnto Scipio the great: and a ſonne, Paulus Æmylius, being the ſame man whoſe life we preſently treate of. His youth fortunately fell out in a floriſhing time of glorie and honour, through the ſundrie vertues of many great and noble perſones liuing in thoſe dayes, emong whom he made his name famous alſo: and it was not by that ordinarie arte and courſe, which the beſt eſteemed young men of that age dyd take and followe. For he dyd not vſe to pleade priuate mens cauſes in lawe, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he ſawe it a common practiſe, & policie of men, to ſeeke the peoples fauour and good willes by ſuche meanes. Moreouer, he refuſed not that common courſe which other tooke, for that it was contrarie to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene ſo diſpoſed: but he rather fought to winne reputation by his honeſtie, his valliantnes, and vpright dealing, as chooſing that the better waye, then either of thother two, in ſo much as in maruelous ſhorte time he paſſed all thoſe that were of his age. The firſt office of honour he ſued for, was the office of Ædilis, in which ſute he was preferred before twelue other that ſued for the ſelfe ſame office: who were men of no ſmall qualitie, for they all came afterwardes to be Conſuls. After this, he was choſen to be one of the number of the prieſtes, whom the Romaines call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuinations and ſootheſayings, in telling of things to come by flying of byrdes, & ſignes in the ayer. He was ſo carefull, and tooke ſuche paynes to vnderſtand how the Romaines dyd vſe the ſame, & with ſuche diligence ſought the obſeruation of the auncient religion of Romaines in all holie matters: that where that prieſthood was before eſteemed but a title of honour, & deſired for the name only: he brought it to paſſe, that it was the moſt honorable ſcience, & beſt reputed of in Rome. Wherein he confirmed the philoſophers opinion: that religion is the knowledge how to ſerue God. For when he dyd any thing belonging to his office of prieſthood, he dyd it with great experience, iudgment, and diligence, leauing all other thoughtes, & without omitting any auncient ceremonie, or adding to any newe, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which ſeemed light, and of ſmall moment: declaring vnto them, that though we doe preſume the goddes are eaſie to be pacified, and that they readilie pardone all faultes & ſcapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for reſpect of common wealths ſake, they ſhould not ſlightly, nor careleſly diſſemble or paſſe ouer faultes committed in thoſe matters. For no man (ſayeth he) at the firſt that committeth any faulte, doth alone trouble the ſtate of the common wealth: but withall, we muſt thincke he leaueth the groundes of ciuill gouernment, that is not as carefull to keepe the inſtitutions of ſmall matters, as alſo of the great. So was he alſo a ſeuere captaine, and ſtrict obſeruer of all marſhall diſcipline, not ſeeking to winne the ſouldiers loue by flatterie, when he was generall in the field, as many dyd in that time: neither corrupting them for a ſecond charge, by ſhewing him ſelfe gentle and curteous in the firſt, vnto thoſe that ſerued vnder him: but him ſelfe dyd orderly ſhewe them the very rules and preceptes of the diſcipline of warres, euen as a prieſt that ſhould expreſſe the names and ceremonies of ſome holy ſacrifice, wherein were daunger to omit any parte or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the lawe of armes apon rebellious

The diſcipline of warres.

A lious and disobedient souldiers, he kept vp thereby the state of the common weale the better: iudging, to ouercome the enemie by force, was but an accessorie as a man maye terme it, in respect of well training and ordering his cittizens by good discipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres against king Antiochus surnamed the great, in the South partes: all the chiefest captaines of ROME being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West partes towardes SPAYNE, where they were all vp in armes. Thither they sent AEmylius Prætor, not with sixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: so that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the authoritie and dignitie of a Consul. He twise ouercame the barbarous people in mayne battell, and slue a thirtie thousand of them, and got this victorie through his great skill
B and wisedome, in choosing the aduantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, euen as they passed ouer a riuer: which easely gaue his souldiers the victorie. Moreouer he tooke there, two hundred and fiftie citties, all which dyd open, and gladly receyue him in. So, leauing all that countrie quiet and in good peace, and hauing receaued their fealtie by othe made betweene his handes, he returned againe to ROME, not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle regard to his expences, he spent so franckly, neither was his purse his master, though his reuenue was not great to beare it out: as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had, was litle enough to satisfie his wifes ioynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Consul Papyrius Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was C diuorsed from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The iust cause of the diuorse betweene them, appeareth not to vs in writing: but me thinckes the tale that is tolde concerning the separation of a certaine mariage is true. That a certen ROMAINE hauing forsaken his wife, her friendes fell out with him, and asked him: what fault dost thou finde in her? is she not honest of her bodie? is she not fayer? doth she not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foote, shewed them his shooe, and aunswered them. Is not this a goodly shooe? is it not finely made? and is it not newe? yet I dare saye there is neuer a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to saye truely, great and open faultes are commonly occasions to make husbands put awaye their wiues: but yet oftentimes house-D hold wordes ronne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diuersitie of natures, which straungers are not priuie vnto) that in processe of time they doe beget suche a straunge alteration of loue and mindes in them, as one house can no lenger holde them. So AEmylius, hauing put awaye Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with him selfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption, to two of the noblest and richest families of the cittie of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fiue times Consul: and the younger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN dyd adopt, being his cosin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato maried E the one, and AElius Tubero the other, who was a maruelous honest man, and dyd more nobly mainteine him selfe in his pouertie, then any other ROMAINE: for they were sixteene persones all of one name, and of the house of the AElians, very neere a kynne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the cittie, and a small farme in the countrie, wherewith they enterteined them selues, and liued all together in one house, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongest their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus AEmylius, after he had bene twise Consul, and had triumphed twise, not being ashamed of her husbands pouertie, but wondering at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethern and kynsemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not farre a sonder, and in other countries, not one neere another, and that riuers parte them not, or F walles deuide their landes, leauing great large wastes betweene them: they are neuer quiet, but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this storie laye before the wise, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby howe to frame their life, and wisely to behaue them ſelues. Now Æmylius being choſen Conſul, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwiſe are called LIGVSTINES. Theſe are very valliãt & warlike men, & were very good ſouldiers at that time, by reaſon of their cõtinual warres againſt the ROMAINES, whoſe neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furdeſt parte of ITALIE, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, & the rowe of ALPES, whereof the foote ioyneth to the THVSCAN ſea, & pointeth towards AFRICKE, and are mingled with the GAVLES, & SPANYARDS, neighbours vnto that ſea coaſt: who ſcowring all the Mediterranian ſea at that time, vnto the ſtraight of Hercules pillers, dyd with their litle light pinnaſes of pirats, let all the trafficke & entercourſe of marchaundiſe. Æmylius being gone to ſeeke them in their countrie, they taried his comming with an armie of forty thouſand men: neuertheles, though he had but eight thouſand men in all, and that they were fiue to one of his, yet he gaue the onſet apon them, and ouerthrew them, and draue them into their cities. Then he ſent to offer them peace, for the ROMAINES would not altogether deſtroye the LIGVRIANS, bicauſe their countrie was as a rampeyr or bullwarke againſt the inuaſion of the GAVLES, who laye lurking for oportunitie and occaſion to inuade ITALIE: whereupon theſe LIGVRIANS yelded them ſelues vnto him, and put all their fortes and ſhippes into his handes. AEmylius deliuered vnto them their holdes againe, without other hurte done vnto them, ſauing that he raſed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their ſhippes from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers only, and no greater, & ſet all the priſoners at libertie they had taken, both by ſea and by lande, aſwell ROMAINES as other, which were a maruelous number. Theſe were all the notable acts he dyd worthie memorie, in the firſt yere of his Conſulſhippe. Afterwards, he oftentimes ſhewed him ſelf very deſirous to be Conſul againe, & dyd put forth him ſelfe to ſue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made ſute for it againe, but gaue him ſelfe only to ſtudie diuine things, and to ſee his children vertuouſly brought vp, not only in the ROMAINE tongue which him ſelfe was taught, but alſo a litle more curiouſly in the GRÆKE tongue. For he dyd not only retaine Grammarians, Rethoricians, and Logitians, but alſo painters, grauers of images, riders of horſes, and huntes of GRÆCE about his children: and he him ſelfe alſo (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with them in the ſchoole when they were at their bookes, and alſo when they otherwiſe dyd exerciſe them ſelues. For he loued his children as much, or more, then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the ſtate of the commõ wealth, the ROMAINES were at warres with king Perſeus, & they much blamed the captaines they had ſent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and corage, they had ſo cowardly behaued them ſelues, as their enemies laughed them to ſcorne: and they receyued more hurte of them, then they dyd vnto the King. For not long before, they had driuen king Antiochus beyound mount Taurus, and had made him forſake the reſt of ASIA, and had ſhut him vp within the borders of SYRIA: who was glad that he had bought that contrie with fifteene thouſand talẽts, which he payed for a fine. A litle before alſo, they had ouercome Philip, king of MACEDON, in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRÆCIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer, hauing ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the worlde was comparable, either for his power or valiantnes) they thought this to great a diſhonour to them, that this warre they had againſt king Perſeus, ſhould hold ſo long of euen hande with them, as if he had bene an enemie equall with the people of ROME: conſidering alſo that they fought not againſt them, but with the refuſe and ſcattered people of the ouerthrowen armie his father had loſt before, and knew not that Philip had left his armie ſtronger, and more experte by reaſon of his ouerthrowe, then it was before. As I will briefly reherſe the ſtorie from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greateſt power of all the captaines & ſucceſſours of Alexander the great, hauing obteined for him ſelf & his poſteritie the title of a King, had a ſonne called Demetrius, of whõ came Antigonus the ſecond, that was ſurnamed Gonatas, whoſe ſonne was alſo called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but dyed, and left a young ſonne called Philippe. By reaſon whereof, the Princes and Nobilitie of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme ſhould be left without heire: they preferred one Antigonus, coſin to the laſt deceaſed King, and made him marie the mother of Philip the leſſe, geuing him the name at the firſt of the Kings protectour only, and lieutenaunt

A lieutenaunt generall of his maieſtie. But after, when they had founde he was a good and wiſe prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the abſolute name of a King, and ſurnamed him Doſon, to ſaye, the giuer: for he promiſed muche, and gaue litle. After him reigned Philip, who in his grene youth gaue more hope of him ſelfe, then any other of the Kings before: in ſo much they thought that one daye he would reſtore MACEDON her auncient fame and glorie, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the ROMAINES, who roſe againſt all the world. But after that he had loſt a great battell, and was ouerthrowen by Titus Quintus Flaminius neere vnto the cittie of SCOTVSA: then he beganne to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercie of the ROMAINES, thinking he eſcaped good cheape, for any light ranſome or tribute the ROMAINES ſhould impoſe apon him. Yet afterB wards comming to vnderſtād him ſelfe, he grewe to diſdaine it much, thinking that to reigne through the fauour of the ROMAINES, was but to make him ſelfe a ſlaue, to ſeeke to liue in pleaſure at his eaſe, & not for a valliāt & noble prince borne. Whereupon he ſet all his minde, to ſtudie the diſcipline of warres, and made his preparations as wiſely and cloſely, as poſſiblie he could. For he left all his townes alongeſt the ſea coaſt, & ſtāding vpon any high wayes, without any fortification at all, & in manner deſolate without people, to the ende there might appeare no occaſion of doubt or miſtruſt in him: & in the meane time, in the highe countries of his Realme farre from great beaten wayes, he leauied a great number of men of warre, & repleniſhed his townes & ſtrong holdes that laye ſcatteringly abroad, with armour & weapon, money, & men, prouiding for warre, which he kept as ſecretly as he could. For he had prouiC ſion of armour in his armorie, to arme thirtie thouſand men, & eight million buſſhels of corne ſafely lokt vp in his fortes & ſtrōger places, & ready money, as much as would ſerue to entertaine tenne thouſand ſtraungers in paye, to defend his countrie for the ſpace of tenne yeres. But before he could bring that to paſſe he had purpoſed, he dyed for grief & ſorowe, after he knewe he had vniuſtly put Demetrius the beſt of his ſonnes to death, apon the falſe accuſation of the worſt, that was Perſeus: who as he dyd inherite the Kingdom of his father by ſucceſſion, ſo dyd he alſo inherite his fathers malice againſt the ROMAINES. But he had no ſhoulders to beare ſo heauy a burden, and eſpecially being as he was, a man of ſo vile and wicked nature: for among many lewde & naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous & miſerable. They ſaye alſo, that he was not legitimate, bicauſe Philippes wife had taken him from *Gnathai*D nia (a tailours wife borne at ARGOS) immediatly after he was borne, & dyd adopt the child to be hers. And ſome thinke that this was the chiefeſt cauſe why he practiſed to put Demetrius to death, fearing leaſt this lawful ſonne would ſeeke occaſiō to proue him a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, ſimple though he was, & of vile & baſe nature, he found the ſtrength of his Kingdom ſo great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make warre againſt the ROMAINES, which he mainteined a long time, and fought againſt their Conſuls, that were their generalles, and repulſed great armies of theirs both by ſea and lande, and ouercame ſome. As Publius Licinius among other, the firſt that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrowen by him in a battell of horſemen, where he ſlewe at that time two thouſand fiue hundred good men of his, and tooke ſixe hundred priſoners. And their armie by ſea, riding at ancker before the cittie of OREVM, he E dyd ſodainly ſet apon, and tooke twenty great ſhippes of burden, and all that was in them, and ſoncke the reſt, which were all loden with corne: & tooke of all ſortes beſides, about foure & fiftie foyſtes, and galliots of fiftie owers a pece. The ſecond Conſul & generall he fought with all, was Hoſtilius, whom he repulſed, attempting by force to inuade MACEDON, by waye of the cittie of ELVMIA. Another time again, whē he entred in by ſtelth vpō the coaſt of THESSALY, he offred him battel, but the other durſt not abide it. Furthermore, as though the warre troubled him nothing at all, & that he had cared litle for the ROMAINES: he wēt and fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he ſlue tēne thouſād of thoſe barbarous people, & brought a maruelous great ſpoyle awaye with him. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpō the riuer of Danubie, which they call Baſtarne (mē very warF like, & excellēt good horſemē) & did practiſe with the ILLYRIANS alſo by meane of their king Gētius, to make thē ioyne with him in theſe warres: ſo that there ranne a rumour all about, that for money he had gotten theſe GAVLES to come downe into ITALIE, from the highe contrie of GAVLE, all alongeſt the Adriatick ſea. The ROMAINES being aduertiſed of theſe newes, thought the time ſerued not now to diſpoſe their offices in warres any more by grace & fauour vnto thoſe that ſued for them: but contrariwiſe, that they ſhould call ſome noble man that were very skilfull, and a wiſe captaine, and could diſcretly gouerne and performe things of great charge. As Paulus AEmylius, a man well ſtepped on in yeres, being three ſcore yere olde: and yet of good power, by reaſon of the luſty young men his ſonnes, & ſonnes in lawe, beſides a great number of his friends and kinſefolke. So all that bare great authoritie, dyd altogether with one conſent counſaill him to obey the people, which called him to the Conſulſhippe. At the beginning, in deede he delayed the people muche that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: ſaying, he was no meete man neither to deſire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the ende, ſeeing the people dyd vrge it apon him, by knocking continually at his gates, and calling him alowde in the ſtreetes, willing him to come into the market place, and perceyuing they were angrie with him, bicauſe he refuſed it: he was content to be perſuaded. And when he ſtoode among them that ſued for the Conſulſhippe, the people thought ſtraight that he ſtoode not there ſo muche for deſire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of aſſured victorie, and happie ſucceſſe of this begonne warre: ſo great was their loue towardes him, and the good hope they had of him, that they choſe him Conſul againe the ſecond time. Wherefore ſo ſone as he was choſen, they would not proceede to drawing of lottes according to their cuſtome, which of the two Conſuls ſhould happen to goe into MACEDON: but preſently with a full and whole conſent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Conſul now, and appointed to make warre apon king Perſeus, all the people dyd honorably companie him home vnto his houſe: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making muche of her: asked her why ſhe wept. The poore girle aunſwered, colling him about the necke, and kiſſing him: Alas, father, wote you what? our Perſeus is dead. She ment it by a litle whelpe ſo called, which was her playe fellowe. In good hower, my girle, ſayed he, I like the ſigne well. Thus doth Cicero the orator reporte it in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES had a cuſtome at that time, that ſuche as were elected Conſuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) ſhould make an oration of thanckes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had ſhewed him. The people then (according to the cuſtome) being gathered together to heare AEmylius ſpeake, he made this oration vnto them. That the firſt time he ſued to be Conſul, was in reſpect of him ſelfe, ſtanding at that time in neede of ſuche honour: now he offred him ſelfe the ſecond time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who ſtoode in nede of a generall, wherefore he thought him ſelfe nothing bounde nor beholding vnto them now. And if they dyd thincke alſo this warre might be better followed by any other, then by him ſelfe, he would preſently with all his harte reſigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truſt or confidence in him, that they thought him a man ſufficient to diſcharge it: then that they would not ſpeake nor medle in any matter that concerned his duetie, and the office of a generall, ſauing only, that they would be diligent (without any wordes) to doe whatſoeuer he commaunded, and ſhould be neceſſarie for the warre and ſeruice they tooke in hande. For if euery man would be a commaunder, as they had bene heretofore, of thoſe by whom they ſhould be commaunded: then the world would more laughe them to ſcorne in this ſeruice, then euer before had bene accuſtomed. Theſe wordes made the ROMAINES very obedient to him, and conceyued good hope to come, being all of thē very glad that they had refuſed thoſe ambitious flatterers that ſued for the charge, & had geuē it vnto a man, that durſt boldly & franckly tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMAINES by yelding vnto reaſon & vertue, came to cōmand all other, & to make them ſelues the mightieſt people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius ſetting forward to this warre, had winde at will, and fayer paſſage to bring him at his iorneis ende: I impute it to good fortune, that ſo quickly and ſafely conueyed him to his campe. But for the reſt of his exploytes he dyd in all this warre, when parte of them were performed by his owne hardines, other by his wiſedome and good counſell, other by the diligence of his friendes in ſeruing him with good will, other by his owne reſolute conſtancy and corage in extremeſt

A extremeſt daunger, and laſt, by his maruelous skill in determining at an inſtant what was to be done: I cannot attribute any notable acte or worthy ſeruice vnto this his good fortune, they talke of ſo much, as they maye doe in other captaines doings. Onles they will ſaye peraduenture, that Perſeus couetouſnes and miſerie was Æmilius good fortune: for his miſerable feare of ſpending money, was the only cauſe and deſtruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good ſtate and hope of continuing in proſperitie. For there came downe into the countrie of MACEDON at king Perſeus requeſt, tenne thouſand Baſtarnæ a horſe backe, and as many footemen to them, who allwayes ioyned with them in battell, all mercenary ſouldiers, depending vpon paye and enterteinment of warres, as men that could not plowe nor ſowe, nor trafficke marchandiſe by ſea, nor skill of graſing to gaine their liuing B with: & to be ſhorte, that had no other occupation or marchādiſe, but to ſerue in the warres, and to ouercome thoſe with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incampe & lodge in the MEDICA, neere to the MACEDONIANS, who ſawe them ſo goodly great men, and ſo well trained & exerciſed in handling all kinde of weapons, ſo braue and luſtie in wordes and threates againſt their enemies: they beganne to plucke vp their hartes, & to looke bigge, imagining that the ROMAINES would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to looke them in the face, and only to ſee their marche, it was ſo terrible and fearefull. But Perſeus, after he had incoraged his men in this ſorte, and had put them in ſuche a hope and iollitie, when this barbarous ſupply came to aske him a thouſand crownes in hande for euery captaine, he was ſo damped & troubled withall in his minde, caſting vp the ſumme it came to, that his only co- C uetouſnes and miſerie made him returne them backe, and refuſe their ſeruice: not as one that ment to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to ſpare his treaſure, and to be a husband for them, as if he ſhould haue geuen vp a ſtraight accompt vnto them of his charges in this warre, againſt whom he made it. And notwithſtanding alſo his enemies dyd teache him what he had to doe, conſidering that beſides all other their warlike furniture & munition, they had no leſſe then a hundred thouſand fighting men lying in campe together, ready to execute the Conſuls commaundement. Yet he taking vpon him to reſiſt ſo puiſſant an armie, and to mainteine the warres, which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in enterteining ſuch multitudes of men, and more then needed: hardly would depart with his gold and ſiluer, but kept it ſafe locked vp in his treaſurie, as if he had bene affrayed to touche it, and had bene none of D his. And he dyd not ſhewe that he came of the noble race of theſe kings of LYDIA, and of PHOENICIA, who gloried to be riche: but ſhewed howe by inheritaunce of bloude he chalenged ſome parte of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both bicauſe they eſteemed to buye victorie with money, not money with victorie, dyd many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common ſaying in olde time, that it was not Philip, but his gold and ſiluer that wanne the citties of GRÆCE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDES, ſeeing the MACEDONIANS carie with them all the wealth of PERSIA, which made his campe very heauie, and ſlowe to marche: he him ſelfe firſt of all ſet fire of his owne cariage that conueyed all his neceſſaries, and perſuaded other to doe the like, that they might marche more lightly, and eaſelier goe on the iorney. But Perſeus contrarilie would not ſpend E any parte of his goodes, to ſaue him ſelfe, his children and Realme, but rather yelded to be led priſoner in triumphe with a great ranſome, to ſhewe the ROMAINES howe good a husband he had bene for them. For he dyd not only ſend away the GAVLES without geuing them paye as he had promiſed, but moreouer hauing perſuaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his parte in theſe warres, for the ſumme of three hūdred talents which he had promiſed to furniſh him with: he cauſed the money to be told, and put vp in bagges by thoſe whom Gentius ſent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking him ſelfe ſure of the money promiſed, committed a fond and fowle parte: for he ſtayed the ambaſſadours the ROMAINES ſent vnto him, and committed them to priſone. This parte being come to Perſeus eares, he thought now he needed not hier him with money to be an enemie to the ROMAINES, cōſidering he had waded ſo F farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifeſt ſigne of his ill will towards them, and that it was to late to looke backe and repent him; now that his fowle parte had plunged him into certen warres, for an vncerten hope. So dyd he abuſe the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promiſed him. And worſe then this, ſhortely after he ſuffered Lucius Anicius the ROMAINE Prætor, whom they ſent againſt him with an armie, to plucke king Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his Realme and Kingdome, and to carie them priſoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arriued in MACEDON, to make warre againſt ſuch an enemie: he made no manner of reckoning of his perſone, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one campe he had foure thouſand horſemen, and no leſſe then forty thouſand footemen, with the which armie he had planted him ſelfe alongeſt the ſea ſide, by the foote of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpoſſible to be approched: and there he had ſo well fortified all the ſtraites and paſſages vnto him with fortifications of woode, that he thought him ſelfe to lye ſafe out of all daunger, and imagined to dalie with Æmylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. AEmylius in the meane ſeaſon laye not idle, but occupied his wittes throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put ſome thing in proofe. And perceyuing that his ſouldiers by ouermuche licentious libertie (wherein by ſufferaunce they liued before) were angrie with delaying and lying ſtill, and that they dyd buſilie occupie them ſelues in the generalles office, ſaying this, and ſuche a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundely, and commaunded them they ſhould medle no more to curiouſly in matters that perteined not to them, and that they ſhould take care for nothing els, but to ſee their armour & weapon ready to ſerue valliantly, & to vſe their ſwordes after the ROMAINES facion, when their generall ſhould appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to them ſelues, he commaunded thoſe that watched ſhould haue no ſpeares nor pykes, bicauſe they ſhould be more wakefull, hauing no long weapon to reſiſt the enemie, if they were aſſaulted. The greateſt trouble his army had, was lacke of freſhe water, bicauſe the water that ranne to the ſea was very litle, and maruelous fowle by the ſea ſide. But AEmylius conſidering they were at the foote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruelous height, and full of wodde withall) coniectured, ſeeing the trees ſo freſhe and grene, that there ſhould be ſome litle pretie ſpringes among them, which ranne vnder the grounde. So he made them digge many holes and welles alongeſt the mountaine, which were ſtraight filled with fayer water, being pent within ground before for lacke of breaking open the heades, which then ranne downe in ſtreames, and met together in ſundrie places. And yet ſome doe denie, that there is any meeting of waters within the grounde, from whence the ſpringes doe come. For they ſaye, that ronning out of the earth as they doe, it is not for that, that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendreth and riſeth at the ſame time and place where it ronneth out, turning the ſubſtaunce into water, which is a moiſt vapour, thickneth and waxeth cold by the coldnes of the earth, and ſo becommeth a ſtreame, and ronneth downe. Euen ſo, ſaye they, as womens breſtes are not allwayes full of milke, as milke pannes are that continually keepe milke, but doe of them ſelues conuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: the very like are ſpringes and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, which haue no meeting of hidden waters, nor hollowe places capable, readily to deliuer water from them, as one would drawe it out of a pompe, or ſeſterne, from ſo many great brookes, and deepe riuers. But by their naturall coldnes and moiſture, they waxe thicke, and put forth the vapour & ayer ſo ſtrong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaſon why the places where they digge and open the earth, doe put forth more abundaunce of water by opening the grounde: like as womens breſtes doe geue more milke, when they are moſt drawen and ſuckt, bicauſe in a ſorte they doe better feede the vapour within them, and conuert it thereby into a ronning humour. Where, to the contrarie, thoſe partes of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no vent outward, are the more vnable, and leſſe mete to ingender water, hauing not that prouocation and courſe to ronne, that cauſeth the bringing forth of moiſture. Yet ſuch as mainteine this opinion, doe geue them occaſion that loue argument, to contrarie them thus. Then we may ſaye by like reaſon alſo, that in the bodies of beaſtes there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth vpon a ſodaine, when they are hurte, by transferring of ſome ſpirite or fleſhe that readilie chaungeth into ſome ronning licoure. And moreouer, they

The originall of ſpringes.

Fountaines compared to womēs breſts.

A are confuted by the cõmon experience of theſe mine men, that digge in the mines for mettell or that vndermine caſtells to winne them: who when they digge any great depth, doe many times meete in the bowells of the earth with ronning riuers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle and litle, as of neceſſitie it ſhould be, if it were true, that vpon the preſent opening of the ground, the humour ſhould immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we ſee oftentimes that in cutting through a mountaine or rocke, ſodainely there ronneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our hiſtorie againe. Æmylius laye there a conuenient time, & ſtirred not: and it is ſayed there were neuer ſeene two ſo great armies one ſo neere to the other, and to be ſo quiet. In the ende, caſting many things with him ſelfe, and deuiſing ſundrie practiſes, he was enformed of another B waye to enter into MACEDON, through the countrie of PERRÆBIA, ouer againſt the temple called Pythion, & the rocke vpon which it is built, where there laye no garriſon: which gaue him better hope to paſſe that waye, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes & hardnes of the waye vnto it. So, he brake the matter to his coũſaill. Thereupon Scipio called Naſica (the ſonne adopted of that great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great mã, & was preſidẽt of the Senate or counſell) was the firſt man that offred him ſelf to leade them, whom it would pleaſe him to ſend to take that paſſage, & to aſſault their enemies behind. The ſecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldeſt ſonne of Æmylius, who being but a very young man, roſe notwithſtanding, & offred him ſelf very willingly. Æmylius was very glad of their offers, &
C gaue them not ſo many men as Polybius writeth, but ſo many as Naſica him ſelf declareth, in a letter of his he wrote to a King, where he reporteth all the ſtorie of this iorney. There were 3000. ITALIANS leauied in ITALIE, by the cõfederats of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINE legions, & in the left winge about 5000. Beſides thoſe, Naſica tooke alſo 120. men at armes, & about 200. CRETANS & THRACIANS mingled together, of thoſe Harpalus had ſent thither. With this number Naſica departed from the campe, & tooke his waye toward the ſea ſide, & lodged by the tẽple of Hercules, as if he had determined to doe this feate by ſea, to enuironne the cãpe of the enemies behind. But when the ſouldiers had ſupped, & that it was darke night, he made the captaines of euery bande priuie to his enterpriſe, & ſo marched all night a contrary waye from the ſea, vntill at the length they came vnder the tẽple of Pythion, where he lodged to reſt the ſouldiers that were ſore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus
D is aboue tenne furlonge highe, as appeareth in a place ingrauen by him that meaſured it.

Yet the Geometricians ſaye, that there is no mountaine higher, nor ſea deeper, then the length of tenne furlonges: ſo that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) dyd not take his meaſure at auenture, and by geſſe, but by true rules of the arte, and inſtrumentes Geometricall. There Naſica reſted all night. King Perſeus perceyuing in the meane time that Æmylius ſtirred not from the place where he laye, miſtruſted nothing his practiſe, and the comming of Naſica who was at hande: vntill ſuch time as a traitour of CRETA (ſtealing from Naſica) dyd reueale vnto him the pretended practiſe, as alſo the ROMAINES compaſſing of him about. He worldied muche at theſe newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he laye in, but diſpatched one of his captaines called Milon, with tenne thouſand ſtraungers, and two thou-F ſand MACEDONIANS: and ſtraightly commanded him with all the poſſible ſpeede he could, to get the toppe of the hill before them. Polybius ſayeth, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alaram, when they were ſlepinge. But Naſica writeth, that there was a maruelous sharpe and terrible battell on the toppe of the mountaine: and sayed plainely, that a THRACIAN souldier comming towards him, he threwe his darte at him, and hitting him right in the brest, slue him starke dead: and hauing repulsed their enemies, Milon their captaine shamefully ronning awaye in his coate without armour or weapon, he followed him without any daunger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safety of all his companie. This conflict fortuning thus, Perseus raised his campe in great haste from the place where he was, and being disapointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wittes ende, and not knowing howe to determine. Yet was he constrained either to staye, and incampe before the cittie of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or els to deuide his armie into his cities & strong holdes, and to receyue the warres within his owne countrie, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder & bloudeshed. Hereupon his friends dyd counsell him, to choose rather the fortune of battell: alledging vnto him, that he was the stronger in men a great waye, & that the MACEDONIANS would fight lustely with all the corage they could, considering that they fought for the safety of their wiues and children, & also in the presence of their King, who should both see euery mans doing, and fight him selfe in persone also for them. The King moued by these persuasions, determined to venter the chaūce of battell. So he pitched his campe, and viewed the situation of the places all about, and deuided the companies amongest his captaines, purposing to geue a whotte charge vpon the enemies when they should drawe nere. The place and countrie was suche, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to raunge a battell of footemen in, and litle prety hilles also one depending vpon another, which were very cōmodious for archers, naked men, and such as were lightly armed, to retire them selues vnto being distressed, & also to enuirōne their enemies behind. There were two small riuers also, Æson and Leucus that rāne through the same, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the later ende of the sommer, yet they would annoye the ROMAINES notwithstanding. Now when Æmylius was ioyned with Nasica, he marched on straight in battell raye towards his enemies. But perceyuing a farre of their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same: he wondred to behold it, and sodainly stayed his armie, considering with him selfe what he had to doe. Then the young captaines hauing charge vnder him, desirous to fight it out presently, went vnto him to praye him to geue the onset: but Nasica specially aboue the rest, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Æmylius smiling, aunswered him: so would I doe, if I were as young as thou. But the sundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the faultes the vanquished doe commit: doe forbid me to goe so whottely to worke (before my souldiers haue rested, which dyd returne but now) to assault an armie set in suche order of battell. When he had aunswered him thus, he commaunded the first bands that were now in viewe of the enemies, should imbattell them selues, shewing a countenaunce to the enemie as though they would fight: and that those in the rereward should lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the campe. So, bringing the foremost men to be hindemost, by chaunging from man to man before the enemies were ware of it: he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyse, and the enemies neuer perceyuing it. But when night came, and euery man had supped, as they were going to sleepe and take their rest: the moone which was at the full, and of a great height, beganne to darken, & to chaunge into many sortes of collers, losing her light, vntill suche time as she vanished awaye, and was eclipsed altogether. Then the ROMAINES beganne to make a noyse with basons and pannes, as their facion is to doe in suche a chaunce, thinking by this sound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted, and firebrands into the ayer. The MACEDONIANS on thother side dyd no suche matter within their campe, but were all together striken with an horrible feare: and there ranne straight a whispering rumour through the people, that this signe in the element signified the eclipse of the King. For Æmylius was but ignorant of the diuersities of the eclipses, and he had heard saye the cause is, by reason that the moone making her ordinaire course about the world (after certen reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round shadowe of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden: vntill suche time as hauing

The cause of an eclipse of the moone.

A paſt the darke region of the ſhadow, ſhe cõmeth afterwards to recouer her light which ſhe taketh of the ſunne. Neuertheles, he being a godly deuout man, ſo ſone as he perceyued the moone had recouered her former brightnes againe, he ſacrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning alſo by the breake of day, making ſacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any ſignes or tokens that promiſed him good lucke, in ſacrificing twenty oxen one after another: but at the one & twenteth, he had ſignes that promiſed him victorie, ſo he defended him ſelf. Wherfore, after he had vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice of a hundred oxen to Hercules, and alſo games of prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readines to fight: & ſo ſought to winne time, tarying till the ſunne came about in the after noone towardes the Weſt, to the ende that the ROMAINES which were turned towardes the Eaſt, ſhould not haue
B it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he repoſed him ſelfe in his tent, which was all open behind towardes the ſide that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies laye. When it grewe towards night, to make the enemies ſet apon his men: ſome ſaye he vſed this policie. He made a horſe be driuen towards them without a bridell, & certen ROMAINES followed him, as they would haue taken him againe: and this was the cauſe of procuring the skirmiſhe. Other ſaye, that the THRACIANS ſeruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, dyd ſet apon certen forragers of the ROMAINES, that brought forage into the campe: out of the which, ſeuen hundred of the LIGVRIANS ranne ſodainly to the reſcue, and relief comming ſtill from both armies, at the laſt the mayne battell followed after. Wherefore Æmilius like a wiſe generall foreſeeing by the daunger of this skirmiſhe, and the C ſtirring of both campes, what the furie of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and paſſing by the bandes, dyd encorage them, and prayed them to ſticke to it like men. In the meane time, Naſica thruſting him ſelfe into the place where the skirmiſhe was whotteſt, perceyued the army of the enemies marching in battell, ready to ioyne. The firſt that marched in the voward, were the THRACIANS, who ſeemed terrible to looke apon, as he writeth him ſelf: for they were mightie made men, and caried maruelous bright targets of ſteele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with taſes, their coates were blacke, & marched ſhaking heauy halberds vpon their ſhoulders. Next vnto theſe THRACIANS, there followed them all the other ſtraungers and ſouldiers whom the King had hiered, diuerſely armed and ſet forth: for they were people of ſundrie nations gathered together, emong whom D the PÆONIANS were mingled. The third ſquadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them choſen men, aſwell for the flower of their youthe, as for the valliantnes of their perſones: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, and braue purple caſſocks apon them, ſpicke, and ſpanne newe. And at their backes came after them, the olde bandes to ſhewe them ſelues out of the campe, with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to ſhine with the brightnes of their ſteele and copper. And all the hilles and mountaines thereabouts dyd ringe againe like an Eccho, with the crie and noyſe of ſo many fighting men, one incoraging another. In this order they marched ſo fiercely, with ſo great harte burning, & ſuch ſwiftnes: that the firſt which were ſlaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlonges from the campe of the ROMAINES. The charge being geuen, and the battell begonne, AEmylius galloping to the voward of his bat-E tell, perceyued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the firſt ranckes, had already thruſt their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, ſo as they could not come neere them with their ſwordes: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and dyd baſe their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thruſt into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had conſidered, and of what ſtrength and force his walle and rancke of targets was, one ioyning ſo neere another, and what a terrour it was to ſee a fronte of a battell with ſo many armed pikes and ſteele heades: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any ſight he euer ſawe before. Neuertheles he could wiſely diſſemble it at that time. And ſo paſſing by the companies of his horſemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he ſhewed a noble cherefull coun-F tenaunce vnto them that fought. But on the contrarie ſide, Perſeus the king of MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, ſo ſone as the battell was begonne, withdrewe him ſelf, and got into the cittie of PYDNE, vnder pretence to goe to doe ſacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the fainte ſacrifice of cowards, neither doth receyue their prayers, bicauſe they be vnreaſonable. For it is no reaſon, that he that ſhooteth not, ſhould hyt the white: nor that he ſhould winne the victorie, that bideth not the battell: neither that he ſhould haue any good, that doeth nothing toward it: nor that a naughty man ſhould be fortunate, and proſper. The goddes dyd fauour Æmylius prayers, bicauſe he prayed for victorie with his ſworde in his hande, and fighting dyd call to them for ayde. Howbeit there is one Poſidonius a writer, who ſayeth he was in that time, and moreouer, that he was at the battell: and he hath written an hiſtorie conteining many bookes of the actes of king Perſeus, where he ſayeth that it was not for fainte harte, nor vnder culler to ſacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perſeus went from the battell: but bicauſe he had a ſtripe of a horſe on the thighe the daye before. Who though he could not very well helpe him ſelf, and that all his friends ſought to perſuade him not to goe to the battell: yet he B cauſed one of his horſe to be brought to him notwithſtanding (which he commonly vſed to ryde vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of dartes were throwen at him from both ſides. And emong thoſe, he had a blowe with a darte that hurte him ſomwhat, but it was ouerthwart, and not with the pointe, and dyd hit him on the left ſide glawnſing wiſe, with ſuche a force, that it rent his coate, and raſed his skinne vnderneath, ſo as it left a marke behinde a long time after. And this is all that Poſidonius writeth to defend and excuſe Perſeus. The Romaines hauing their hands full, and being ſtayed by the battell of the Macedonians that they could make no breache into them: there was a captaine of the Pelignians called Salius, who tooke the enſigne of his band, and caſt it among the preaſe of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians brake in apon them, with C a maruelous force & furie into that place: for all Italians thinke it to great a ſhame & diſhonour for ſouldiers, to loſe, or forſake their enſigne. Thus was there maruelous force of both ſides vſed in that place: for the Pelignians proued to cut the Macedonians pikes with their ſwordes, or els to make them geue backe with their great targets, or to make a breache into them, and to take the pikes with their handes. But the Macedonians to the contrarie, holding their pikes faſt with both hands, ranne them thorow that came neere vnto them: ſo that neither target nor corſelet could hold out the force and violence of the puſhe of their pikes, in ſo muche as they turned vp the heeles of the Pelignians and Terracinians, who like deſperate beaſtes without reaſon, ſhutting in them ſelues emong their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deathes, and their firſt rancke were ſlaine euery man of them. D Thereupon thoſe that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and only retired geuing backe, towardes the mountaine Olocrus. Æmylius ſeeing that (as Poſidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, bicauſe that ſome of his men gaue backe: other durſt not fronte the battell of the Macedonians, which was ſo ſtrongly imbattelled of euery ſide, and ſo mured in with a wall of pikes, preſenting their armed heades on euerie ſide a man could come, that it was impoſſible to breake into them, no not ſo muche as to come neere them only. Yet notwithſtanding, bicauſe the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the fronte, could not allwayes keepe that walle, continuing their targets cloſe one to another, but they were driuen of neceſſitie to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battells, according to the great E force of the ſouldiers: that in one place they thruſt forward, and in another they geue backe, and leaue a hole. Wherefore Æmylius ſodainly taken the vauntage of this occaſion, deuided his men into ſmall companies, and commaunded them they ſhould quickly thruſt in betwene their enemies, and occupie the places they ſawe voyde in the fronte of their enemies, and that they ſhould ſet on them in that ſorte, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diuers companies, in ſundry places. Æmylius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieutenaunts, and the captaines alſo gaue the like charge vnto their ſouldiers that could skilfully execute their commaundement. For they went preſently into thoſe partes where they ſawe the places open, and being once entred in among them, ſome gaue charge vpon the flanckes of the Macedonians, where F they were all naked and vnarmed: other ſet vpon them behind: ſo that the ſtrength of all the corpes of the battell (which conſiſteth in keeping cloſe together) being opened in this ſorte, Victorie wõne by labour, not by ſlothe.

Salius a captaine of the Pelignians tooke the enſigne, and ſhrewe it among the enemies.

A was straight ouerthrowen. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a fewe againſt a fewe: the MACEDONIANS with their litle ſhorte ſwordes, came to ſtrike vpon the great ſheldes of the ROMAINES, which were very ſtrong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrarie, were driuen of neceſſitie to receaue the blowes of the ſtrong heauy ſwordes of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targettes: ſo that what with their heauines, and the vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corſelet, but they paſſed it through, and ranne them in. By reaſon whereof they could make no long reſiſtance, whereupon they turned their backes, and ranne awaye. But when they came to the ſquadron of the olde beaten ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleſt fight and moſt deſperate ſeruice, where they ſaye that Marcus Cato (ſonne of The valliãs- B great Cato, and ſonne in lawe of Æmylius) ſhewing all the valliantnes in his perſone that a nes of Mar- noble minde could poſſibly performe, loſt his ſword which fell out of his hande. But he like a cus Cato.
young man of noble corage, that had bene valliantly brought vp in all diſcipline, & knew how to follow the ſteppes of his father (the nobleſt perſone that euer man ſawe) was to ſhewe then his value and worthines: and thought it more honour for him there to dye, then liuing to ſuffer his enemies to enioye any ſpoyle of his. So, by & by he ranne into the ROMAINE army, to finde out ſome of his friendes, whom he tolde what had befalled him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his ſworde: whereto they agreed. And being a good company of luſty valliant ſouldiers together, they ruſhed ſtraight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and ſo dyd ſet apon them with ſuche force and furie, that they made a lane C through the middeſt of them, and with great ſlaughter and ſpilling of bloude, euen by plaine force, they cleared the waye ſtill before them. Now when the place was voyded, they ſought for the ſworde, and in the ende founde it with great a doe, amongeſt a heape of other ſwords and dead bodies, whereat they reioyced maruelouſly. Then ſinging a ſonge of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to geue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken a ſonder: vntill ſuche time as at the length, the three thouſand choſen MACEDO-NIANS fighting valliantly euen to the laſt man, and neuer forſaking their rancks, were all ſlaine in the place. After whoſe ouerthrowe, there was a great ſlaughter of other alſo that fled: ſo Æmilius vi- that all the valley and foote of the mountaines thereaboutes was couered with dead bodies. ctorie of Per-
The next daye after the battell, when the ROMAINES dyd paſſe ouer the riuer of Leucus, they ſeus.
D founde it ronning all a bloude. For it is ſayed there were ſlaine at this field, of Perſeus men, aboue fiue and twentie thouſand: and of the ROMAINES ſide, as Poſidonius ſayeth, not aboue ſixe ſcore, or as Naſica writeth, but foure ſcore only. And for ſo great an ouerthrowe, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done, and executed. For they beganne to fight about three of the clocke in the after noone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the reſt of The battell the daye they followed their enemies in chaſe, an hundred & twenty furlonges from the place fought and where the battell was fought: ſo that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they re- wonne in one turned againe into the campe. So ſuche as returned, were receyued with maruelous great howr.
ioye of their pages that went out with linckes and torches lighted, to bring their maſters into their tentes, where their men had made great bonfiers, and decked them vp with crownes and E garlands of laurell, ſauing the generalles tent only: who was very heauy, for that of his two ſonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be founde, which he loued beſt of the twaine, bicauſe he ſawe he was of a better nature then the reſt of his brethern. For The valliã- euen then, being newe crept out of the ſhell as it were, he was maruelous valliant and hardie, nes of Scipio and deſired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had bene caſt awaye, fearing leaſt the leſſe.
for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raſhnes of his youthe, he had put him ſelfe to farre in fight amongeſt the preaſe of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard ſtraight what ſorowe Æmylius was in, and how grieuouſly he tooke it. The ROMAINES being ſet at ſupper, roſe from their meate, and with torche light ſome ranne to Æmylius tent, other went out of the campe to ſeeke him among the dead bodies, if they might knowe him: ſo all the F campe was full of ſorowe and mourning, the vallies & hilles all abouts dyd ringe againe with the cries of thoſe that called Scipio alowde. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and ſingular partes required in a captaine & wiſe gouernour of the common weale aboue all the young men of his time. At the laſt, when they were out of all hope of his comming againe, he happely returned from the chaſe of the enemies, with two or three of his familliars only, all bloudied with new bloude (like a ſwift running greyhounde fleſhed with the bloude of the hare) hauing purſued very farre for ioye of the victorie. It is that Scipio which afterwards deſtroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANTIVM, who was the greateſt man of warre, and valliantest captaine of the ROMAINES in his time, and of the greateſt authoritie and reputation emong them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her ſpite, which ſhe dyd beare to ſo noble an exployte, ſuffered Æmylius for that time, to take his ful pleaſure of that noble victorie. And as for Perſeus, he fled firſt from the cittie of PYDNE, vnto the cittie of PELLA, with his horſemen, which were in manner all ſaued. Whereupon the footemen that ſaued them ſelues by flying, meeting them by the waye, called them traitours, cowards, and villanes: & worſe then that, they turned them of their horſe backes, and fought it out luſtely with them. Perſeus ſeeing that, and fearing leaſt this mutinie might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horſe out of the highe waye, and pulled of his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing leaſt they ſhould knowe him by theſe tokens: and bicauſe he might more eaſely ſpeake with his friends by the waye, he lighted a foote, and led his horſe in his hande. But ſuche as were about him, one made as though he would mende the latchet of his ſhooe, an other ſeemed to water his horſe, another as though he would drincke: ſo that one dragging after another in this ſorte, they all left him at the laſt, and ranne their waye, not fearing the enemies furie ſo muche, as their Kings crueltie: who being greued with his misfortune, ſought to laye the faulte of the ouerthrowe vpon all other, but him ſelfe. Now he being come into the cittie of PELLA by night, Euctus and Eudæus, two of his treaſorers came vnto him, and ſpeaking boldly (but out of time) preſumed to tell him the great faulte he had committed, and dyd counſell him alſo what he ſhould doe. The King was ſo moued with their preſumption, that with his owne handes he ſtabbed his dagger in them both, and ſlue them outright. But after this facte, all his ſeruauntes and friendes refuſed him, and there only taried with him but Euander CRETAN, Archedamus ÆTOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane ſouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they dyd beare him, but for the loue of his golde and ſiluer, as bees that keepe their hiues for loue of the hony. For he caried with him a great treaſure, and gaue them leaue to ſpoyle certen plate and veſſell of golde and ſiluer, to the value of fiftie talents. But firſt of all, when he was come into the cittie of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the cittie of ALEPSE, and that the feare was well blowen ouer: he returned againe to his olde humour, which was borne and bred with him, and that was, auarice and miſerie. For he made his complainte vnto thoſe that were about him, that he had vnwares geuen to the ſouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veſſell of golde to be ſpoyled, being thoſe which in olde time belonged vnto Alexander the great: & prayed them with teares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chaunge it for ready money. Now ſuche as knewe his nature, founde ſtreight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lye, to deceaue the CRETANS with: but thoſe that truſted him, and dyd reſtore againe the plate they had, dyd looſe it euery iotte, for he neuer payed them pennie of it. So he got of his friendes, the value of thirtie talents which his enemies ſone after dyd take from him. And with that ſumme he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the ſanctuarie and priuiledge, of the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. They ſaye, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuaunce dyd naturally loue their Kings: but then ſeeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hartes failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and ſubmitted them ſelues vnto Æmylius, and made him lorde of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two dayes: and this doth ſeeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all AEmilius doings vnto his good fortune. And ſurely, the maruelous fortune he happened on in the cittie of AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it muche, which a man cannot aſcribe otherwiſe, but to the ſpeciall grace of the godds. For one daye beginning to doe ſacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and ſet all the wodde a fire apon the aulter, & ſanctified the ſacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure dayes after Perſeus had loſt the battell, & that the Perſeus fled from Pydne to Pella.

Wonders.

A the cittie of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the listes or showe place, seing horses ronne for games: sodainly there rose a rumour at the entring into the listes where the games were, how Æmylius had wonne a great battell of king Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight in euery mans mouthe, and there followed vpon it a maruelous ioye and great cheere in euery corner, with showtes and clapping of handes, that continued all the daye through the cittie of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquierie, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine authour could be knowen, and euery man sayed they heard it spoken: so as in the ende it came to nothing, and passed awaye in that sorte for a time. But shortely after, there came letters, and certen newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it: which Newes brought to Rome out of Macedon in 4. dayes, of Aemylius victorie there: and no man knewe howe they came.

B could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We doe reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALIE, nere vnto the riuer of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very same daye vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another also in like manner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the cittie of MYCALA, the newes whereof came the same daye vnto the campe of the GRÆCIANS, lying before the cittie of PLATOEES. And in that great iorney where the ROMAINES ouerthrewe the Tarquines, and the armie of the LATINES: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they sawe two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victorie to ROME, and they iudged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some, tolde them: that he wondred howe they

C could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softely by the beard with both their handes, and euen in the market place his heare being blacke before, was presently turned yellowe. This miracle made them beleeue the reporte the man made, who euer after was called Ænobarbus, as you would saye, bearded as yellowe as golde. Another like matter that happened in our time, maketh all suche newes credible. For when Antonius rebelled against the emperour Domitian, the cittie of ROME was in a maruelous perplexitie, bicause they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grewe a sodaine rumour of victorie, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius him selfe was slaine, and all his armie ouerthrowen, & not a man left a liue. This rumour was so rife, that many of the chiefest men of ROME beleeued it, and dyd sacrifice thereupon vnto the goddes, Ænobarbus why so called.

D geuing them thankes for the victorie. But when the matter came to sifting, who was the first authour of the rumour: no man could tell. For one put it ouer still to another, and dyed so in the ende amongest the people, as in a bottomles matter, for they could neuer boult out any certen grounde of it: but euen as it came flying into ROME, so went it flying awaye againe, no man can tell howe. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iorney to make this warre, met with postes that brought him letters for the certen victorie: and remembring the rumour of the victorie that ranne before in ROME, he founde it true, that it was on the very same daye the victorie was gotten, and the distaunce betweene ROME & the place where the field was wonne, was aboue twenty thousand furlõges of. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our historie. Cn. Octauius, lieutenant of the armie of Æmylius by sea,

Cn. Octauius, Æmylius lieutenaunt by sea.

E came to ancker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he would not take Perseus by force out of the sanctuarie where he was, for the reuerence he dyd beare vnto the goddes Castor and Pollux: but he dyd besiege him in suche sorte, as he could not scape him, nor flye by sea out of the Ilande. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a summe of money to conuey him awaye by night: but the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken a borde by night into his vessell, all the Kings treasure of golde and siluer, he sent him worde that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and seruauntes, where in deede was no possibilitie to take shipping: but the next night following he hoysed saile, and got him awaye. It was a pittifull thing that Per-

The miserable state Perseus was brought vnto, by the craft & subtiletie of a Cretan.

F seus was driuen to doe and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a lide straight windowe vpon the walles, and not only him selfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knewe before what flying and hardnes ment. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter ſighe, when one tolde him on the peere, that he ſawe Oroandes the CRETAN vnder ſaile in the mayne ſeas. Then daye beginning to breake, and ſeeing him ſelfe voyde of all hope, he ranne with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the ſanctuarie again, before the ROMAINES that ſawe him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had geuen them him ſelfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruelouſly loued, and who then dyd traiterouſly betraye him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINES. Which parte was one of the chiefeſt cauſes that draue him (as a beaſt that will followe her litle ones being taken from her) to yeld him ſelfe into their hands that had his children. Now he had a ſpeciall confidence in Scipio Naſica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeld him ſelfe: but it was anſwered him, that he was not there. Then he beganne to lament his hard and miſerable fortune euery waye. And in the ende, conſidering howe neceſſitie enforced him, he yelded him ſelfe into the hands of Cneus Octauius, wherein he ſhewed plainely, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice: that was, a fainte harte, and feare to dye. But hereby he depriued him ſelf of others pittie & compaſſion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot denie and take from the afflicted, and ſpecially from them that haue a noble harte. For he made requeſt they would bring him vnto the generall Æmylius, who roſe from his chayer when he ſawe him come, and went to mete him with his friends, the water ſtanding in his eyes, to mete a great King, by fortune of warre, and by the will of the goddes, fallen into that moſt lamentable facte. But he to the contrarie, vnmanly, and ſhamefully behaued him ſelfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and vttered ſuche vncomely ſpeache and vile requeſtes, as AEmylius ſelfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes againſt him, being hartely offended, he ſpake thus vnto him. Alas poore mā, why doeſt thou diſcharge fortune of this faulte, where thou mighteſt iuſtly charge and accuſe her to thy diſcharge, doing things, for the which euery one iudgeth thou haſt deſerued thy preſent miſerie, & art vnworthie alſo of thy former honour? why doſt thou defame my victorie, & blemiſh the glory of my doings, ſhewing thy ſelf ſo baſe a mā, as my honour is not great, to ouercome ſo vnworthie an enemie? The ROMAINES haue euer eſteemed magnanimitie, euen in their greateſt enemies: but daſtardlines, though it be fortunate, yet is it hated of euery bodie. Notwithſtanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hande, gaue him into the cuſtodie of Ælius Tubero. Then AEmylius went into his tent, & caried his ſonnes, & ſonnes in law with him, & other men of qualitie, and ſpecially the younger ſorte. And being ſet downe, he continued a great ſpace very penſiue with him ſelf, not ſpeaking a word: in ſo much as all the ſtanders by, wondered much at the matter. In the ende, he beganne to enter into diſcourſe & talke of fortune, & the vnconſtancy of theſe worldly things, & ſayed vnto them. Is there any man liuing, my friends, who hauing fortune at will, ſhould therefore boaſt and glorie in the proſperitie of his doings, for that he hath cōquered a contrie, cittie, or Realme: & not rather to feare the vnconſtancie of fortune? who laying before our eyes, & all thoſe that profeſſe armes at this preſent, ſo notable an example of the cōmon frayeltie of men, doth plainely teache vs to thincke, that there is nothing cōſtant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men maye thinke them ſelues aſſured, conſidering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen to miſtruſt fortune moſt, & to mingle feare & miſtruſt, with ioye of victorie: if they will wiſely conſider the cōmon courſe of fatall deſtenie that altereth daylie, ſomtime fauoring one, otherwhile throwing down another? you ſee, that in an howers ſpace we haue trodē vnder our feete, the houſe of Alexander the great: who hath bene the mightieſt & moſt redouted prince of the world. You ſee a King, that not lōg ſince was folowed & accōpanied, with many thouſand ſouldiers of horſemen & footemen: brought at this preſent into ſuch miſerable extremitie, that he is inforced to receiue his meate & drinke daylie at the hands of his enemies. Should we haue any better hope then, that fortune will allwayes fauour our doings, more thē ſhe doth his now, at this preſent? no out of doubt. Therefore digeſting this matter well, you young men I ſaye, be not to bragge nor fooliſh prowde, of this conqueſt & noble victorie: but thinke what maye happē hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuie of this our preſent proſperitie. Such were Æmylius words to theſe young men, as it is reported, bridling by theſe & ſuch like perſuaſions, the luſty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit & bridle of reaſon. Afterwards

A wardes he put his armie into garriſons to refreſhe them: and went him ſelfe in perſone in the meane time to viſite GRÆCE, making it an honorable progreſſe, and alſo a commendable. For as he paſſed through their citties, he releued the people, reformed the gouernment of their ſtate, and euer gaue them ſome gifte or preſent. Vnto ſome he gaue corne, which king Perſeus had gathered for the warres: and vnto other he gaue oyles, meeting with ſo great ſtore of prouiſion, that he rather lacked people to geue it vnto, to receyue it at his handes, then wanting to geue, there was ſo much. As he paſſed by the cittie of DELPHES, he ſawe there a great piller, foure ſquare, of white ſtone, which they had ſet vp, to put king Perſeus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commaunded them to ſet vp his in that place, ſaying: it was reaſon the conquered ſhould geue place vnto the conquerours. And being in the cittie of OLYM-
B PIA, viſiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he ſpake this openly, which euer ſince hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had deſcribed him. Afterwardes when the tenne ambaſſadours were arriued that were ſent from ROME to eſtabliſh with him the realme of MACEDON, he redeliuered the MACEDONIANS their countrie, and townes againe, to liue at libertie, according to their lawes, paying yerely to the ROMAINES for tribute, a hundred talents: where before they were wont to paye vnto their Kings tenne times as muche. And he made playes and games of all ſortes, and dyd celebrate ſumptuous ſacrifices vnto the goddes. He kept open courte to all commers, and made noble feaſtes, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treaſure Perſeus had gathered together, ſparing for no coſte. But through his care and foreſight there was ſuche a ſpeciall good order taken, euery C man ſo curteouſly receyued and welcommed, and ſo orderly marſhalled at the table according to their eſtate and calling: that the GRÆCIANS wondred to ſee him ſo carefull in matters of ſporte and pleaſure: and that he tooke as great paynes in his owne perſone, to ſee that ſmall matters ſhould be ordered as they ought: as he tooke great regard for diſcharge of more weighty cauſes. But this was a maruelous pleaſure to him, to ſee that among ſuch ſumptuous ſightes prepared to ſhewe pleaſure to the perſones inuited, no ſight nor ſtately ſhewe dyd ſo delight them, as to enioye the ſight and company of his perſone. So he told them, that ſeemed to wonder at his diligence and care in theſe matters: that to order a feaſt well, required as great iudgement and diſcretion, as to ſet a battell: to make the one fearefull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friendes. But men eſteemed his bountie and magna-D nimitie for his beſt vertue and qualitie. For he dyd not only refuſe to ſee the Kings wonderful treaſure of golde and ſiluer, but cauſed it to be told, and deliuered to the cuſtodie of the treaſurers, to carie to the coffers of ſtore in ROME: and only ſuffered his ſonnes that were learned, to take the bookes of the Kings librarie. When he dyd rewarde the ſouldiers for their valliant ſeruice in this battell, he gaue his ſonne in lawe Æmylius Tubero a cuppe, [redacted]g fiue talents. It is the ſame Tubero we tolde you of before, who liued with ſixteene o[redacted]of his kynne all in one houſe, and of the only reuenue they had of a litle farme in the countrie. Some ſaye, that cuppe was the firſt pece of plate that euer came into the houſe of the Ælians, and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither them ſelues, nor their wiues, would euer haue, or weare, any gold or ſiluer. After he had wery well ordered E and diſpoſed all things, at the laſt he tooke leaue of the GRÆCIANS, and counſelled the MACEDONIANS to remember the libertie the ROMAINES had geuen them, and that they ſhould be carefull to keepe it, by their good gouernment and concorde together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his iorney towardes the countrie of EPIRVS, hauing receyued commiſſion from the Senate of ROME, to ſuffer his ſouldiers who had done ſeruice in the battell, and ouerthrowe of king Perſeus, to ſpoyle all the citties of that countrie. Wherefore that he might ſurpriſe them on a ſodaine, and that they ſhould miſtruſt nothing, he ſent to all the citties that they ſhould ſend him by a certaine daye, tenne of the chiefeſt men of euery cittie. Who when they were come, he commaunded them to goe and bring him by ſuche a daye, all the golde and ſiluer they had within their citties, aſwell in their priuate houſes, as in their F temples and churches, and gaue vnto euerie one of them a captaine and garriſon with them, as if it had bene only to haue receaued and ſearched for the gold and ſiluer he demaunded. But when the daye appointed was come, the ſouldiers in diuers places (and all at one time)

AEmylius cruell acte ſpoyling of Epirus.

ſet vpon their enemies, and dyd rifle and ſpoyle them of that they had, and made them also paye ranſome euery man: So as by this policie, there were taken and made ſlaues in one daye, a hundred and fiftie thouſand perſones, and three ſcore and tenne citties ſpoyled and ſacked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the ſpoyle of this generall deſtruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euery ſouldiers parte, aboue eleuen ſiluer Drachmes a pece. Which made euery one to wonder greatly, and to feare alſo the terrour of the warres, to ſee the wealthe and riches of ſo great a Realme, to amowunte to ſo litle for euery mans ſhare. When AEmylius had done this facte againſt his owne nature, which was very gentle and curteous: he went vnto the ſea ſyde to the citty of ORICA, and there imbarked with his armie bownde for ITALIE. Where when he was arriued, he went vp the riuer of Tyber againſt the ſtreame, in king Perſeus chief galley, which had ſixteene owers on a ſide, richely ſet out with the armour of the priſoners, riche clothes of purple culler, and other ſuche ſpoyles of the enemies: ſo that the ROMAINES ronning out of ROME in multitudes of people to ſee this galley, and going ſide by ſide by her as they rowed ſoftely, Æmylius tooke as great pleaſure in it, as in any open games or feaſtes, or triumphe that had bene ſhewed in deede. But when the ſouldiers ſawe, that the golde and ſiluer of king Perſeus treaſure was not deuided amongeſt them according vnto promiſe, and that they had a great deale leſſe then they looked for, they were maruelouſly offended, and inwardly grudged AEmylius in their hartes. Neuertheles they durſt not ſpeake it openly, but dyd accuſe him, that he had bene to ſtraight vnto them in this warre, and therefore they dyd ſhewe no great deſire, nor forwardnes, to procure him the honour of triumphe. Which Seruius Galba vnderſtanding, that had bene an olde enemie of his, notwithſtanding he had the charge of a thouſand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper tolde the people, howe Æmylius had not deſerued the honour of triumphe, and ſowed ſeditious wordes againſt him among the ſouldiers, to aggrauate their ill will the more againſt him. Moreouer, he craued a daye of the Tribunes of the people, to haue reſpit to bring forth ſuche matter as they determined to obiect againſt him: ſaying the time then was farre ſpent, the ſunne being but foure howers highe, and that it would require lenger time and leyſure. The Tribunes made him aunſwer, that he ſhould ſpeake then what he had to ſaye againſt him, or otherwiſe they would not graunte him audience. Hereupon he beganne to make a long oration in his diſpraiſe, full of railing wordes, and ſpent all the reſt of the daye in that rayling oration. Afterwardes when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the aſſembly, and the next morning the ſouldiers being incoraged by Galbaes oration, and hauing confedered together, dyd flocke about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had geuen warning they would [illegible]e their aſſembly. Now being broade daye, AEmylius triumphe was referred to the m[illegible]umber of voyces of the people, and the firſt tribe flatly dyd denie his triumphe. The Senate, and the reſidue of the people hearing that, were very ſorie to ſee they dyd Æmylius ſo open wrong and iniurie. The common people ſayed nothing to it, but ſeemed to be very ſorie, howbeit they ſought no redreſſe. The lordes of the Senate cried out apon them, & ſayd it was to much ſhame, and exhorted one another to bridell the inſolencie and boldnes of theſe ſouldiers, who would grōwe in the ende to ſuch tumulte and diſorder, that they would commit all miſchief and wickednes, if betimes they were not looked to, and preuented, ſeeing they dyd ſo openly ſtand againſt their generall, ſeeking to depriue him of the honour of his triumphe and victorie. So they aſſembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would ſtaye to take the voyces of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with ſuch needefull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Tribunes graunted to it, and ſilence was made. Then Marcus Seruilius, who had bene Conſul, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne perſone, and had allwayes ſlaine as many of his enemies as chalenged him man for man: roſe vp, and ſpake in fauour of AEmylius in this manner. I knowe now (ſayed he) better then before, how noble and worthie a captaine Paulus AEmylius is, who hath atchieued ſuch glorie and honorable victorie, with ſo diſhonorable and diſobedient ſouldiers. And I can but wonder, that the people not long ſince reioyced, and made great accompt, of the victories and triumphes

Contention about AEmylius triumphe.

Seruilius oration for the furtheraunce of AEmylius triumphe.

A triumphes wonne apon the ILLYRIANS and other nations of AFRICKE: and that now they « should for spite enuie his glorie (doing what lyeth in them to hinder) to bring a MACEDO- « NIAN king aliue in a triumphe, and to shewe the glorie and greatnes of king Philip and Alex- « ander the great, subdued by the ROMAINES force and power. What reason haue ye, that not « long since, apon a flying rumour that Æmylius had wonne the battell against Perseus, you « straight made sacrifices to the goddes with great ioye, praying them, that you might be wit- « nesses of the trothe thereof: and now that the persone him selfe whom you made generall « is returned home, and doth deliuer you most assured victorie, you doe frustrate the goddes « most solemne thankes and honour due to them, and doe depriue your selues also of your « wonted glorie in such a case? as if you were afeard to see the greatnes of your prosperitie, or « B that you ment to pardone a King, your slaue and prisoner. And yet of the two, you haue more « reason to hinder the triumphe, as pittying the King: then enuying your captaine. But the ma- « lice of the wicked, through your pacience is growen to suche an insolent audacitie and bold- « nes, that we see men present here before vs, which neuer went frō the smoke of the chimney, « nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at home like women & housedowes: « and yet they are so impudent and shameles, as they dare presume vnreuerently to your faces, « to prate of the office and duety of a generall of an armie, and of the desert of triumphe, be- « fore you I saye, who by experience of many a sore cut and wounde apon your bodies in the « warres, haue learned to knowe a good and valliant captaine, from a vile and cowardly persone. « And speaking these wordes, he cast open his gowne, and shewed before them all, the infinite « C scarres and cuttes he had receyued vpon his brest: and then turning him behinde, shewed all « suche places as were not fitte to be seene openly, and so turned him againe to Galba, and sayed « vnto him. Thou mockest me for that I shewe thee: but I reioyce before my countrie men and « cittizens: that for seruing my cōtrie night & daye a horse backe, I haue these wounds apon me « which thou seest. Now get thee about thy busines, & receiue their voyces: & I wil come after; « noting them that are naughtie and vnthankfull cittizens, who like to be soothed with flatterie; « and not stowtely commaunded, as behoueth a generall in the warre. These wordes so reined « the harde headed souldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other tribes agreed in one, « and graunted Æmylius triumphe: the order and solemnitie whereof was performed in this sorte. First, the people hauing set vp sundrie scaffoldes, aswel in the listes & field (called Circus A notable de- D by the LATINES) where the games and common running of horses and charrets are made, as scription of also about the market place, and in other streetes of the cittie, through the which, the shewe Æmylius of the triumphe should passe: they all presented them selues in their best gownes to see the triumphe.
magnificence and state thereof. All the temples of the goddes also were set wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were set through all the quar- ters of the cittie, numbers of sergeaunts and other officers holding tipstaues in their hands, to order the straglingpeople, and to keepe them vp in corners and lanes endes, that they should not pester the streetes, & hinder the triumphe. Furthermore, the sight of this triumphe was to continue three dayes, whereof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the images, tables, & pictures, & statues of wonderfull bignes, all wonne and gotten of their enemies, and E drawen in the showe, vpon two hundred & fiftie charrets. The second dayd, there were caried vpon a number of cartes, all the fairest and richest armour of the MACEDONIANS, aswell of copper, as also of iron and steele, all glistering bright, being newly furbished, and arteficially layed in order (and yet in such sorte, as if they had bene cast in heapes one vpon another, with- out taking any care otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) fayer burganets vpon tar- gets: habergions, or brigantines and cotselets, vpon greaues; rounde targets of the CRE- TANS, and iauelings of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongest the armed pykes: all this ar- mour and cariage, being bound one to another so trimly (neither being to lose, nor to straight) that one hitting against another, as they drue them vpon the carres through the cittie, they made suche a sound and noyse, as it was fearefull to heare it: so that the only sight of these F spoyles of the captiues being ouercome, made the sight so muche more terrible to behold it. After these cartes loden with armour, there followed three thousand men, which caried the ready money in seuen hundred & fiftie vessels, which wayed about three talets a peece, & euery one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bowles of siluer, cuppes & goblets facioned like hornes, & other pottes to drinke in, goodly to behold, aswel for their bignes, as for their great & singular imbossed workes about it. The third day early in the morning, the trūpets beganne to sound & set forwardes, sounding no marche nor swete note, to beawtifie triumphe withall: but they blewe out the braue alarom they sounde at an assaute, to geue the souldiers corage for to fight. After them followed sixe score goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gylte, & garlands of flowers & nosegayes about their heads, & there wēt by them certaine yong men, with aprons of nedle worke, girt about their midle, who led them to the sacrifice, & young boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold & siluer, to cast & sprinkle the bloud of the sacrifices about. And after these, followed those that caried all coynes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, & euery one of them waying three talents as they dyd before, that caried the great holy cuppe, which Æmylius had causēd to be made of masse gold, set full of precious stones, waying the weight of tenne talents, to make an offering vnto the godds. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made & wrought after antike facion, & notable cuppes of the auncient kings of MACEDON: as the cuppe called Antigonus, & another Seleucus: & to be shorte, all the whole cubberd of plate of gold & siluer of king Perseus. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perseus harnesse, & his royall bande (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, followed next the Kings children, whom they led prisoners, with the traine of their schoolemasters & other officers, & their seruaunts, weeping & lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked apon them, & taught the Kings young children to doe the like, to aske mercie & grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two sonnes and a daughter amongest them, whose tender yeres and lacke of vnderstanding, made them (poore soules) they could not feele their present miserie, which made the people so muche more to pittie them, when they saw the poore litle infants, that they knew not the chaūge of their hard fortune: so that for the cōpassion they had of thē, they almost let the father passe without looking vpon him. Many peoples harts did melt for very pittie, that the teares ranne downe their cheekes, so as this sight brought both pleasure & sorow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were past & gone a good way out of sight. King Perseus the father, followed after his children & their traine, & he was clothed in a blacke gowne, wearing a payer of slippers on his feete after his contrie māner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled minde, oppresst with sorow of his most miserable state & fortune. He was followed with his kinsefolks, his familliar frends, his officers & household seruants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamēting teares, & sorowfull eyes cast apon their vnfortunate master, how much they sorowed & bewailed his most hard & cursed fortune, litle accōpting of their own miserie. The voice goeth, that Perseus sent vnto Æmylius to intreate him, that he should not be led through the cittie in the showe & sight of the triūphe. But Æmylius mocking (as he deserued) his cowardly faint hart, aunswered: as for that, it was before, & is now in him, to doe if he wil. Meaning to let him vnderstād thereby, that he might rather chuse to dye, then liuing to receiue such opē shame. Howbeit his hart would not serue him, he was so cowardly, & made so effeminate, by a certen vaine hope he knew not what, that he was cōtented to make one amōg his own spoiles. After all this, there followed 400. princely crownes of golde, which the cities and townes of GRÆCE had purposly sent by their ambassadours vnto Æmylius, to honour his victorie: & next vnto thē, he came him selfe in his charret triūphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth & adorned. It was a noble sight to behold: & yet the person of him self only was worth the looking on, without all that great pōpe & magnificēce. For he was apparelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, & caried in his right hand a lawrell boughe, as all his armie did besids: the which being deuided by bands & cōpanies, followed the triūphing charret of their captaine, some of the souldiers singing songes of victorie, which the ROMAINES vse to singe in like triumphes, mingling thē with mery pleasant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of thē also dyd singe songs of triūphe, in the honour & praise of Æmylius noble cōquest & victorie. He was opēly praised, blessed, & honored of euery body, & neither hated nor enuied of honest mē. Sauing the ordinary vse of some god, whose propertie is allwayes to lessen or cut of some part

A of mans exceding prosperitie & felicitie, mingling with mans life the sence & feeling of good & euill together: bicause that no liuing persone should passe all his time of life, without some aduersitie or misfortune, but that such (as Homer sayeth) should only thinke thē selues happie, to whom fortune hath equally sorted the good with the euill. And this I speake, bicause Æmylius had 4. sonnes, two of the which he gaue in adoptiō vnto the families of Scipio & of Fabius, as we haue sayed before: & two other which he had by his secōd wife, be brought vp with him in his owne house, & were both yet very young. Of the which the one dyed, being 14. yeres of age fiue dayes before his fathers triūphe: & the other dyed also, 3. dayes after the pompe of triumphe, at 12. yeres of age. When this sorowfull chaūce had befallen him, euery one in Rome did pittie him in their hartes: but fortunes spite & crueltie did more greue & feare them, to see B her litle regard towards him, to put into a house of triūphe (full of honour & glorie, & of sacrifices & ioye) such a pittiefull mourning, & mingling of sorowes & lamētations of death, amōgest such songs of triumple & victorie. Notwithstāding this, Æmylius taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to vse constācie & magnanimitie, against the sword & pike of the enemie: but a like also against all aduersitie and enmitie of spiteful fortune. So, he wisely wayed & cōsidered his presēt misfortune, with his former prosperitie: & finding his misfortune cōterpeased with felicitie, & his priuate grieues cut of with cōmon ioye, he gaue no place to his sorowes & mischāces, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triūphe & victorie. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last sonnes, he left not to make his triūphant entrie, as you haue heard before. And his secōd sonne also being deceased after his triumphe, he C caused the people to assemble, & in face of the whole cittie he made an oration, not like a discōforted man, but like one rather that dyd cōforte his sorowfull contrymen for his mischāce. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing dyd feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, mistrusting her chaūge & incōstācy, & specially in the last warre, doubting for so great prosperitie as could be wished, to be payed home with an after intollerable aduersitie, & sinister chaunce. For as I went (sayed he) I passed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatike sea, from Brindes vnto Corfv in one daye. And from thence in fiue dayes after, I arriued in the cittie of Delphes, where I dyd sacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fiue other dayes, I arriued in my cāpe, where I found mine armie in Macedon. And after I had done the sacrifice, & due ceremonies for purifying of the same, I presently begāne to followe the purpose & D cause of my cōming: so as in 15. dayes after, I made an honorable ende of all those warres. But yet, mistrusting fortune allwayes, seing the prosperous course of my affaires, & cōsidering that there were no other enemies, nor daūgers I neded to feare: I feared sorely she would chaunge at my returne, when I should be vpon the sea, bringing home so goodly & victorious an armie, with so many spoiles & so many Princes and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was safely arriued in the hauen, & seing all the cittie at my returne full of ioye, & of feastes & sacrifices: I still suspected fortune, knowing her manner well enough, that she vseth not to gratifie men so franckly, nor to graunt them so great things clearly, without some certen sparke of enuie waiting on them. Neither dyd my minde being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the cōmon wealth, shake of this feare behind me: but that I sawe, this home mishappe & misE rie lighted vpō me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my triūphe, to burie my two young sonnes one after another, which I only brought vp with me, for the succession of my name & house. Wherefore, me thinkes now I may saye, I am out of all daūger, at the least touching my chiefest & greatest misfortune: & doe beginne to stablish my selfe with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other vnlucky or sinister chaunce. For she hath sufficiently contervailed the fauorable victorie she gaue you, with the enuious mishappe wherewith she hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the cōquetour & triūpher, as noble an exāple of mans miserie & weaknes, as the party cōquered, that had bene led in triūphe. Sauing that Perseus yet, conquered as he is, hath this cōforte left him: to see his childrē liuing, & that the cōquerour Æmylius hath lost his. And F this was the summe of Æmylius notable oration he made vnto the people of Rome, proceeding of a noble & honorable disposed minde. And though it pittied him in his harte to see the straunge chaunge of king Perseus fortune, and that he hartely desired to helpe him, and to doe him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but only to remoue him from the common prisone (which the Romaines call Carter) into a more clenly and sweter house where being straitly garded and looked vnto, he killed him selfe by abstinence from meate, as the most parte of historiographers doe write. Yet some writers tell a maruelous straunge tale and manner of his death. For they saye the souldiers that garded him, kept him from sleepe, watching him straightly when sleepe tooke him, and would not suffer him to shut his eye liddes (only apon malice they dyd beare him, bicause they could not otherwise hurte him) keeping him awake by force, not suffering him to take rest: vntill suche time as nature being forced to gene ouer, he gaue vp the ghoste. Two of his sonnes dyed also: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could speake the Romaine tongue very well, and dyd write it so trimly, that afterwards he was chauncelour to the magistrates of Rome, and dyd wisely and discretly behaue him selfe in his office. Furthermore, they doe adde to this goodly conquest of the realme of Macedon, that Æmylius conquered another speciall good thing, that made him maruelously well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so muche gold and siluer vnto the treasurie store of Rome, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yere that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first warres of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one singular good gift in him: that though the people dyd greatly loue and honour him, yet he euer tooke parte with the Senate and nobilitie, and dyd neuer by worde nor dede any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he dyd euer leane to the nobilitie and good men. And this dyd Appius afterwards cast in his sonnes teethe, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the office of Censor: Appius had about him to fauour his sute, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of auncient time the familie of the Appians had euer held on their parte. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of him selfe, yet he was in all times fauoured and beloued of the common people. Whereupon when Appius sawe him come into the market place, followed with men of small qualitie and base condition, that had bene slaues before, but otherwise could skilfully handle suche practises, bring the people together, and by oportunitie of cries and lowde voyces (if neede were) obteine what they would in the assemblies of the cittie: he spake out alowde, and sayed. O Paulus Æmylius, now hast thou good cause to sighe, and mourne in thy graue where thou lyest (if the dead doe know what we doe here on earth) to see Æmylius a common sergeant, and Licinius a pratling fellowe, howe they bring thy sonne vnto the dignitie of a Censor. And as for Scipio, he was allwayes beloued of the common people, bicause he dyd fauour them in all things. But Æmylius also, although he tooke euer the noble mens parte, he was not therefore lesse beloued of the common people, then those that allwayes flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to please them: which the common people did witnesse, aswell by other honours & offices they offred him, as in the dignitie of the Censor which they gaue him. For it was the holiest office of all other at that time, and of greatest power and authoritie, specially for inquierie and reformation of euery mans life and manners. For he that was Censor, had authoritie to put any Senatour of the counsell, and to disgrade him, if he dyd not worthely behaue him selfe according to his place and calling: and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and fittest for the place againe. Moreouer, they might by their authoritie, take from licentious young men, their horse which was kept at the charge of the common weale. Furthermore, they be the sessours of the people, and the muster masters, keping bookes of the number of persones at euery mustering. So there appeared numbred in the register booke Æmylius made then of them, three hundred, seuen and thirtie thousand, foure hundred, and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named president of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and dyd put of the counsell three Senatours, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he & his companion, Marcus Philippus kept, vpon viewe and muster taken of the Romaine horsemen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his charge and office, he fell sicke of a disease

A ſeaſe that at the beginning ſeemed very daungerous, but in the ende there was no other daunger, ſauing that it was a lingring diſeaſe, and hard to cure. So, following the counſell of phiſitians, who willed him to goe to a cittie in ITALY called VELIA, he tooke ſea, and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleaſaunt houſes vpon the ſea ſide, quietly and out of all noyſe. But during this time of his abſence, the ROMAINES wiſhed for him many a time and ofte. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to ſee the playes and ſportes, they cried out diuers times for him: whereby they ſhewed that they had a great deſire to ſee him againe. Time being come about when they vſed to make a ſolemne yerely ſacrifice, and Æmylius finding him ſelfe alſo in good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made the ſacrifice with the other prieſtes, all the people of B ROME gathering about him, reioycing muche to ſee him. The next daye after, he made another particular ſacrifice, to geue thankes vnto the goddes for recouerie of his healthe. After the ſacrifice was ended, he went home to his houſe, & ſate him downe to dinner: he ſodainly fell into a rauing (without any perſeuerance of ſicknes ſpied in him before, or any chaunge or alteration in him) and his wittes went from him in ſuche ſorte, that he dyed within three dayes after, lacking no neceſſarie thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world. For he was euen honoured at his funeralles, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither with gold, ſiluer, nor iuorie, nor with other ſuche ſumptuouſnes or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and good will of the people, all of them confeſſing his vertue and well doing: and this dyd not only his naturall country C men performe in memorie of him, but his very enemies alſo. For all thoſe that met in ROME by chaunce at that time, that were either come out of SPAYNE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all thoſe that were young and ſtrong, dyd willingly put them ſelues vnder the coffin where his bodie laye, to helpe to carie him to the churche: and the olde men followed his bodie to accompany the ſame, calling Æmylius the benefactour, ſauiour, and father of their countrie. For he dyd not only intreate them gently, and graciouſly, whom he had ſubdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleaſure them, and to ſet forwardes their cauſes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinſemen. The inuentorie of all his goodes after his death, dyd ſcant amownte vnto the ſumme of three hundred, three ſcore, and tenne thouſand ſiluer Drachmes, which his D two ſonnes dyd inherite. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, bicauſe he was adopted into a very riche houſe, which was the houſe of the great Scipio Africanus. THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

The ſtate of the Syracuſans before Timoleons cõming.

BEFORE Timoleon was ſent into SICILE, thus ſtoode the ſtate of A the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driuen out the tyranne Dionyſius, he him ſelfe after was ſlaine immediatly by treaſon: and thoſe that ayded him to reſtore the SYRACVSANS to their libertie, fell out, and were at diſſention among them ſelues. By reaſon whereof, the cittie of SYRACVSA chaunging continually newe tyrannes, was ſo troubled and turmoiled with all ſorte of euills, that it was left in manner deſolate, and without inhabitants. The reſt of SICILE in like caſe was vtterly deſtroyed, and no citties in manner left ſtanding, by reaſon of the long warres: and thoſe fewe that remained, were moſt inhabited of forreine ſouldiers & ſtraungers (a company of loſe men gathered together that tooke paye of no prince nor cittie) B all the dominions of the ſame being eaſely vſurped, and as eaſie to chaunge their lorde. In ſo muche, Dionyſius the tyranne, tenne yeres after Dion had driuen him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certen number of ſouldiers together againe, and through their helpe driuen out Niſeus, that raigned at that time in SYRACVSA: he recouered the Realme againe, and made him ſelfe King. So, if he was ſtraungely expulſed by a ſmall power out of the greateſt Kingdome that euer was in the worlde: likewiſe he more ſtraungely recouered it againe, being baniſhed and very poore, making him ſelfe King ouer them, who before had driuen him out. Thus were the inhabitants of the cittie compelled, to ſerue this tyranne: who beſides that of his owne nature he was neuer curteous nor ciuill, he was now growen to be farre more dogged and cruell, by reaſon of the extreme miſerie and misfortune he had endured. But the no- C bleſt cittizens repaired vnto Icetes, who at that time as lorde ruled the cittie of the LEONTINES, and they choſe him for their generall in theſe warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrannes, but bicauſe they had no other to repaire vnto at that time, & they truſted him beſt, for that he was borne (as them ſelues) within the cittie of SYRACVSA, & bicauſe alſo he had men of warre about him, to make head againſt this tyranne. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great armie, and inuaded the countrie. The SYRACVSANS being afrayed of them, determined to ſend ambaſſadours

A dours into GRÆCE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to praye ayde of them against the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other of the GRÆCIANS. And that not altogether bicause they were lineally descended from them, and that they had receyued in times past many pleasures at their handes: but also for that they knewe that CORINTHE was a cittie, that in all ages and times, dyd euer loue libertie, and hate tyrannes, and that had allwayes made their greatest warres, not for ambition of Kingdomes, nor of couetous desire to conquer and rule, but only to defend and mainteine the libertie of the GRÆCIANS. But Icetes in another contrarie sorte, he tooke apon him to be generall, with a minde to make him selfe king of SYRACVSA. For he had secretly practised with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithstanding, in words he commended the counsell and determination of the SYRACVSANS, and sent
B ambassadours from him selfe also with theirs, vnto PELOPONNESVS: not that he was desirous any ayde should come from them to SYRACVSA, but bicause he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refused to send them ayde (as it was very likely they would, for the warres and troubles that were in GRÆCE) that he might more easely turne all ouer to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vse them as his friendes, to ayde him against the SYRACVSANS, or the tyrante Dionysius. And that this was his full purpose, and intent, it appeared plainely sone after. Now when their ambassadours arriued at CORINTHE, & had deliuered their message, the CORINTHIANS, who had euer bene carefull to defend such cities as had sought vnto them, & specially SYRACVSA: very willingly determined in counsaill to send them ayde, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing warres with none of the GRÆCIANS. So their only staye rested, C vpon choosing of a generall to leade their armie. Now as the magistrates and gouernours of the cittie were naming suche cittizens, as willingly offred their seruice, desirous to aduaunce them selues: there stept vp a meane commoner, who named Timoleon, Timodemas sonne, a man that vntill that time was neuer called on for seruice, neither looked for any suche preferment. And truely it is to be thought it was the secret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whose election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valliantnes and vertue, maruelous good succesfe in all his doings afterwardes.

By what voice Timoleon came to be generall.

This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his countrie and common weale: and was allwayes gentle and curteous to all men, sauing that he mortally hated D tyrantes and wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his bodie apt for warres and for paynes: he was wise in his greneft youth in all things he tooke in hande, and in his age he shewed him selfe very valliant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a rashe harebraynd man, & had a greedy desire to reigne, being put into his head by a companie of meane men, that bare him in hande they were his friendes, and by certen souldiers gathered together, which he had allwayes about him. And bicause he was very hotte and forward in warres, his cittizens tooke him for a noble captaine, & a man of good seruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein Timoleon dyd helpe him muche to hide his faulte he committed, or at the least made them seeme lesse, & lighter then they were, still increasing that small good gifte that nature brought E forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIVES and the CLEONEIANS, Timoleon serued as a priuate souldier amongest the footemen: and Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horsemen, was in great daunger of being cast away, if present helpe had not bene. For his horse being hurte, threwe him on the grounde in the middest of his enemies. Whereupon parte of those that were about him, were affrayed, and dispersed them selues here and there: and those that remained with him, being fewe in nomber, and hauing many enemies to fight withall, dyd hardly withstand their force and charge. But his brother Timoleon seeing him in suche instant daunger a farre of, ranne with all speede possible to helpe him, and clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that laye on the grounde, receyuing many woundes on his bodie with swordes and arrowes, with great difficultie he repulsed F the enemies, and saued his owne and his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS fearing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto them, which was to lose their cittie through default of their friends helpe: they resolued in counsell, to entertaine in paye continually foure hundred ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, whom they aſſigned ouer to Timophanes charge. Who, abandoning all honeſtie and regarde of the truſt repoſed in him, dyd preſently practiſe all the wayes he could to make him ſelfe lorde of the cittie: and hauing put diuers of the chiefeſt cittizens to death without order of lawe, in the ende, he openly proclaimed him ſelfe King. Timoleon being very ſorie for this, and taking his brothers wickednes would be the very highe waye to his fall and deſtruction: ſought firſt to winne him with all the good words and perſuaſion he could, to moue him to leaue his ambitious deſire to reigne, and to ſaue (as neere as might be) his harde dealing with the cittizens. Timophanes ſet light by his brothers perſuaſions, and would geue no eare vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one Æſchylus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a ſoothſayer (as Theopompus the hiſtoriographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him Orthagoras) with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three comming to him, inſtantly beſought him to beleeue good counſell, and to leaue the Kingdome. Timophanes at the firſt dyd but laughe them to ſcorne, and ſported at their perſuaſions: but afterwards he waxed warme, and grew into great choller with them. Timoleon ſeeing that, went a litle a toſide, and couering his face fell a weeping: and in the meane ſeaſon, the other two drawing out their ſwordes, ſlue Timophanes in the place. This murder was ſtraight blowen abroade through the cittie, and the better ſorte did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare againſt the tyrante: conſidering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kinne, dyd notwithſtanding regard the benefit of his countrie, before the naturall affection to his brother, and preferred duety and iuſtice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had ſaued his brothers life, fighting for defence of his countrie: and now in ſeeking to make him ſelfe King, and to rule the ſame, he made him to be ſlaine. Suche then as miſliked popular gouernment and libertie, and allwayes followed the Nobilitie: they ſet a good face of the matter, as though they had bene glad of the tyrantes death. Yet ſtill reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed againſt his brother, declaring howe deteſtable it was both to the gods and men: they ſo handled him, that it grieued him to the harte he had done it. But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruelous euill, and that ſhe pronounced horrible curſes againſt him, and gaue out terrible wordes of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit ſhe could neuer abide to ſee him, but allwayes ſhut her doore againſt him. Then he being wounded to the harte with ſorowe, tooke a conceit ſodainly to kill him ſelfe by abſteining from meate: but his friends would neuer forſake him in this deſpaire, and vrged him ſo farre by intreaty and perſuaſion, that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he reſolued thenceforth to giue him ſelf ouer to a ſolitarie life in the countrie, ſecluding him ſelfe from all companie and dealings: ſo as at the beginning, he dyd not only refuſe to repaire vnto the cittie, and all acceſſe of companie, but wandring vp and downe in moſt ſolitarie places, conſumed him ſelfe and his time with melancholie. And thus we ſee, that counſells and iudgements are lightly caried awaye (by prayſe or diſprayſe) if they be not ſhored vp with rule of reaſon, and philoſophie, and reſt confounded in them ſelues. And therefore it is very requiſite and neceſſarie, that not only the acte be good and honeſt of it ſelfe, but that the reſolution thereof be alſo conſtant, and not ſubiect vnto chaunge: to the ende we maye doe all things conſideratly. Leſt we be like vnto likerous mowthed men, who as they deſire meates with a greedy appetite, and after are ſone weary, diſliking the ſame: euen ſo we do ſoddenly repent our actions, grounded vpon a weake imagination, of the honeſtie that moued vs thereunto. For repentaunce maketh the acte, which before was good, naught. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truthe of reaſon, doth neuer chaunge, although the matter enterpriſed, haue not allwayes happy ſucceſſe. And therefore Phocion the Athenian hauing reſiſted (as muche as in him laye) certen things which the generall Leoſthenes dyd, and which contrarie to his minde tooke good effect: and perceyuing the Athenians dyd open ſacrifice vnto the goddes, to geue them thankes for the ſame, and muche reioyce at the victorie they had obteined. I would haue reioyced to (ſayed he) if I had done this: but ſo would I not for any thing, but I had geuen the counſell. And after that ſorte, but more ſharpely dyd Ariſtides Locrian (a very friend and companion of Platoes) aunſwer Dionyſius the elder, tyrante of Syracvsa: who asked his

A goodwill to marye one of his daughters. I had rather see my daughter deade (sayde he) then maried vnto a tyranne. And within a certayne tyme after, the tyranne put all his sonnes to deathe: and then he asked him in derision, to greeue him the more, if he were still of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very sorye, (sayed he) with all my harte, for that thou hast done: but yet I doe not repent me of that I haue sayed. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe to Timoleon. Whether that inwarde sorowe strooke him to the harte for the deathe of his brother, or that shame did so abash him, as he durst not abide his mother: twenty yeares after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be generall of the ayde that shoulde be sent into SICILE, the people hauing willingly chosen and accepted of him: Telecslides, who

Timoleō chosen generall to go into Sicile.

B was chiefe gouernor at that time in the citie of CORINTHE, standing vppon his feete before the people, spake vnto Timoleon, and did exhorte him to behaue him selfe like an honest man, and valiant Captaine in his charge. For, sayd he, if you handle your selfe well, we will thinke you haue killed a tyranne: but if you doe order your selfe otherwise then well, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Nowe Timoleon being busie in leauying of men, and preparing him selfe: letters came to the CORINTHIANS from Icetes, whereby plainely appeared, that Icetes had caried two faces in one hoode, and that he was become a traytor. For he had

Icetes tyran of the Leontines, a traytor no sooner dispatched his Ambassadors vnto them, but he straight tooke the CARTHAGINIANS parte, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Dionysius, and to make him selfe king of SYRACVSA. But fearing least the CORINTHIANS would send ayde before he

C had wrought his feate: he wrote againe vnto the CORINTHIANS, sending them worde, that they shoulde not neede nowe to put them selues to any charge or daunger for comming into SICILE, and specially, bicause the CARTHAGINIANS were very angrie, and did also lye in wayte in the way as they should come, with a great fleete of shippes to meete with their armie: and that for him selfe, bicause he sawe they taried long, he had made league and amitie with them, against the tyranne Dionysius. When they had red his letters, if any of the CORINTHIANS were before but coldely affected to this iorney, choller did then so warme them against Icetes, that they franckly graunted Timoleon what he would aske, and did helpe to furnishe him to set him out. When the shippes were ready rigged, and that the souldiers were furnished of all thinges necessary for their departure, the Nunnes of the goddesse Proserpina

D sayed, they sawe a vision in their dreame, and that the goddesses Ceres and Proserpina did appeare vnto them, apparrelled like trauellers to take a iorney: and tolde them, that they woulde goe with Timoleon into SICILE. Apon this speache onely, the CORINTHIANS rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proserpina: and Timoleon him selfe before he would take the seas, went into the citie of DELPHES, where he made sacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entred within the Sanctuarie where the aunsweres of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull signe vnto him. For amongest the vowes and offerings that are hanged vppe vppon the walles of the Sanctuarie, there fell a bande directly vppon Timoleons heade, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had set out one foote towardes the iorney. He tooke

E shippe, and sayled with seuen gallyes of CORINTHE, two of CORPHVE, and tenne the LEVCADIANS did set out. When he was launched out in the mayne sea, hauing a francke gale of winde and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the same there came a maruelous great bright light ouer his shippe, and it was much like to a torche burning, when they showe the ceremonies of the holy mysteries. This torche did accompanie and guide them all their voyage, and in the ende it vanished away, and seemed to fall downe vppon the coast of ITALYE, where the Shippemasters had determined to arriue. The wise mens opinions being asked what this might signifie: they aunswered. That this wonderfull sight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddesse Ceres dreamed, and that the goddesses fauoring this iorney, had shewed them the waye,

A burning torche appeared in the element vnto Timoleon.

F by sending of this light from heauen: bicause that the Ile of SICILE is consecrated vnto the goddesse Proserpina, and specially for that they reporte her rauishement was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was assigned vnto her for her ioynter, at the day of her mariage.

Thus did this celestiall signe of the goddes bothe encorage those that went this iorney, and deliuer them also assured hope, who sayled with all possible speede they coulde: vntill such time, as hauing crossed the seas, they arriued vpon the coast of Italie. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstoode from Sicile put Timoleon in great perplexitie, and did maruelously discourage the souldiers he brought with him. For Icetes hauing ouerthrowē the battell of the tyranne Dionysius, and possessed the greatest parte of the citie of Syracusa: he did beseege him within the castell, and within that parte of the citie which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and inclosed him in with walles rounde about. And in the meane time he had prayed the Carthaginians, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in Sicile, to the ende that by preuenting that ayde, they might easily deuide Sicile betwene them, and no man to let them. The Carthaginians following his request, sent twenty of their gallyes vnto Rhegio, amonge which Icetes Ambassadors were sent to Timoleon, with testimonie of his doinges: for they were fayer flattering wordes, to cloke his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon he shoulde goe him selfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Icetes, to counsell him, and to accompanie him in all his doinges, which were nowe so farre onwardes in good towardnes, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, he shoulde send backe his shippes and souldiers to Corinthe agayne, considering that the warre was nowe brought to good passe, and that the Carthaginians woulde in no case that his men should passe into Sicile, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the Corinthians at their arriuall into the citie of Rhegio, finding there these Ambassadors, and seeing the fleete of the Carthaginians shippes, which did ryde at ancker not farre of from them: it spyted them on the one side to see they were thus mocked and abused by Icetes. For euery one of them were maruelous angrye with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore Sicilians, whome to playnely they sawe left a praye vnto Icetes for rewarde of his treason, and to the Carthaginians for recompence of the tyrannie, which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side they thought it impossible to concquer the shippes of the Carthaginians, which laye in wayte for them, and so neare vnto them: considering they were twyse as many in number as they, and hard for them to subdue the armie also that was in the handes of Icetes in Sicile, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the mayntenaunce of the warres. Notwithstanding, Timoleon spake very curteously vnto those Ambassadors, and captaynes of the Carthaginians shippes, letting them vnderstande that he would doe as much as they would haue him: and to say truely, if he woulde haue done otherwise, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheles he desired for his discharge, they woulde say that openly, in the presence of the people of Rhegio, (being a citie of Greece, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secrete: and that done, he would departe incontinently, alledging that it stoode him very much vppon for the safetie of his discharge, and that they them selues also should more faithfully keepe that they promised vnto him touching the Syracusans, when they had agreed vpon it, and promised it, before all the people of Rhegio, who should be witnes of it. Now, all this was but a fetche and policie deliuered by him, to shadowe his departure, which the Captaines and gouerners of Rhegio did fauor, and seeme to helpe him in: bicause they wished Sicile should fall into the handes of the Corinthians, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they commaunded a generall assembly of all the people, during which tyme, they caused the gates of the citie to be shut: geuing it out, that it was bicause the Citizens should not goe about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were assembled, they beganne to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of, to the ende they might winne time, vntill the gallyes of the Corinthians were departed. And staying the Carthaginians also in this assemblye, they mistrusted nothing, bicause they sawe Timoleon present: who made a countenaunce, as though he woulde ryse to say some thing. But in the meane tyme, some one did secretely aduertise Timoleon, that the other gallyes were vnder sayle, and gone their waye, and that there

Rhegio a citie of Greece.

A there was but one galley left, which taried for him in the hauen. Thereupon he sodainly stale away through the preasse, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chayer where the orations were made: and trudging quickly to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoysed saile also. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all safe together to lande at the citie of TAVROMENION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long before had sent for them, for he gouerned this citie, as if he had bene Lorde thereof. He was the father of Timæus the Historiographer, the honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in all SICILE. For he did rule his Citizens, in all iustice and equitie, and did alwaies shew him selfe an open enemy of tyrans. And following his affection therein, he lent his citie at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perswaded his Citi-

B zens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to ayde them, to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to restore it againe to libertie. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS that were at RHEGIO, when they knewe that Timoleon was vnder sayle and gone, after the assemblie of the counsell was broken vppe: they were ready to eate their fingers for spyte, to see them selues thus finely mocked and deceiued. The RHEGIANS on the other side, were mery at the matter, to see howe the PHENICIANS stormed at it, that they had such a fine parte played them. Howbeit in the ende, they determined to send an Ambassador vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their gallyes. This Ambassador spake very boldely, and barbarously vnto Andromachus, and in a choller: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his hande, then the backe of his hande, and did threaten him that his citie shoulde be so turned

C ouer hand, if he did not quickly send away the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hande vppe and downe as the Ambassador had done, and bad him that he shoulde get him going, and that with speede out of his citie, if he would not see the keele of his galley turned vpward. Icetes nowe vnderstanding of Timoleons comming, and being affrayed, sent for a great number of gallyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS beganne to despayre vtterly, when they sawe their hauen full of the CARTHAGINIANS galleyes, the best parte of their citie kept by Icetes, and the castell by the tyran Dionysius. And on thother side, that Timoleon was not yet comen but to a litle corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the litle citie of TAVROMENION, with a small power, and lesse hope: bicause there was not aboue a thowsand footemen in all, to furnishe these warres,

D neither prouision of vittells, nor so much money as woulde serue to entertayne and pay them. Besides also, that the other cities of SICILE did nothing trust him. But by reason of the violent extorcions they had alate suffered, they hated all Captaines and leaders of men of warre to the deathe, and specially for the tretcherie of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them sayed they came to set SICILE at libertie, and to driue out the tyrans: and yet neuertheles they had done so much hurte vnto the poore SICILIANS, that the miserie and calamitie which they had suffered vnder the tyrans, seemed all to be golde vnto them, in respect of that which the Captaines had made them to abyde. And they did not thinke them more happy, that had willingly submitted them selues vnto the yoke of seruitude: then those which they sawe restored, and set

E at libertie. Therefore perswading them selues, that this CORINTHIAN woulde be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but supposing they were the selfe same former craftes, and alluring baytes of good hope and fayer wordes, which they had tasted of before, to drawe them to accept newe tyrans: they did fore suspect it, and reiected all the CORINTHIANS perswasions. Sauing the ADRANITANS onely, whose litle citie being consecrated to the god Adranus, (and greatly honored and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in dissention one against an other: in so muche as one parte of them tooke parte with Icetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and an other side of them sent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned, that bothe the one and the other, making all the possible speede they coulde, who shoulde come first: arriued bothe in manner at one selfe tyme.

F Icetes had about fiue thowsande souldiers. Timoleon had not in all, aboue twelue hundred men, with the which he departed to goe towards the citie of ADRANVS, distant from TAVROMENION, about three hundred and fortie furlonges. For the first dayes iorney, he went no great way, but lodged betymes: but the next morning he marched very haſtely, & had maruelous ill way. When night was come, and day light ſhut in, he had newes that Icetes did but newly arriue before ADRANVS, where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderſtood this, they cauſed the voward to ſtay, to eate & repoſe a litle, that they might be the luſtier, & the ſtronger to fight. But Timoleon did ſet ſtill forwards, & prayed them not to ſtay, but to goe on with all the ſpeede they could poſſible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they ſhould) being but newly arriued, & troubled with making their cabbons, & preparing for ſupper. Therewithall as he ſpake theſe wordes, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched him ſelfe the formoſt man, as brauely and coragiouſly as if he had gon to a moſt aſſured victorie. The ſouldiers ſeeing him marche with that life, they followed at his heeles with like corage. So they had not paſſing thirty furlonges to goe, which when they had ouercomen, they ſtraight ſet apon their enemies, whome they found all out of order, and began to flye, ſo ſoone as they ſaw they were vpon their backes before they were aware. By this meanes there were not aboue three hundred men ſlayne, and twiſe as many moe taken priſoners, and ſo their whole campe was poſſeſſed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no leſſe wonder, how at the very time when he gaue charge apon the enemies, the dores of the temple of their god opened of them ſelues, & that the laueling which the Image of their god did hold in his hand, did ſhake at the very ende where the iron head was, and how all his face was ſeene to ſweate. This (in my opinion) did not onely ſignifie the victorie he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploytes he did afterwardes, vnto the which, this firſt encounter gaue a happye beginning. For immediatly after, many cities ſent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mamercus, the tyran of CATANA, a ſouldier, and very full of money, did alſo ſeeke his friendſhip. Furthermore, Dionyſius the tyran of SYRACVSA, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding him ſelfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuaunce of ſeige: made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knewe that he was ſo ſhamefully ouerthrowen. And contrariwiſe, much eſteeming Timoleons valiantnes, he ſent to aduertiſe him, that he was contented to yelde him ſelfe and the caſtell into the handes of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good happe vnlooked for, ſent Euclides and Telemachus, two Captaines of the CORINTHIANS, to take poſſeſſion of the caſtell, with fowre hundred men, not all at a tyme, nor openly (for it was vnpoſſible, the enemies lying in wayte in the hauen) but by ſmall companies, and by ſtelthe, he conueyed them all into the caſtell. So the ſouldiers poſſeſſed the caſtell, and the tyrans pallace, with all the moueables and munition of warres within the ſame. There were a great number of horſe of ſeruice, great ſtore of ſtaues and weapons offenſiue of all ſortes, and engynes of batterie to ſhoote farre of, and ſundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long tyme, to arme threeſcore and tenne thowſand men. Moreouer, beſides all this, there were two thowſand ſouldiers, whome with all the other thinges rehearſed, Dionyſius deliuered vp into the handes of Timoleon: and he him ſelfe, with his money and a few of his friendes, went his way by ſea, Icetes not knowing it, and ſo came to Timoleons campe. This was the firſt tyme that euer they ſawe Dionyſius a priuate man, in baſe and meane eſtate. And yet within fewe dayes after, Timoleon ſent him from thence vnto CORINTHE in a ſhippe, with litle ſtore of money. Who was borne and brought vp in the greateſt and moſt famous tyrannie, and kingdome, conquered by force, that euer was in the world: and which him ſelfe had kept by the ſpace of tenne yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out, he had bene maruelouſly turmoyled in warres, by the ſpace of twelue yeares: in which time, although he had done muche miſchiefe, yet he had ſuffered alſo a great deale more. For he ſawe the death of his ſonnes when they were men growen, and able to ſerue and cary armor. He ſaw his daughters rauiſhed by force, & deflowred of their virginitie. He ſaw his owne ſiſter (who was alſo his wife) firſt of all ſhamed, & cruelly handled in her perſon, with the greateſt villanies & moſt vile partes done vnto her, that his enemies could deuiſe: & afterwards horribly murdered with his childrē, & their bodies in the end throwen into the ſea, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionyſius was arryued in the cittie of CORINTHE, euery GRECIAN was wonderfull deſirous

A to go ſee him, and to talke with him. And ſome went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom fortune had ouerthrowen, ſo bitterly did they hate him. Other pittiyng him in their heartes, to ſee ſo great a chaunge, did behold him as it were with a certaine compaſſion, conſidering what great power, ſecret and diuine cauſes haue ouer mens weakenes and frailtie, and thoſe thinges that daily paſſeth ouer our heades. For the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand ſo wonderful, as was this of fortune. Who made the world ſee a man, that before was in maner Lorde and King of all SICILE, ſit then commonly in the cittie of CORINTHE, talking with a vitailer, or ſitting a whole day in a perfumers ſhoppe, or commonly drinking in ſome celler or tauerne, or to brawle and ſcolde in the middeſt of the ſtreetes, with common whores in face of the B world, or els to teach common minſtrels in euery lane & alley, and to diſpute with them with the beſt reaſon he had, about the harmony & muſike, of the ſongs they ſang in the THEATERS. Now ſome ſay he did this, bicauſe he knew not els how he ſhould driue the time away, for that in dede he was of a baſe mynde, and an effeminate perſon, giuen ouer to all diſhoneſt luſts and deſires. Other are of opiniõ, he did it to be the leſſe regarded, for feare leſt the CORINTHIANS ſhould haue him in gealouzy and ſuſpicion, Imagining that he did take the chaunge and ſtate of his lyfe in grieuous part, and that he ſhould yet looke backe, hoping for a tyme to recouer his ſtate againe: and that for this cauſe he did it, and of purpoſe fained many thinges againſt his nature, ſeeming to be a ſtarke nideotte, to ſee him do thoſe thinges he did. Some notwithſtanding haue gathered together certaine of his anſwers, which doe teſtifie that he did not all C theſe thinges of a baſe brutiſh mynde, but to fitte himſelfe onely to his preſent miſery and miſfortune. For when he came to LEVCADES, an auncient cittie built by the CORINTHIANS, as was alſo the citty of SYRACVSA: he told the inhabitants of the ſame, that he was like to yong boyes that had done a fault. For as they flye from their fathers being aſhamed to come in their ſight, & are gladder to be with their brethrẽ: euẽ ſo is it with me, ſaid he: for it would pleaſe me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTHE our head citty. Another tyme, being at CORINTHE, a ſtranger was very buſie with him, (knowing how familiar Dionyſius was with learned men and Philoſophers, while he raigned in SYRACVSA) and asked him in the ende in deriſion: what benefite he got by Platoes wiſedome and knowledge? he anſwered him againe: how thinkeſt thou, hath it done me no good, whẽ thou ſeeſt me beare ſo paciently this change D of fortune? Ariſtoxenus a muſitian, and other, asking him what offence Plato had done vnto him: he anſwered. That tyrans ſtate is euer vnfortunate, and ſubiect to many euills: but yet no euill in their ſtate was comparable to this. That none of all thoſe they take to be their moſt familiars, dare once tell them truely any thing: and that through their fault, he left Platoes company. Another tyme there commeth a pleaſaunt fellow to him, and thinking to mocke him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he ſhooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come to tyrans, to ſhewe that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Dionyſius encountred him as pleaſantly, ſaying to him: do that whẽ thou goeſt hẽce, to ſe if thou haſt ſtollẽ nothing. And again, Philip King of MACEDON, at his table one day diſcẽding into talke of ſongs, verſe, and tragedies, which Dionyſius his father had made, making as though he wondred at thẽ, how E poſſibly he could haue leiſure to do them: he anſwered him very trimly, and to good purpoſe. He did them euen at ſuch tymes (quod he) as you and I, and all other great Lordes whom they recken happy, are diſpoſed to be drunke, & play the fooles. Now for Plato, he neuer ſaw Dionyſius at CORINTHE. But Diogenes Sinopian, the firſt tyme that euer he met with Dionyſius, ſayd vnto him. O, how vnworthy art thou of this ſtate. Dionyſius ſtayed ſodainely, and replied: Truly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou haſt compaſſion of my miſery. Why ſayd Diogenes againe: Doeſt thou thinke I pitty thee? Nay it ſpiteth me rather to ſee ſuch a ſlaue as thou (worthy to dye in the wicked ſtate of a tyrant like thy father) to lyue in ſuch ſecuritie, and idle lyfe, as thou leadeſt amongſt vs. When I came to compare theſe wordes of Diogenes, with Philiſtus wordes the Hiſtoriographer, bewailing the harde fortune of the daughters of the F LEPTINES, ſaying that they were brought from the toppe of all worldly felicity, honor, and goodes, (whereof tyrannicall ſtate aboundeth) vnto a baſe, priuate, and humble life: me thinkes they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that ſoroweth for the loſſe of her boxes of painting cullers, or for her purple gownes, or for other ſuche prety fine trimmes of golde, as women vſe to weare. So, me thinkes theſe things I haue intermingled concerning Dionyſius, are not impartinent to the deſcription of our liues, neither are they troubleſom nor vnprofitable to the hearers, oneles they haue other haſty buſines to let or trouble them. But now if the tyraunt Dionyſius wretched ſtate ſeeme ſtraunge, Timoleons proſperitie then was no leſſe wonderfull. For within fiftie dayes after he had ſet foote in SICILE, he had the caſtel of SYRACVSA in his poſſeſſion, and ſent Dionyſius as an exile to CORINTHE. This did ſet the CORINTHIANS in ſuche a iollitie, that they ſent him a ſupply of two thouſand footemen, and two hundred horſemen, which were appointed to land in ITALIE, in the countrie of the THVRIANS. And perceyuing that they could not poſſiblie goe from thence into SICILE, bicauſe the CARTHAGINIANS kept the ſeas with a great nauie of ſhippes, and that thereby they were compelled to ſtaye for better oportunitie: in the meane time they beſtowed their leyſure in doing a notable good acte. For the THVRIANS, being in warres at that time with the BRVTIANS, they dyd put their cittie into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bene their owne natiue countrie. Icetes all this while dyd beſiege the caſtell of SYRACVSA, preuenting all he could poſſible, that there ſhould come no corne by ſea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the caſtell: and he had hiered two ſtraunge ſouldiers, which he ſent vnto the cittie of ADRANVS, to kill Timoleon by treaſon, who kept no garde about his perſone, and continued amongeſt the ADRANITANS, miſtruſting nothing in the world, for the truſt and confidence he had in the ſafegard of the god of the ADRANITANS. Theſe ſouldiers being ſent to do this murther, were by chaunce enformed that Timoleon ſhould one day do ſacrifice vnto this god. So apon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, & by litle and litle thruſt in through the preaſe, that they got at the length hard to the aulter. But at the preſent time as one encoraged another to diſpatche the matter, a third perſone they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his ſworde, that he fell to the grounde. The man that had hurte him thus, fled ſtraight vpon it, with his ſworde drawen in his hande, and recouered the toppe of a highe rocke. The other ſouldier that came with him, and that was not hurte, got holde of a corner of the aulter, and beſought pardone of Timoleon, and told him he would diſcouer the treaſon practiſed againſt him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he tolde him howe his companion that was ſlaine, and him ſelfe, were both hiered, and ſent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him alſo that had taken the rocke, who cried out alowde, he had done no more then he ſhould doe: for he had killed him that had ſlaine his owne father before, in the cittie of the LEONTINES. And to iuſtifie this to be true, certaine that ſtoode by dyd affirme, it was ſo in deede. Whereat they wondred greatly to conſider the maruelous working of fortune, howe ſhe doth bring one thing to paſſe by meanes of another, & gathereth all things together, howe farre a ſonder ſoeuer they be, & linketh them together, though they ſeeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no manner of likenes or coniunction betwene them, making the ende of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gaue him that ſlue the ſouldier with his ſworde, a crowne of the value of tenne minas, bicauſe that by meanes of his iuſte anger, he had done good ſeruice to the God that had preſerued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good happe dyd not only ſerue the preſent turne, but was to good purpoſe euer after. For thoſe that ſawe it, were putte in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons perſone, bicauſe he was a holy man, one that loued the goddes, and that was purpoſely ſent to deliuer SICILE from captiuitie. But Icetes hauing miſſed his firſt purpoſe, and ſeeing numbers daylie drawen to Timoleons deuotion: he was mad with him ſelf, that hauing ſo great an armie of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commaundement, he tooke but a fewe of them to ſerue his turne, as if he had bene aſhamed of his facte, and had vſed their frendſhippe by ſtelth. So he ſent hereupon for Mago their generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his requeſt brought an huge army to ſee to, of a hundred and fiftie ſayle, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed three ſcore thouſand men, whom he lodged euery man within the cittie of SYRACVSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which olde men had threatned SICILE with many yeres before, and that continually

A nually: that one day it ſhoud be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the warres the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the countrie of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the cittie of SYRACVSA: and then through Icetes treaſon, who had receyued them, they were ſeene encamped there. On thother ſide, the CORINTHIANS that were within the caſtell, founde them ſelues in great diſtreſſe, bicauſe their vittells waxed ſcant, and the hauen was ſo ſtraightly kept. Moreouer, they were driuen to be armed continually to defend the walles, which the enemies battered, and aſſaulted in ſundry places, with all kyndes of engines of batterie, and ſundry ſortes of deuiſed inſtruments and inuentions to take cities: by reaſon whereof, they were compelled alſo to deuide them ſelues into many companies. Neuertheles, Timoleon without, gaue them all the ayde he could poſſible: ſending them corne
B from CATANA, in litle fiſher botes and ſmall crayers, which got into the caſtell many times, but ſpecially in ſtorme and fowle weather, paſſing by the gallyes of the barbarous people, that laye ſcatteringly one from another, diſperſed abroad by tempeſt, and great billowes of the ſea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to goe take the cittie of CATANA, from whence thoſe of the caſtell of SYRACVSA were vittelled: and taking with them the beſt ſouldiers of all their armie, they departed from SYRACVSA, and ſayled towardes CATANA. Nowe in the meane ſpace, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all thoſe that were within the caſtell, perceyuing the enemies within the cittie kept but ſlender warde: made a ſodaine ſalie out apon them, and taking them vnwares, ſlue a great number at the firſt charge, and draue awaye the other. So by this occaſion he wanne a quarter of the cittie, which they call ACRADINA, C and was the beſt parte of the cittie, that had receyued leaſt hurte. For the cittie of SYRACVSA ſeemeth to be built of many townes ioyned together. So hauing found there great plenty of corne, golde, and ſiluer, he would not forſake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the caſtell: but fortifying with all diligence the compaſſe and precinct of the ſame, and ioyning it vnto the caſtell with certen fortifications he built vp in haſte, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neere vnto CATANA, when a poſt ouertooke them, purpoſely ſent from SYRACVSA vnto them: who brought them newes, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, and returned backe againe with all ſpeede poſſible (hauing failed of their purpoſe they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their handes. Now for that matter, it is yet a queſtion, whether we ſhould impute it vnto
D wiſedome and valliancie, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be aſcribed vnto fortune. And this it is. The two thouſand footemen and two hundred horſemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the cittie of the THVRIANS, partly for feare of the gallyes of the CARTHAGINIANS that laye in wayte for them as they ſhould paſſe, Hanno being their admirall: and partly alſo for that the ſea was very rough and highe many dayes together, and was allwayes in ſtorme and tempeſt: in the ende, they ventured to goe through the countrie of the BRVTIANS. And partly with their good will (but rather by force) they got through, and recouered the cittie of RHEGIO, the ſea being yet maruelous highe and rough. Hanno the admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their paſſage, thought with him ſelfe that he had deuiſed a maruelous fine policie, to deceyue E the enemies. Thereuppon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumphe vpon their heades, and therewithall alſo made them dreſſe vp, and ſet forth his gallyes, with targets, corſelets, and brigantines after the GRÆCIANS facion. So in this brauery he returned backe againe, ſailing towards SYRACVSA, & came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the caſtells ſide of SYRACVSA, with great laughing, and clapping of hands: crying out alowde to them that were in the caſtell, that he had ouerthrowen their ayde which came from CORINTHE, as they thought to paſſe by the coaſt of ITALIE into SICILE, flattering them ſelues, that this dyd muche diſcorage thoſe that were beſieged. But whileſt he ſported thus with his fonde deuiſe, the two thouſand CORINTHIANS being arriued through the countrie of the BRVTIANS in the citie of RHEGIO, perceyuing the coaſte cleare, and that the paſſage by ſea was not kept, & F that the raging ſeas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpoſe calme for them: they tooke ſeas forthwith in ſuch fiſher boates & paſſengers as they found readie, in the which they went into SICILE, in ſuche good ſafety, as they drue their horſe (holding them by the raynes) alon-number in all, were not aboue foure thowſand fighting men. Notwithſtanding, Mago hearing of his comming, quaked for feare, & dowted the more vpon this occaſion. About SYRACVSA are certeyne mariſhes, that receiue great quantitie of ſweete freſh water, aſwell of fountaynes and ſpringes, as alſo of litle ronning brookes, lakes, & riuers, which ronne that wayes towards the ſea: and therefore there are great ſtore of eeles in that place, and the fiſhing is great there at all tymes, but ſpecially for ſuch as delite to take eeles. Whereuppon the GRÆCIANS that tooke paye on both ſides, when they had leyſure, and that all was quiet betwene them, they intended fiſhing. Now, they being all contrey men, and of one language, had no priuate quar- B rell one with an other: but when tyme was to fight, they did their duties, and in tyme of peace alſo frequented familiarly togither, and one ſpake with an other, and ſpecially when they were buſie fiſhing for eeles: ſaying, that they maruelled at the ſcituacion of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they ſtoode ſo pleaſauntly and commodious apon the ſea ſide. So one of the ſouldiers that ſerued vnder the CORINTHIANS, chaunced to ſay vnto them Is it poſſible that you that be GRÆCIANS borne, and haue ſo goodly a citie of your owne, & full of ſo many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vppe vnto theſe barbarous people, the vile CAR-THAGINIANS, and moſt cruell murderers of the worlde? where you ſhould rather wiſhe that there were many SICILIES betwixt them and GREECE. Haue ye ſo litle conſideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue aſſembled an armie out of all AFRICKE, vnto Hercules C pillers, and to the ſea ATLANTICKE, to come hether to fight to ſtabliſh Icetes tyrannie? who, if he had bene a wiſe and skilfull Captaine, would not haue caſt out his aunceſtors & founders, to bringe into his contrye the auncient enemies of the ſame: but might haue receiued ſuch honor and authoritie of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reaſonably haue deſired, and that with all their fauor and good wil. The ſouldiers that heard this tale, reported it agayne in their campe: Inſomuch they made Mago ſuſpect there was treaſon in hand, and ſo ſought ſome culler to be gon. But hereuppon, notwithſtanding that Icetes prayed him all he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were ſtronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuayle by his hardines and good fortune, then exceede him in number of men: Mago forſaketh Sicile vpõ ſuſpect of treaſon. yet he hoyſed ſayle, and returned with ſhame enough into AFRICKE, letting ſlyppe the con- D queſt of all SICILE out of his handes, without any ſight of reaſon or cauſe at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon preſented battell before the citie, when the GRÆCIANS and he vnderſtoode that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they ſaw the hauen ryd of all the ſhippes: and then beganne to ieaſt at Magoes cowardlines, and in deriſion proclaymed in the citie, that they would giue him a good reward that could bringe them newes, whether the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS were fled. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, & woulde not leaue the ſpoyle he had gotten, but defende the quarters of the citie he had poſſeſſed, at the ſwordes poynt, truſting to the ſtrength and ſcituacion of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceyuing that, deuided his armie, and he with one parte thereof did Anapus fl. ſett vpon that ſide which was the hardeſt to approache, and did ſtand vpon the riuer of ANA- E PVS: then he appoynted an other part of his armie to aſſault all at one time, the ſide of ACRA-DINA, whereof Iſias CORINTHIAN had the leading. The thirde parte of his armie that came laſt from CORINTHE, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appoynted to aſſault the quarter called EPIPOLES. Thus, aſſault being giuen on all ſides at one time, Icetes bandes of men Timoleon wynneth the citie of Syracuſa. were broken, and ranne their way. Now that the citie was thus wonne by aſſault, and come ſo ſodaynely to the handes of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled: it is good reaſon we aſcribe it to the valiantnes of the ſouldiers, and the captaines great wiſedom. But where there was not one CORINTHIAN ſlayne, nor hurt in this aſſault: ſure me thinkes herein, it was onely the worke and deede of fortune, that did fauor and protect Timoleon, to contende againſt his vali-antnes. To the ende that thoſe which ſhould hereafter heare of his doings, ſhould haue more F occaſion to wonder at his good happe: then to prayſe and commend his valiantnes. For the fame of this great exployte, did in few dayes not onely ronne through all ITALYE, but alſo through

A through all GREECE. Insomuch as the CORINTHIANS, (who could scant beleeue their men were passed with safetie into SICILE) vnderstoode withall that they were safely arriued there, and had gotten the victorie of their enemies: so prosperous was their iorney, & fortune so spedely did fauor his noble actes. Timoleon hauing now the castell of SYRACVSA in his hands, did not followe Dion. For he spared not the castell for the beawtie and stately building thereof, but auoyding the suspicion that caused Dion first to be accused, and lastly to be slayne: he caused it to be proclaymed by trompett, that any SYRACVSAN whatsoeuer, should come with crowes of iron, and mattocks, to helpe to digge downe and ouerthrow the forte of the tyrans. There was not a man in all the citie of SYRACVSA, but went thither straight, and thought that proclamacion and day to be a most happy beginning, of the recouerie of their libertie. So they did

Timoleon ouerthroweth the castell of Syracusa.

B not onely ouerthrowe the castell, but the pallace also, and the tombes: and generally all that serued in any respect for the memorie of any of the tyrans. And hauing cleared the place in fewe dayes, and made all playne: Timoleon at the sute of the Citizens, made counsell halls, and places of iustice to be built there: and did by this meanes stablish a free state and popular gouernment, and did suppresse all tyrannicall power. Nowe, when he sawe he had wonne a citie that had no inhabitants, which warres before had consumed, and feare of tyrannie had emptied, so as grasse grewe so highe and rancke in the great market place of SYRACVSA, as they grased their horses there, and the horsekeepers laye downe by them on the grasse as they fed: and that all the cities, a fewe excepted, were full of redde deare and wilde bores, so that men geuen to delite in hunting, hauing leysure, might finde game many tymes within the suburbes

The miserable state of Sicile.

C and towne dytches, hard by the walles: and that such as dwelt in castells and stronge holdes in the contrye, would not leaue them, to come and dwell in cities, by reason they were all growen so stowte, and did so hate and detest assemblies of counsell, orations, and order of gouernment, where so many tyrans had reigned. Timoleon thereuppon seeing this desolacion, and also so fewe SYRACVSANS borne that had escaped, thought good, and all his Captaines, to write to the CORINTHIANS, to send people out of GREECE to inhabite the citie of SYRACVSA agayne. For otherwise the contrye would growe barren and vnprofitable, if the grounde were not plowed. Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of AFRICKE: being aduertised that the CARTHAGINIANS had honge vp the body of Mago their generall vpon a crosse (who had slayne himselfe for that he could not aunswere the dishonor layed to his charge) and that

Mago slue himselfe, being called to aunswer his departure out of Sicile.

D they did leauy another great mightie armie, to returne againe the next yere following, to make warres in SICILE. These letters of Timoleon being brought vnto CORINTHE, and the Embassadors of SYRACVSA being arriued with them also, who besought the people to take care and protection ouer their poore citie, and that they would once againe be fownders of the same: the CORINTHIANS did not gredily desire to be Lordes of so goodly and great a citie, but first proclaymed by the trompett in all the assemblies, solemne feastes, and common playes of GREECE, that the CORINTHIANS hauing destroyed the tirannie that was in the citie of SYRACVSA, and driuen out the tyrannes, did call the SYRACVSANS that were fugitiues out of their contrye, home againe, and all other SICILIANS that liked to come and dwell there, to enioy all freedom and libertie, with promise to make iust and equall diuision of the landes a-

E mong them, the one to haue as much as the other. Moreouer they sent out postes and messengers into ASIA, and into all the Ilands where they vnderstoode the banished SYRACVSANS remayned: to perswade and intreat them to come to CORINTHE, and that the CORINTHIANS would giue them shippes, Captaines, and meanes to conduct them safely vnto SYRACVSA, at their owne proper costes and charges. In recompence whereof, the citie of CORINTHE receaued euery mans most noble praise and blessing, aswell for deliuering SICILE in that sorte from the bondage of tyrannes: as also for keeping it out of the handes of the barbarous people, and restored the naturall SYRACVSANS, and SICILIANS, to their home and contrye againe. Neuertheles, such SICILIANS as repayred to CORINTHE apon this proclamacion (them selues being but a small number to inhabite the contrye) besought the CORINTHIANS to

F ioyne to them some other inhabitantes, aswell of CORINTHE it selfe, as out of the rest of GREECE: the which was performed. For they gathered together about tenne thowsand persons, whom they shipped, and sent to SYRACVSA. Where there were already a great number of other comen vnto Timoleon, aswell out of SICILE it self, as out of all ITALIE beside: so that the whole number (as Athanis writeth) came to three score thowsand persons. Amongst them he deuided the whole contrye, and sold them houses of the citie, vnto the value of a thowsand talents. And bicause he would leaue the olde SYRACVSANS able to recouer their owne, and make the poore people by this meanes to haue money in common, to defraye the common charges of the citie, as also their expences in time of warres: the statues or images were solde, and the people by most voyces did condemne them. For they were solemly indited, accused, & arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS did reserue the statue of Gelon, an auncient tyranne of their citie, honoring his memorie, bicause of a great victorie he had wonne of the CARTHAGINIANS, neare the citie of HIMERA: and condemned all the rest to be taken away out of euery corner of the citie, and to be sold. Thus beganne the citie of SYRACVSA to replenishe againe, and by litle and litle to recouer it selfe, many people comming thither from all partes to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to set all other cities at libertie also, and vtterly to roote out all the tyrans of SICILE and to obteyne his purpose, he went to make warres with them at their owne dores. The first he went against, was Icetes: whome he compelled to forsake the league of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promise also that he would rase all the fortresses he kept, and to liue like a priuate man within the citie of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyran of the citie of APOLLONIA, and of many other litle villages thereabouts: when he saw him selfe in daunger to be taken by force, did yeld him selfe. Whereupon Timoleon saued his life, and sent him vnto CORINTHE: thinking it honorable for his contrye, that the other GRÆCIANS should see the tyrans of SICILE in their chiefe citie of fame, liuing meanely and poorely like banished people. When he had brought this to passe, he returned forthwith to SYRACVSA about the establishment of the common weale, assisting Cephalus and Dionysius, two notable men sent from CORINTHE to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to stablishe the goodliest ordinaunces for their common weale. And now in the meane time, bicause the souldiers had a minde to get some thing of their enemies, and to auoyd idlenes: he sent them out abroade to a contrye subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, and Demaratus. Where they made many litle townes rebell against the barbarous people, and did not onely liue in all aboundance of wealth, but they gathered money together also to mainteyne the warres. The CARTHAGINIANS on thother side, while they were busy about the matters, came downe into LILYBEA, with an armie of three score and tenne thowsand men, two hundred gallyes, and a thowsand other shippes and vessells that caried engines of batterie, cartes, vittells, munition, and other necessary prouision for a campe, intending to make sporting warres no more, but at once to driue all the GRÆCIANS againe quite out of SICILE. For in deede it was an able armie to ouercome all the SICILIANS, if they had bene whole of them selues, and not diuided. Now they being aduertised that the SICILIANS had inuaded their contrye, they went towards them in great furie, led by Asdrubal & Amilcar, generalls of the armie. This newes was straight brought to SYRACVSA, and the inhabitants were so striken with feare of the report of their armie: that being a maruelous great number of them within the citie, scant three thowsand of them had the hartes to arme them selues, and to goe to the fielde with Timoleon. Now the straungers that tooke pay, were not aboue foure thowsand in all: & of them, a thowsand of their hartes fayled, and left him in midd way, and returned home againe. Saying, that Timoleon was out of his wittes, and more rashe then his yeares required, to vndertake with fiue thowsand footemen, & a thowsand horse, to goe against three score and tenne thowsand men: and besides, to cary that small force he had to defend him selfe withal, eight great dayes iorney from SYRACVSA. So, that if it chaunced they were compelled to flye, they had no place whether they might retyre them selues vnto with safetie, nor man that woulde take care to burye them, when they were slayne. Neuertheles, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing incoraged those that remayned with him, he made them marche with speede towards the riuer of CRIMESVS, where he vnderstoode he should meete with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpō a litle hil, from whence he might se the campe of the enemies on the other side: by chaunce, certen moyles fell apon his armie, loden with

A with ſmallage. The ſouldiers tooke a conceyt at the firſt apon ſight of it, and thought it was a token of ill lucke: bicauſe it is a maner we vſe, to hange garlands of this erbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vſe to ſpeake, when one lyeth a paſſing in his bed: he lacketh but ſmallage. As much to ſay, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this fooliſh ſuperſtition, & diſcorage they tooke, ſtayed the armie. And when he had vſed certen perſwaſions vnto them, according to the time, his leyſure, and occaſion: he told them that the garland of it ſelfe came to offer them victorie before hand. For, ſayd he, the CORINTHIANS doe crowne them that winne the ISTMIAN games (which are celebrated in their contrye) with garlands of ſmallage. And at that time alſo euen in the ſolemne ISTMIAN games, they vſed the garland of ſmallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this preſent B it is alſo vſed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vſed braunches of pyne apple trees in the ISTMIAN games. Now Timoleon had thus incoraged his men, as you haue heard before: he firſt of all tooke of this ſmallage, and made him ſelfe a garland, & put it on his head. When they ſawe that, the Captaines and all the ſouldiers alſo tooke of the ſame, and made them ſelues the like. The ſoothſayers in like maner at the very ſame time, perceyued two eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a ſnake in her talents, which ſhe pearced through and through, and the other as ſhe flewe, gaue a terrible cry. So they ſhewed them both vnto the ſouldiers, who did then all together with one voyce call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of the ſommer, and towards the later ende of Maye, the ſunne drawing towards the ſolſtyce of the ſommer: when there roſe a great myſt C out of the riuer, that couered all the feilds ouer, ſo as they could not ſee the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruelous confuſed noyſe of mens voyces, as it had come from a great armie, and riſing vp to the toppe of the hil, they layed their targets downe on the grownd to take a litle breathe: and the ſunne hauing drawen and ſucked vp all the moyſt vapours of the myſte vnto the toppe of the hills, the ayer began to be ſo thicke, that the toppes of the mountaynes were all couered ouer with clowdes, and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and fayer, that they might eaſily ſee the riuer of CRIMESVS, and the enemies alſo, how they paſſed it ouer in this ſort. Firſt, they had put their cartes of warre foremoſt, which were very hotly armed and well appoynted. Next vnto them there followed tenne thowſand footemen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they ſeeing a farre of ſo well appoynted, they con- D iectured by their ſtately marche and good order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS them ſelues. After them, diuers other nations followed confuſedly one with an other, and ſo they thronged ouer with great diſorder. There Timoleon conſidering the riuer gaue him oportunity to take them before they were halfe paſt ouer, and to ſet vpon what number he would: after he had ſhewed his men with his finger, how the battel of their enemies was deuided in two partes by meanes of the riuer, ſome of them being already paſſed ouer, & the other to paſſe: He commaunded Demaratus with his horſemen, to geue a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting them ſelues in order of battell. And him ſelfe comming downe the hill alſo with all his footemen into the valley, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two winges of his battell, mingling with them ſome ſtraungers that ſerued vnder him: and placed with him ſelfe in the middeſt, E the SYRACVSANS, with all the choyce & beſt liked ſtraungers. So he taried not long to ioyne, when he ſaw the ſmall good his horſemen did. For he perceyued they could not come to geue a luſty charge apon the battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, bicauſe they were paled in with theſe armed cartes, that ranne here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (onles they would haue put them ſelues in daunger to haue bene vtterly ouerthrowen) and in their returnes to geue venture of charge, by turnes on their enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out alowde to his footemen, to follow him coragiouſly, & to feare nothing. Thoſe that heard his voyce, thought it more then the voyce of a man, whether the furie of his deſire to fight did ſo ſtrayne it beyonde ordinary courſe, or that ſome god (as many thought it then) did ſtretch his voyce to cry out ſo lowde & F ſenſibly. His ſouldiers aunſwered him againe with the like voyce: & prayed him to leade them without lenger delay. Then he made his horſemen vnderſtand, that they ſhould draw on the toneſide from the cartes, and that they ſhould charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flanckes:

and after he did set the formost rancke of his battell, target to target against the enemies, commaunding the trumpets withall to sownd. Thus with great furie he went to gene a charge upon them, who valiantly receyued the first charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corselets, and their heades with fayer murrions of copper, besides the great targetts they had also, which did easily receyue the force of their dartes, and the thrust of the pyke. But when they came to handle their swordes, where agilitie was more requisite then force: a fearfull tempest of thunder, & flashing lightning withall, came from the mountaynes. After that came darke thicke clowdes also (gathered together from the toppe of the hilles) and fell vppon the valley, where the battell was fought, with a maruelous extreame shower of rayne, fierce violent windes, and hayle withall. All this tempest was vpon the GRÆCIANS backes, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindefold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the rayne that came full apon them with the winde, & the lightnings so ofte flashing amongest them, that one vnderstoode not another of them. Which did maruelously trouble them, and specially those that were but freshe water souldiers, by reason of the terrible thunderclapps, and the noyse, the boysterous winde and hayle made vppon their harnes: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreouer, the durt did as much annoye the CARTHAGINIANS, bicause they were not nimble in their armor, but heauely armed as we haue told you: and besides that also, when the playtes of their coates were through wett with water, they did lode and hinder them so muche the more, that they could not fight with any ease. This stoode the GRÆCIANS to great purpose, to throwe them downe the easier. Thus when they were tombling in the durte with their heauy armor, vp they could rise no more. Furthermore, the riuer of CRIMESVS being risen highe through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of people that passed ouer it, did ouerflowe the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was straight all drowned ouer, and filled with many ronning streames, that ranne ouerthwart the feild, without any certen channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compassed all about with these waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the storme that still did beate apon them, and the GRÆCIANS hauing slayne of their men at the first onset, to the number of foure hundred of their choycest men, who made the first fronte of their battell: all the rest of their armie turned their backes immediatly, and fled for life. Insomuch, some of them being followed very neare, were put to the sworde in the middest of the valley: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the middest of the riuer as they passed ouer, were caried downe the streame and drowned, with the swiftnes and violence of the riuer. But the greatest number did thinke by footemanship to recouer the hilles thereabouts, who were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the sworde euery man. They saye, that of tenne thowsande which were slayne in this battell, three thowsande of them were meere naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very sorowfull and greeuous losse to the city. For they were of the noblest, the richest, the lustiest, & valiantest men of all CARTHAGE. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former warres at any tyme before, where there dyed so many of CARTHAGE at one feild and battell, as were slayne at that present tyme. For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the FIBYANS, the SPANYARDS, and the NOMADES, in all their warres: so as when they lost any battell, the losse lighted not on them, but the straungers payed for it. The men of accompt also that were slayne, were easily knowen by their spoyles. For they that spoyled them, stoode not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, bicause they found gold and siluer enoughe. For the battell being wonne, the GRECIANS passed ouer the riuer, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and bagage. And as for the prisoners, the souldiers stole many of them away, and sent them going: but of them that came to short to make common diuision of the spoyle amonge them, they were about fiue thowsand men, and two hundred cartes of warre that were taken besides. Oh, it was a noble sight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuyroned it all about with heapes of spoyles of euery sorte: amongest which there were a thowsand braue corselets guylt, and grauen, with maruelous curious workes, and brought thither with them also tenne thowsand targets. So the conquerours being but a small number, to take the spoyle

Timoleons victorie of the Carthaginians.

A spoile of a multitude that were slaine they filled their purses euen to the toppe. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battel, they set vp a marke or token of their victorie. The Timoleon sent vnto CORINTH, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the faireſt armors that were gotten in the spoyle: bicause he would make his countrie & natiue citie spoken of & commẽded through the world, aboue al the other cities of GREECE. For that at CORINTH only, their chief tẽples were set forth & adorned, not with spoiles of the GREECIANS, nor offerings gotten by spilling the blood of their owne nation & contrie: (which to say truely, are vnpleasant memories) but with the spoiles taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inscriptions witnessing the valliancie & iustice of those also, who by victorie had obteined thẽ. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS & their captaine Timoleon, (hauing deliuered the

B GRECIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had geuen those offerings vnto the gods, to geue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leauing the straungers he had in pay, in the contrie subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoile & destroy it: he retorned with the rest of his army vnto SYRACVSA. Where at his first cõming home, he banished the thowsand souldiers that had forsaken him in his iorney, with expresse charge that they should departe the cittie before sunne sette. So these thowsand cowardly and mutinous souldiers passed ouer into ITALIE, where, vnder promise of the countrie, they were al vnfortunately slayne by the BRVTIANS: such was the iustice of the goddes to paie their iuste reward of their treason. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyranne of CATANA, Icetes (whether it was for the

C enuie they did beare to Timoleons famous dedes, or for that they were affrayde of him) perceiuing tyrannes could looke for no peace at his handes: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they should send another armie and captaine sodainely, if they would not vtterly be driuẽ out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS sent Gisco thither with threescore & tenne saile, who at his first comming tooke a certen number of GRECIAN souldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their seruice: for they neuer gaue thẽ pay vntil that present time, when they thought them to be men inuincible, and the best souldiers of the world. Moreouer, the inhabitantes of the territorie of MESSINA, hauing made a secret conspiracie amongest them selues, did slay foure hundred men that Timoleon had sent vnto them: & in the territories subiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, nere vnto a place they call HIERES, there was another ambush layd for Euthimus LEVCADI-

D AN, so as him self & al his souldiers were cut in peces. Howbeit the losse of thẽ made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were euen those that had forcibly entred the tẽple of Apollo in the cittie of DELPHES, with Philodemus PHOCIAN, & with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their sacriledge. Moreouer, they were lose people & abiectes, that were abhorred of euerie body, who vacabondlike wandred vp & downe the contry of PELOPONNESVS, when Timoleon for lacke of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SICILE, they alwaies ouercame in al battels they fought, whilest they were in his company. But in the ende, when the furie of warres was pacified, Timoleon sending them about some speciall seruice to the ayde of some of his, they were cast away euery man of them: and not all together, but at diuers times. So as it seemed that Goddes iustice, in fauor of Timoleon, did separate them

E from the rest, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked desertes, fearing least good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the euill. And so was the grace & goodwill of the goddes wonderful towards Timoleon, not onely in matters against him, but in those things that prospered well with him. Notwithstanding, the common people of SYRACVSA tooke the ieasting wordes and writings of the tyrans against them, in maruelous euill part. For Mamercus amongest other, thinking well of him selfe, bicause he could make verses & tragedies, hauing in certen battels gotten the better hand of the straungers, which the SYRACVSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offred vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the tẽples of the goddes: he set vp also these cutting verses, in derision of them that were vanquished

F With buckler so pol'd like, as might of sun a value were,
we haue these geodly targets downe, so richly trymmed here, All gorgeously wrought with golde and eke with Iuorie,

These thinges done, Timoleon led his armie before the citie of CALAVRIA, & Icetes there-while entred the cõfines of the SYRACVSANS with a maine army,& caried away a maruelous great ſpoile. And after he had done great hurt, & ſpoiled the contry, he returned backe againe, & came by CALAVRIA, to deſpite Timoleon, knowing wel enough he had at that time but few men about him. Timoleon ſuffered him to paſſe by, but folowed him afterwards with his horſemen & lighteſt armed footemẽ. Icetes vnderſtanding that, paſſed ouer the riuer called DAMYRIAS, & ſo ſtaied on the other ſide as though he would fight, truſting to the ſwift rõning of the riuer, and the height of the bankes on either ſide of the ſame. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fell out maruelouſly amongeſt them ſelues, ſtriuing for honor of this ſeruice, which was cauſe of delaying the battel. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man deſired to lead the vowarde, for honor to begin the charge: ſo as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thruſting another to get before his companion. Wherfore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them ſhould paſſe ouer firſt, & tooke a ring of euery one of them, and caſt them all within the lappe of his cloke: ſo rolling them together, by chaunce he pluckt one at the firſt, wheron was grauen the markes & tokens of a triumph. The young Captaines ſeeing that, gaue a ſhoute of ioy, & without tarying drawing of other lottes, they began euery man to paſſe the riuer as quickly as they could, & to ſet apõ the enemies as ſodainely. But they being not able to abide their force, ranne their wayes, and were faine to caſt their armor away to make more haſt: howbeit there were a thowſand of them lay dead in the feilde. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his armie to the citie of the LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliue there, with his ſonne Eupolemus, and the generall of his horſemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his owne ſouldiers. So Icetes & his ſonne were put to death, like the traitors & tyrannes: and ſo was Euthydemus alſo, who though he was a valliant ſouldier, had no better mercie ſhewed him, then the father & the ſonne, bicauſe they did burden him with certaine iniurious words he ſpake againſt the CORINTHIANS. For they ſay, that when the CORINTHIANS came firſt out of their contrie into SICILE to make wars againſt the tyrannes: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, ſaid amõgeſt other things: that they ſhould not neede to be afraide, if

Thus we ſee, that men do rather ſuffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: & do pardone their enemies, though they reuenge by deds, bicauſe they can do no leſſe. But as for iniurious words, they ſeme to proceed of a deadly hate, & of a cancred malice. Furthermore, whẽ Timoleon was returned againe to SYRACVSA, the SYRACVSANS arrained the wiues of Icetes, and his ſonne, and their daughters: who being arrained, were alſo condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of al the actes Timoleon did, this of al other (in my opinion) was the fowleſt dede: for if he had liſted, he might haue ſaued the poore womẽ from death. But he paſſed not for them, & ſo left them to the wrath of the cittizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tyranne Dionyſius. For it was Icetes that cauſed Arete, the wife of Dion, to be caſt into the ſea, his ſiſter Ariſtomache, and his ſonne that was yet a ſucking child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he wẽt to CATANA againſt Mamercus, who taried him by the riuer of ABOLVS, where Mamercus was ouerthrowen in battel, & aboue two thowſand men ſlaine, the greateſt part wherof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whõ Giſco had ſent for his reliefe. Afterwards he graũted peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpon earneſt ſute made vnto him, with conditiõ, that they ſhould kepe on thother ſide of the riuer of LYCVS, & that it ſhould be lawful for any of thinhabitãts there that would, to come & dwel in the territory of the SYRACVSANS, & to bring away with thẽ their goodes, their wiues & their children: and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould renounce al league, cõfederacy, & alliance with the tyrannes. Wherupon Mamercus hauing no hope of good ſucceſſe in his doings, he would goe into ITALYE to ſtir vp the LVCANIANS againſt Timoleon, and the SYRACVSANS. But they that were in his company, returned backe againe with their gallies in the myd ways: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the cittie of CATANA into the handes of Timoleon, ſo as Mamercus was conſtrained to ſaue him ſelfe, and to flye vnto MESSINA, to Hippon the tyranne thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and beſeged the cittie both by ſea and by lande. Whereat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flye by taking ſhippe, but he was taken ſtarting.

A And the MESSENIANS hauing him in their hands, made all the childrē come from the ſchole to the THEATER, to ſee one of the goodlieſt ſightes that they could deuiſe: to wit, to ſee the tyran puniſhed, who was openly whipped, & afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeld him ſelf vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACVSANS, ſo that Timoleon might not be his accuſer. So he was brought vnto SYRACVSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But ſeeing that the people cryed out, and made a great noyſe, bicauſe they would not heare him, and that there was no likelyhoode they would pardone him: he ranne ouerthwart the THEATER, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vpon one of the degrees whereon they ſate there to ſee the ſportes, thinking to haue daſhed out his braynes, & haue rid him ſelf ſodainely out of his paine. But he was not B happy to die ſo, for he was taken ſtraight being yet aliue, & put to death as theues & murderers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrans out of SICILE, & make an end of all warres there. And wheras he found the whole ile, wilde, ſauage, & hated of the natural contrymen & inhabitants of the ſame, for the extreme calamities & miſeries they ſuffred: he brought it to be ſo ciuil, and ſo much deſired of ſtraungers, that they came farre & neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the contry ſelfe before, were glad to flye and forſake it. For AGRIGENTVM, and GELA, two great cities, did witneſſe this, which after the warres of the ATHENIANS, had bene vtterly forſaken and deſtroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe. The one, by Megellus and Pheriſtus, two Captaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the ile of CEO. And as nere as they could, they gathered againe toge- C ther the firſt auncient Citizens and inhabitants of the ſame: whom Timoleon did not onely aſſure of peace and ſafetie to liue there, to ſettle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them beſides, with all other thinges neceſſary, to his vttermoſt meane and abilitie, for which they loued and honored him as their father and founder. And this his good ſoue & fauor, was common alſo to all other people of SICILE whatſoeuer. So that in all SICILE there was no truce taken in warres, nor lawes eſtabliſhed, nor landes deuided, nor inſtitucion of any policie or gouernment thought good or auayleable, if Timoleons deuiſe had not bene in it, as chiefe director of ſuch matters: which gaue him a ſingular grace to be acceptable to the goddes, and generally to be beloued of al mē. For in thoſe dayes, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did maruelous great thinges: amongeſt whom were theſe, Timotheus, Ageſilaus, Pelopidas, D and Epaminondas, which Epaminondas Timoleon ſought to follow in all thinges, as neare as he could, aboue any of them all. But in all the actions of theſe other great Captaines, their glorie was alway mingled with violence, payne, & labor: ſo as ſome of them haue bene touched with reproche, and other with repentaunce. Whereas contrarywiſe, in all Timoleons doinges (that onely excepted, which he was forced to doe to his brother) there was nothing but they might with trothe (as Timæus ſayd) proclayme the ſaying of Sophocles:

Oh mightie goddes of heauen, vvhat Venus ſtately dame, or Cupid, (god) haue thus vput, their handes vnto this ſame?

And like as Antimachus verſes, and Dionyſius paynting, both COLOPHONIANS, are ful of ſynewes & ſtrength, & yet at this preſent we ſe they are things greatly labored, & trauelled with E much payne: & that contrariwiſe in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verſes, beſides the paſſing workmāſhip & ſingular grace in thē, a man findeth at the firſt ſight, that they were eaſily made, & without great payne. Euen ſo in like manner, whoſoeuer will compare the paynefull bloudy warres & battels of Epaminondas, & Ageſilaus, with the warres of Timoleon, in the which, beſides equitie & iuſtice, there is alſo great eaſe & quietnes: he ſhall finde, waying things indifferently, that they haue not bene fortunes doings ſimply, but that they came of a moſt noble & fortunat corage. Yet he him ſelf doth wiſely impute it vnto his good happe, & fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar frendes at CORINTHE, & in ſome other oratiōs he made to the people of SYRACVSA: he ſpake it many times, that he thanked the almighty gods, that it had pleaſed thē to ſaue & deliuer SICILE from bondage, by his meanes & ſeruice, & to geue F him the honor & dignitie of the name. And hauing builded a temple in his houſe, he did dedicate it vnto fortune, & furthermore did conſecrate his whole houſe vnto her. For he dwelt in a houſe the SYRACVSANS kept for him & gaue him in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done them in the warres, with a maruelous faire pleasaunt house in the contrie also, where he kept most whē he was at leisur. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTHE againe, but sent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer delt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongest the GREECIANS, nether did make him selfe to be enuied of the cittizens: (a mischiefe that most gouernors and captains do fal into, through their vnsatiable desire of honor & authoritie:) but liued al the rest of his life after in SICILE, reioycing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many cities and thowsands of people happy by his meanes. But bicause it is an ordinary matter, and of necessitie, (as Simonides saith) that not only al larkes haue a tuft vpon their heades, but also that in all citties there be accusers, where the people rule: there were two of those at SYRACVSA, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphystius, and the other Demænetus. So this Laphystius appointing Timoleon a certen day to come & aunswere to his accusation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the cittizens began to mutine, & wold not in any case suffer the day of adiornement to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie them, declaring vnto them, that he had taken all the extreame paines & labor he had done, and had passed so many daungers, bicause euery cittizen & inhabitant of SYRACVSA, might franckly vse the libertie of their lawes. And another time Demænetus, in open assembly of the people, reprouing many thinges Timoleon did when he was generall: Timoleon aunswered neuer a word, but onely said vnto the people, that he thanked the goddes they had graunted him the thing he had so oft requested of them in his praiers, which was, that he might once see the SYRACVSANS haue full power and libertie to say what they would. Now Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the noblest actes that euer GREECIAN captaine did in his time, and had aboue deserued the fame and glory of al the noble exploytes, whiche the rethoricians with all their eloquent orations perswaded the GREECIANS vnto, in the open assemblies, and common feastes and plaies of GREECE, out of the which fortune deliuered him safe and sound before the trouble of the ciuill warres that folowed sone after: and moreouer he made a great proofe of his valliancie and knowledge in warres, against the barbarous people and tyrannes, and had shewed him selfe also a iust and merciful man vnto al his frendes, and generally to al the GREECIANS. And furthermore, seeing he wonne the most part of all his victories & triumphes, with out the sheading of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and also ryd all SICILE of all the miseries and calamities raigning at that time, in lesse then eight yeeres space: he beyng nowe growen olde, his sight first beginning a litle to faile him, shortly after he lost it altogether. This happened, not through any cause or occasion of sickneesse that came vnto him, nor that fortune had casually done him that iniurie: but it was in my opinion, a disease inheritable to him by his parētes, which by time came to laie hold on him also. For the voyce wēt, that many of his kin in like case had also lost their sight, which by litle & litle with age, was cleane take from thē. Howbeit Athanis the Historiographer writeth, that during the warres he had against Mamercus & Hippon, as he was in his campe at MYLES, there came a white spott in his eyes, that dimmed his sight somwhat: so that euery man perceiued that he should lose his sight altogether. Notwithstanding that, he did not raise his seige, but continued his enterprise, vntill he tooke both the tyrans at last: & so soone as he returned to SYRACVSA againe, he did put him self out of his office of general, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather bicause things were brought to so good passe, as they them selues could desire. Now, that he paciently tooke this misfortune to be blind altogether, peraduenture men may somewhat maruel at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did so much honor him, & acknowledge the good he had done thē, that they went them selues to visite him oft, and brought straungers (that were trauellers) to his house in the city, & also in the contry, to make them see their benefactor, reioycing and thinking thē selues happy, that he had chosē to end his life with thē, & that for this cause he had despised the glorious retorne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great & happy victories he had wōne in SICILE. But amongest many other thinges the SYRACVSANS did, & ordeyned to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefest: that they made a perpetuall lawe, so oft as they should haue warres agaynst forreyne people, & not agaynst their owne contry men, that

The great honor the Syracusans did Timoleon being blind.

A lawe made to honor Timoleon.

A that they ſhould euer chooſe a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing alſo to ſee how they did honor him in the aſſemblies of their councell. For if any trifling matter fell in queſtion among them, they diſpatched it of them ſelues: but if it were a thing that required great counſaill and aduiſe, they cauſed Timoleon to be ſent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the aſſembly of the people was, and caryed in euen ſo in his litter as he ſate: and then the people dyd all ſalute him with one voyce, and he them in lyke caſe. And after he had pawſed a while to heare the praiſes and bleſſinges the whole aſſembly gaue him, they dyd propounde the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the ſame: which being paſſed by the voyces of the people, his ſeruauntes caryed him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens
B dyd wayte on him a litle way with cryes of ioye, and clapping of handes, and that done, they dyd repayre to diſpatche common cauſes by them ſelues, as they dyd before. So his olde age being thus entertayned with ſuche honour, and with the loue and good wyll of euery man, as of a common father to them al: in the ende a ſickneſſe tooke him by the backe, whereof he dyed. So the SYRACVSANS had a certen tyme appoynted them to prepare for his funeralles, & their neighbours alſo therabouts to come vnto it. By reaſō wherof his funeral was ſo much more honorably performed in al thinges, & ſpecially for that the people apoynted the nobleſt younge gentelmen of the citie to carrie his coffyn vpon their ſhoulders, rychely furniſhed and ſet forth, whereon his body laye, and ſo dyd conuey him through the place, C where the Palyce and Caſtell of the tyranne Dionyſius had been, which then was raſed to the grounde. There accompanied his body alſo, many thowſandes of people, all crowned with garlandes of flowers, and apparreled in their beſt apparell: ſo as it ſeemed it had been the proceſſion of ſome ſolemne feaſt, and all their woordes were praiſinges and bleſſinges of the dead, with teares ronnyng downe their cheekes. which was a good teſtimonie they dyd not this as men that were glad to be diſcharged of the honor they dyd him, neither for that it was ſo ordayned: but for the iuſt ſorowe and griefe they tooke for his death, and for very hartie good loue they dyd beare him. And laſtly, the coffin being put vppon the ſtacke of wod where it ſhould be burnt, Demetrius one of the heralds that had the lowdeſt voyce, proclaymed the decree that was ordeined by the people, the effect whereof was this.
D The people of SYRACVSA hath ordained, that this preſent body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the ſonne of Timodemus, ſhould be buried at the charges of the common weale, vnto the ſumme of two hundred MINAS, & hath honored his memorie with playes and games of muſicke, with ronning of horſes, and with other exerciſes of the bodie, whiche ſhalbe celebrated yeerely on the day of his death for euermore: and this, bicauſe he dyd driue the tyrannes out of SICILE, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and bicauſe he repleniſhed many great cities with inhabitantes againe, which the warres had left deſolate and vnhabited: & laſtly, for that he had reſtored the SICILIANS againe to their libertie, & to liue after their owne lawes. And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the which a certen time after, they builded E certen cloyſters and gallaries to exerciſe the youth in, with exerciſe of their bodyes, and the places ſo walled in, was called Timoleontium: and ſo long as they dyd obſerue the lawes, and ciuill policie he eſtabliſhed amongeſt them, they liued long tyme in great continuall proſperitie.

THE COMPARISON OF Paulus Æmylius with Timoleon.

The cõpariſon of Timoleon and Paulus AEmylius for the warres.

SYthe theſe two men were ſuche as the Hiſtoriographers haue deſcribed them to be: it is certayne, that comparing the one with the other, we ſhall fynde no great oddes nor difference betweene them. For fyrſt of all, the warres they made, haue been agaynſt great and famous enemies: the one againſt the MACEDONIANS, and the other agaynſt the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, whiche he tooke from the ſeuenth kyng that raigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, ſince the tyme of the great Antigonus and the other draue al the tyrannes out of SICILE, and reſtored the whole Ile & Cities therin, vnto their former libertie. Vnles ſome wil alledge perhappes that there was this difference betweene them, that AEmylius fought agaynſt kyng Perſeus, when he had all his power whole and entier, and had fought with the ROMANS many tymes before, and had the better of them in all conflictes: where Timoleon ſet vppon Dionyſius, when he was in greateſt diſpayre, and in maner vtterly caſt away. On the contrarie ſyde, it may be obiected for Timoleon, that he ouercame manie tyrannes, and a myghtie great armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a verie ſmall number of men, and yet men of all ſortes: not as AEmylius with a great armie of well trayned and expert ſouldiers in warres, but with men gathered togeather at aduenture of all ſortes, being mercenarie hierlings, and fighting men for paie, loſe people, and men vnruly in warres, that woulde doo but what they liſted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we muſt confeſſe that the praiſe is due vnto the generall. Bothe the one and the other kept their handes cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it ſeemeth that AEmylius came ſo facioned and prepared, by the good ciuill lawe, and moral diſciplyne of his countrie: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards facioned him ſelfe to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that al the ROMAINS in that time were ſo ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded al other in ſtraight keeping the lawes of their countrie. Where to the cõtrarie, there was not one of the captaines of the GREECIANS that came then, or were ſent into SICILE, but fell ſtraight to corruption, when he had put his foote in SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine ſuſpicion of him, that he aſpired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to ſtabliſhe a certaine Empire at SIRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDAEMON. TIMAEVS the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that the SIRACVSANS ſent Gilippus with ſhame backe againe into his countrie, for his vnſaciable greedy couetouſnes, and for his great theftes, and bribes taken in his charge. Diuers other haue alſo writtẽ the great treaſons & falſehoddes Pharax SPARTAN, & Calippus ATHENIAN did cõmit, both of them ſeeking to make them ſelues lordes of SIRACVSA: and yet what men were they, and what meanes had they to haue ſuche a fooliſhe vaine hope & fancie in their heades? Conſidering

A sidering that the one dyd folowe and serue Dionysius, after that he was driuen out of SIRACVSA: and the other also was but a priuate captaine of a bande of footemen, of those that came in with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was sent, to be generall of the SIRACVSANS, vpon their great instance and sute. And he hauing no neede to seeke or hunte after it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they dyd willingly put into his handes: so soone as he had destroyed and ouerthrowen all suche as woulde vniustly vsurpe the gouernment, he dyd immediately of his owne good wyll, franckly resigne vp his office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thyng to be commended, and estemed in Paulus AEmylius: who hauing conquered so great and riche a realme, he neuer increased his goodes the value of one farthing, nether dyd see nor handle any mony at all, although he was very liberall, and gaue largely vnto others. I The wōderful continencie of AEmylius from bribes.

B meane not in speaking this to vpbrayde or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a fayre house the SIRACVSANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly mannor also in the countrie: for in such

C cases there is no dishonesty in receiuing, but so is it greater honesty to refuse, then to take. But that vertue is most rare and singuler, where we see they will receiue nor take nothing, though they haue iustly deserued it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger & better cōpoūded, which best abideth chaunge of parching heate, and nipping cold: and that the mynde is much more stronger and stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperitie, nor drowpeth for sorowe in aduersitie. Then it appeareth, that AEmylius vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed him selfe of no lesse graue and constant a mynde, in the pacience he endured for his losse and sorowe happened vnto him: (losyng at one tyme in manner, both his children) then he had done before, in al his triumphe and greatest felicitie. VVhere Timoleon to the contrarye, hauing done a worthie act against his brother, could with no reasone suppresse the griefe and sorowe he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentaunce, continued the space of twentie yeeres togeather, and neuer durst once only shewe his face againe in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the common weale. Truely, for a man to beware to doo euil, and to shonne from euil, it is a verie good and comely thyng: so also to be sorie, and a fearde of euerye reproche, and ill opinion of the worlde, it sheweth a simpleneſse of nature, and a good and well disposed minde, but no manly corage.

Not to take giftes, commended for a singuler vertue.

AEmylius Constancie far exceeded Timoleons.

The ende of Timoleons life.

THE LIFE OF Pelopidas.

To be to bold & vēturous is not good.

CAto the elder, aunſwered certaine on a time, that maruelouſly commended a bolde, a venturous, and deſperate man for the warres: that there was great oddes, to eſteeme manhodde ſo muche, and lyfe ſo litle. And ſurely it was wiſely ſpoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue paye to a ſouldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a noughtie ſickly bodye. The king asked him one day, what he ayled to be ſo pale, and euill cullered? The ſouldier told him, he had a ſecret diſeaſe vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The king hearing him ſay ſo, commaunded his Phiſitions and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they ſhould heale him with all poſſible ſpeede: and ſo they dyd. After the ſouldier had his health againe, he would venter no more ſo deſperately in the warres, as he dyd before. Inſomuch, king Antigonus ſelfe perceiuing his ſlacknes, and drawing backe, rebuked him, and ſaid vnto him: that he wondred to ſee ſo great a chaunge and alteration in him. The ſouldier neuer ſhrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainely. Your ſelfe, and it pleaſe your maieſtie, is cauſe of my cowardlynes now, by healing my diſeaſe, that made my life lothſome to me. Much like were a SIBARITANS wordes, towching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS, That it was no maruaill they had ſuch a deſire to die in the warres, ſeeing they did it to ridde them ſelues of their troubles, and moſt miſerable and ſtraight life. But we muſt not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womaniſh men, and altogeather geuen to pleaſure, did ſo thinke: that thoſe men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the deſire they had to doo good, and goodwill they had to doo their duetie. Which was contrarie in the LACEDÆMONIANS. For they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as theſe funerall verſes doo witneſſe.

A And in deede to flye death, is no ſhame, ſo it proceede not of a cowardly hart: nether to deſire death is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reaſon why Homer ſaith, the valliantest men are euer best armed, when they come to battaile. The lawe makers among the GREECIANS, doo euer puniſhe him that caſtes away his target, but neuer him that caſteth away his ſworde or lawnce. For euery man muſt firſt thinke to defende him ſelfe, before he ſeeke to hurt his enimie, and ſpecially ſuch as haue the whole ſtate of a realme in their handes, and be generalles of the feeld. For if the compariſon be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captaine made, that in an armie of men, the light horſeme reſemble the handes, the men of armes the feete, the battaill of footemen the ſtomake & breſt, the captaine, the head of a mans body: it ſeemeth then, that the venturous captaine putting B him ſelfe in daunger with out cauſe, is not onely careles of his owne life, but alſo of all theirs whoſe liues depende vpon his ſaftie. As contrarily, he being carefull of his owne perſon, cannot but be carefull of his ſouldiers that ſerue vnder him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, and a woorthie man otherwiſe, did vnwiſely aunſwere a ſoothſaier that bad him take hede to him ſelfe: for the ſignes and tokens of the ſacrifices did threaten his death. Sparta, ſaid he, ſtandeth not vpon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by ſea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of him ſelfe: but as captaine or lieuetenaunt generall, he had the whole power and force of the armie in his perſon. For he was not a man alone, when ſo manie mens liues were loſt with his. Now olde Antigonus was of a contrary C minde. For he being redie to geue battell by ſea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better aunſwer to one that ſaid vnto him: his enemies had moe ſhippes then him ſelfe. For how many ſhippes doeſt thou recken then my ſelfe, ſaid he? Therein he did wiſely to make great accompt of the worthines of a generall, ſpecially when it is ioyned with hardines, and experience. For the chiefeſt poynte of ſeruice, is to ſaue him, that ſaueth all other. For when Chares on a time ſhewed the ATHENIANS openly, the ſundrie woundes and cuttes he had receiued apō his body, & his target alſo thruſt through with many piks: Timotheus ſtraight ſaid vnto him, Chares, I am not of thy minde. For when I did beſege the citie of SAMOS, I was aſhamed to ſee a darte throwne from the walles, light hard by me, for that I ſhewed my ſelfe a raſhe young man, and more venturous then became a generall of ſo great an armie. For when it ſtandeth much apon the whole armie, and that it is neceſſarie the generall thereof doo put D him ſelfe in daunger: then he ſhould put him ſelfe forwarde, and occupie both handes and body without reſpect, not regarding their wordes that ſay, a good wiſe captaine ſhoulde die for age, or at the leaſt old. But where there is ſmal honor to be woone by very good ſucceſſe, and contrariewiſe muche loſſe and diſtruction by great miſſortune: no man of wiſedome or iudgement would wiſh a generall, to fight as a priuate ſouldier, to hazard the loſſe of a generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas, and of Marcellus, both which were woorthie men, and died otherwiſe then they ſhoulde. For they both were valliant ſouldiers in the fielde, and did both of them honor their contrie with famous victories, and ſpecially againſt great and dreadfull enemies. For the one was the firſt (as they E ſaie) that ouerthrewe Hanniball, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other alſo ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled al GREECE at that time both by ſea and by land. Yet they both careleſly loſt their liues, by venturing to boldely: when their contrie ſtoode in greateſt neede of ſuche men and captaines, as they were. This is the cauſe, why we folowing the reſemblaunce that was betweene them, haue compared their liues together. Pelopidas, the ſonne of Hippoclus, came of one of the nobleſt houſes of the citie of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his landes and goodes, being but a young man. So he ſtraight ſhewed him ſelfe willing to doo good with his monie, to thoſe that needed helpe, and were worthie: to let the worlde ſee, that his monie was not his maiſter. For as Ariſtotle ſaith, of theſe rich men, the moſt part of them do not vſe their goods, for extreame couetouſnes: other againe doo abuſe them, as F being geuen to ouermuche pleaſures. So riche men became ſlaues all their life time, ſome to pleaſure, other to profit. Now, al Pelopidas other frendes woulde be beholding to him, and take very thanckfully his curteſie and liberalitie towardes them. But Epaminondas could neuer be brought to any thing at his handes. Howbeit Pelopidas ſelfe folowed Epaminondas maner A for he tooke a pride and pleaſure to goe ſimply appareled, to fare meanely, to labor willingly, and to make warres openly as he did. He was euen ſuch another, as Euripides the Poet deſcribed Capaneus to be: when he ſaid of him:

He rich and vvelthie vvas, yet vvas he therevvithall, no vvight that purchaſt vvorldly hate, nor inſolent at all.

For he would haue been aſhamed, that the pooreſt man of the cittie of THEBES, ſhoulde haue worne meaner apparell apon his backe, then himſelfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouertie was not daintie to him, bicauſe his parentes were euer poore: and yet for all that he paſſed it ouer more eaſely, by ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he gaue him ſelfe vnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a ſpare life without exceſſe. Where Pelopidas matched B in a noble houſe, and maryed highly, and had two children by his wife: neuertheleſſe he had no minde to keepe or increaſe his goodes the more for that, but gaue him ſelfe altogeather to ſerue the common weale as long as he liued. By reaſon whereof his wealth decaied, and his beſt frendes grewe angrie with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was ſo neceſſarie, as to haue goodes. And he aunſwered them: In dede they are neceſſarie, I doo confeſſe it, but yet for ſuche a one, as this poore, lame, and blynd man that ſtandeth by. They both were a like borne to all vertue, ſauing that Pelopidas tooke moſt pleaſure in exerciſe of his body and ſtrength, and Epaminondas in the exerciſe of his wit and learning. So as the paſtyme eche of them tooke when they were at leaſure, was, that the one delighted to wraſtle, and to hunte, and liked any kinde of exerciſe of his body: and C the other to heare, to ſtudie, and alwaies to learne ſome thing of Philoſophie. But among all the excellent giftes and good partes in either of them, and that moſt wanne them honor and eſtimation in the world, they were onely commended, and ſingulerly noted of wiſe men, for the perfect loue and frendſhippe that was euer inuyolably kept betwene them, vntil their deathes: hauing been ioyned togeather in ſo many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwiſe in matters of ſtate and gouernment. For if a man will conſider, and looke into the doinges of Ariſtides, Themiſtocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of diſſentions, enuies, & ſuſpicions they were one againſt another in gouerning the common weale: and againe will conſider the loue, honour, and kindneſſe, that continued alwaies betwext Pelopidas and Epaminondas: no doubt they will ſaie theſe two are more worthie to be D called brethren in warre, (as they ſaie) and companions in gouernment, then any of them we haue named before, whoſe care and ſtudie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, and the onely cauſe thereof was their vertue. For their actes ſhewed they did not ſeeke glorie, nor riches for them ſelues (the couetouſnes whereof doth allwaies breede quarrelles and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with an other, with a great kindenes and eſtimation of them ſelues, to ſee their contrie floriſhe, and growe to great honor through their ſeruice, and in their time: and ſo they reckoned all the good exployes both of the one and the other, that tended to that ende, as their owne. The moſt part of writers thinke, this great and earneſt loue thone did beare to an other, did growe firſt betwene them, in a iorney they made togeathet vnto MANTINIA, to E ayde the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both ſet in battell raye, one hard by another among the footmen, againſt the Arcadians that ſtoode before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆ-MONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determyning to die rather then to flye, ſtoode cloſe together, and fought with the enemies that came apon them: vntyll ſuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in ſeuen places before, fell downe at the laſt vpon a heape of dead bodies, aſwell of their owne ſouldiers, as of their ene-

The true cauſe of frendshippe.

Ageſipolis, king of the Lacedæmonians.

A point of the battell in happie howre, who ſaued both their liues paſt all hope. Now after this battell, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in wordes and deedes did curteouſly intreate the THEBANS, as their frendes, and confederates. Notwithſtanding, in troth they beganne to feare the power and great corage of that cittie, and ſpecially the faction and aſſociates Iſmenias & Androclidas had ſet vp, whereof Pelopidas alſo was a cõpanion: bicauſe they thought it was populer, and inclined muche to deſire libertie. VVhereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, al three great welthie men of the cittie of THEBES, and miſliking to be equall with other cittizens: did perſwade Phœbidas, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that going and comming through the contrie of BOEOTIA with an armie, he would one day aſſaie to take the caſtell of THEBES called CADMEA, and driuing thoſe out of the cittie that would reſiſt him, he would B put the gouernment of the ſtate into the hands of a fewe of the nobleſt perſones, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & obey them in all thinges. Phœbidas brought it to paſſe, and did worcke his feate before the THEBANS miſtruſted any thing, apon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the caſtell, he apprehended Iſmenias, and ſent him to LACEDÆMON, where ſhortly after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other, ſaued them ſelues by flying, and were baniſhed THEBES by ſounde of Trompet. Epaminondas taried ſtil in THEBES, and no man tutched him, for they made ſmall accompt of him, bicauſe he was altogether geuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had ſerued him to haue done ſome feate, his pouertie made him vnable to doo any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderſtanding of the taking of the caſtel, did ſtraight put C Phœbidas out of his charge, and ſet a fine of a hundred thowſand DRACHMES apon his head: but yet they kept ſtill the caſtell of CADMEA in their handes with a great garriſon. All the other cities and people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they ſhould allowe the fact, and puniſhe notwithſtanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing loſt their auncient libertie, and being made ſubiect by both theſe, Archias, and Leontidas, ſo as all hope was taken from them euer to winde out of this tyrannie, or at any time to ouerthrowe it, ſeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they coulde not poſſibly take from them all the ſeigniorie and dominion they had throughout GREECE, aſwell by ſea as by lande: Leontidas and his followers notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtoode that they who were baniſhed frõ THEBES, were very wel receiued & entertained of the people at ATHENS, D and much made of alſo of the nobilitie, they ſought ſecretly by treaſon to haue them kylled. To do this feate, they ſent certaine men vnknowen vnto ATHENS, who by treaſon ſlue Androclidas, howbeit they miſſed the kylling of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould not receiue ſuche as were baniſhed from THEBES, nor that they ſhoulde fauor them, but driue them out of their cittie, as thoſe which by their allyes were Iuſtly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwithſtanding, being men alwaies ciuilly geuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne and bred vp withall, and very deſyrous beſides to requite the THEBANS curteſy, who had bene the chiefeſt meanes and doers in reſtoring againe the populer ſtate and gouernment at ATHENS: they would by no meanes offer the THEBANS any ſuch iniurie, ſeing they had E ſtabliſhed a lawe and decree, that if any ATHENIAN paſſing to and fro through the contrie of BOEOTIA, did beare armor againſt the thirtie tyrannes, that were gouernors and oppreſſors of the libertie of ATHENS, there ſhould no BOEOTIAN ſeeme to ſee, or knowe any thing therof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger ſort, did procure ſtill euery one that was baniſhed, to ſeeke the libertie of his contrie, and openly made an oration to them all, declaring, that it were not onely a cowardly part, but alſo a wicked offence to the goddes, if they would ſuffer their contrie to remaine ſo in cõtinuall bondage, & ſtraungers to inhabite it with a garriſon, to make them ſubiect to the yoke: and they in the meane time to be contẽted to ſaue thẽ ſelues, to liue delicately and idely at ATHENS, to ſtudie to doe what ſhal pleaſe the ATHENIANS to commaund thẽ, & to be affraide of the orators, & thoſe which through F eloquence can perſwade the common people to doo what they luſt. Therefore he perſwaded them that they ſhould hazard all, being a matter of ſo great weight, and take example of Thraſybulus noble corage and hardynes: who departing from THEBES, did driue out the tyrannes that did oppresse ATHENS: and euen so, we departing from ATHENS, should seeke to deliuer Thebes also from bōdage. When he had by these persuasions drawen them to his opinion, they secretely sent vnto their frendes that remayned still in THEBES, to let them vnderstand their minde and determination: who all lyked very well of their purpose. Insomuche, CHARON that was the chiefest man among them, promised to lende them his house to assemble in. Philidas also founde meanes to be secretarie to Philip and Archias, who were gouerners & captaines of the city at that time for the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other side making no shewe of any thing, had of longe time practised to styrre vp the corage of the younge men of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exercises of bodye, he woulde euer procure them to wrastle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. And after he sawe them reioyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them & tell them they might be ashamed, for lacke of corage, to suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to hold their noses to the gryndstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confederates appointed a day certen, to breake the ise of their pretended enterprise, & agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were banished, shoulde tarie at the village of THRIASIVM, and that they should sende the valliaunteſt and lusteſt young men before, to geue the venter to enter the cittie: adding this therewithall, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise them, all the other of the conspiracie ioyntly togeather, should be ready to geue order, that their fathers, mothers, and children, should lacke nothing necessarie for them. Pelopidas was the first man offered him selfe to vndertake the enterprise: & after him Melon, Damoclidas, & Theopompus, all three, men of the greateſt houses of THEBES, who loued maruelously togeather, and for no respect would euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honor & glory, by striuing who should exceede other in vertue & valliantnes. Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the reſt, sent a foote post before to Charon, to aduertise him of their comming: and they them selues went on their iorney casting litle short clokes apon them, and taking houndes with them, and hunters staues in their handes, bicause their enterprise should not be mistrusted by those that met them on the way, and that they should thinke them hunters vp and downe the feildes for their pleasure. So, whē their messenger they sent came to the cittie, and had tolde Charon that they were comming: he neuer shronke from his worde, though the daunger towarde was great, but like a stowt and honeſt man did abide by his promise he made, and tolde him they should be most hartely welcom to his house. But another man called Hippostheneidas, very honeſt otherwise, & one that loued his contry and the preseruation thereof, and a good frend of those also that were banished: fainting straight apon the sodaine report of these newes, and his minde was troubled, and his hart fayled him so, as his nose fell a bleeding, to thinke apon the greatnes of the instant daunger he was like to fal into, hauing neuer cast before with him selfe, how by this enterprise they shoulde put all the empire of the LACEDÆMONIANS in hazard of vtter destruction, and laye a plat besides to ouerthrowe all their owne common weale and state, by laying al their hope apon a fewe banished men, hardly able to wade through with their enterprise. Whereupon, so sone as he was come home, he secretly dispatched a messenger, one of his familliar frends, vnto Melon & Pelopidas, to will them they should deferre their enterprise for better oportunitie, & so to returne backe again to ATHENS. Chlidon was the man he sent of this message, who presently went home to his house: and taking his horse out of the stable, bad his wife fetche him the brydell quickly. The brydell not being readily to be founde, she told him she had lent it out to one of their neighbours. Then they fell a chiding togeather about it, and at length brake out to fowle wordes, and lastely his wife fell a cursing of him, and prayed the goddes he might haue ill lucke in his iorney, and those that sent him: Chlidon hauing spent the most part of the day, chiding and brawling with his wife about the brydell, and furthermore misliking the tokens of his wiues cursing and banning of him: he determined not to goe a foote out of the dores of that arrant, and so went about some other busines. Thus had this noble enterprise in manner bene altogeather dashed, before it was fully begonne. Now those that were in Pelopidas companie, chaunged apparell with the conttie men, bicause they woulde not be knowen, and did deuide them selues, for that they would not come into the cittie ill

A together, but at diuers gates, beinge day light. At that time it was a meruelous winde and great snowe, and the weather was so boysterous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the conspirators, that they were not knowen when they came into the cittie. So their frendes and confederates within the citie receaued them as they came, and brought them to Charons house: where were assembled together, with those that were banished, eight and forty persones only. Now for the tyrans, thus stoode the matter with them. Philidas their secretary was of the conspiracy, as we haue told you before, and he knewe all the practise. Wherefore he had longe before solemnely bidden Archias and his companie, to supper to his house that verie night, to be mery together, & had promised to entertaine them with women to welcome them with all: of purpose, that when they had in their full cuppes, and were in the middest of all their B pleasure, the conspirators might then vse them as they woulde. So they beinge sette at table, before they were sped of their cuppes, one came to them, and told them truely of the treason (not the particularities, neither as a thinge certaine, but of a rumor onely that ranne abroade in the towne) howe the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas woulde haue passed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would nedes sende one of his garde straight for Charon, to commaunde him to come to him presently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themselues to worke their feate, being armed euery man, and their swords in their hands, when apon a sodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the house runninge straight to the gate, came backe againe afearde to tell them that it was one of Archias garde that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernours. Then were they in doubt that their practise
C was discouered, & that they were all cast away, before they coulde make any proofe of their valiantnes: notwithstanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon should obey the message, & that he should present himselfe before the gouernors, to take away all suspition from them. Charon of him selfe was a stout man, very constant, & resolute in daunger for his owne persone: yet it greued him much at that time, for feare the confederates shoulde suspect him he hadde bewrayed the, if so many honest citizens whom he had lent his house vnto, should vnfortunately miscarie. Therefore before he went out of his house, he went into his wiues chamber to fetch his sonne, that was a goodly boy, but strong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Pelopidas, and prayed him, if he vnderstoode that he had betrayed them any way, or otherwise had sought their hurt, they shoulde then vse his sonne as an enemie, without any compassion towardes him.
D When the cõfederates saw the good zeale & true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weping, and were angrie with him, that he should thinke any of them so faint harted, or timerous, for any daunger coulde come to them, that they shoulde suspect or accuse him for any thinge: and therewith all they prayed him, not to leaue the boye with them, but rather to conuey him into some place out of the tyrans daunger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong & iniurie they had done to them, and to their contrie. Charon aunswered them, he woulde not take him away, & that he saw no life nor health more happy for him, then to dye with his father without infamy, and with so many honest men his frends. So after he had besought the goddes to prosper them, and hadde encouraged and embraced euerie one of the confederators one after an other: He went to the gouernors, and studied by the way so to frame
E his wordes and countenance, as though he shoulde seeme to thinke of any thinge else, then of that he purposed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feast, Archias and Philidas him selfe came vnto him, and asked him: Charon, what are they (sayd they) that are come into the city, and hidden in some house, with certaine citizens that do accompany them? Charon was somewhat abashed at the first, and asked them againe: what men be they? who are they that hides them in the citie? But when he perceiued that Archias coulde tell nothinge of certaintie, then he thought straight that some man hadde informed them that was not priuie to the practise, but hadde hearde some thinge of it. Thereupon he willed them to take heede it was no false alarome, to make them afrayed: neuertheless (sayd he) I will enquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumspect in such a case to be sure. Philidas aunswered him, F he said truely: and so he brought Archias backe againe into the hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, still entertaining the company with hope of the womens comming. Charon returning home againe, found all the cõfederats ready to attẽpt their enterprise, not as men that reckened of their liues,nor that had any hope to preuaile: but as thoſe that were determined to dye valliantly, and to ſell their liues dearly. Now he truely tolde vnto Pelopidas onely, what was ſaid vnto him & the reſt:he told that Archias had ſent for him to ſpeake with him, of other matters. The ſtorme of the former daunger was ſcant blowen ouer, but fortune ſent them an other. For immediatly vppon talke had with Charon at the firſt,came a meſſenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the ſame Archias,written by the Biſhop of ATHENS at that time,called Archias alſo as him ſelfe,& was his old hoſte & frende:wherein he wrote not of ſimple coniecture, nor ſurmiſed ſuſpition,but the plaine conſpiracy in euery degree,as afterwards it fell out. So the meſſenger was brought to Archias that was dronke, and deliueringe him the letter,he ſaid vnto him. Sir,he that ſendeth you this letter,ſtraightly charged me to tel you,that you ſhould preſently read the contents thereof,becauſe it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing ſayd vnto him:waighty matters to morow. So he tooke the letter and put it vp,& then fell againe to his tale he had begonne with Philidas. But euer after, the GREECIANS made this a common prouerbe among them:waighty matters to morrow. Now when the cõſpirators ſpied their time to go about their buſineſſe,they deuided them ſelues in two companies. Pelopidas and Damocli-das went with one company,to ſette vpon Leontidas and Hypates,becauſe they dwelt nere together: Charon and Melon with the reſt,went againſt Archias and Philip, beinge diſguiſed in womens apparell they had put vpon their priuy cotes,& wearing garlands of pyne apple and fyrre trees on their heads,that couered all their faces. So when they came to ſhew them ſelues at the hall dore where the bancket was made,they that were in the hall at the firſt ſight,thinking they had beene the women they looked for, beganne to ſhowte,and made great noyſe for ioye. But when the conſpirators caſt their eyes rounde about the hall to knowe thoſe which were at the table,they drew out their ſwordes,and ſet vppon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table:then they ſhewed them ſelues what they were. Then Phidias bad his gueſtes he hadde bidden to the bancket with them,that they ſhoulde not ſtirre, for they ſhoulde haue no hurt:ſo ſome of them ſate ſtill. But the greateſt nomber of them woulde needes from the borde, to defende their gouernours. Howebeit bicauſe they were ſo dronke that they knewe not what they did,they were ſoone ſlaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterpriſe was not ſo eaſie. For they went againſt Leontidas,that was a ſober diſcrete man,and withall,hardy of his handes:and they found he was gone to bed,his dores were ſhut vp,and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length,one of his men that hearde them rappe ſo hard,with much a do came to open the dore: but he had no ſooner thruſt backe the bolt of the dore,and beganne to open it,but they puſhed it from them with ſuch a force apon him altogether, that they layed him on the grounde, and went ſtraight to his maiſters chamber. Leontidas hearinge the noyſe of them that ranne vppe to him in ſuch haſt,preſently miſtruſted the matter:and leaping out of his bed,tooke his ſworde in his hande, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night, for if they hadde beene out, they might eaſily haue hurt one an other in the darke. But the lampes giuinge cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber dore, and gaue Cephiſodorus, the firſt man that preſſed to enter apon him,ſuch a blowe with his ſword,that he dropped downe dead at his feete. Hauinge ſlaine the firſt man, he dealt with the ſeconde that came after him,and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betwene them two, bothe for that the chamber dore was vetie ſtraight,as alſo for that Cephiſodorus body lying on the ground,did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithſtandinge, Pelopidas ouercame him in the ende, and ſlue him:and went from thence with his companie, ſtraight to Hypates houſe, where they got in, as they did into Leontidas houſe before. But Hypates knewe preſently what it was, and thought to ſaue him ſelfe in his neighbours houſes. Howbeit the conſpirators followed him ſo harde,that they cutte him of before he coulde recouer their houſes. Then they gathered together, and ioyned with Melons company, and ſent immediatly with all poſſible ſpeede to ATHENS, to the baniſhed THEBANS there,& cried through the city,liberty,liberty,arming thoſe citizens that came to them,with the armor & ſpoyles of their enemies,that were hanged vp in common vawtes,& armorers ſhops about Charons houſe, which they brake open, or cauſed to be opened by force. On the other ſide,Epaminondas,and Gorgidas,came to ioyne with them,with a company of young men & honeſt olde men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon, the whole citie

Waighty matters to morrow. Prou. Pelopidas killeth the tyrans.

The liberty of the Thebans reſtored.

A was straight in an vprore & tumult, & euery house was full of lights, one running to an other to know what the matter was. Neuertheles the people did not yet assemble together, but euery one being amazed, musing at this stur, not vnderstāding the troth, staied vntill day came on, that they might call a counsell. But truely herein, me thinkes the Captaines of the garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not sturre betimes, & set vpon thē incontinently: consideringe they were xv. hundred souldiers, besides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after an other to take their partes. But the great noyse they heard, made them afeard, & to see lights in euery mans house, & the people running vp & down the streets in great multitudes to & fro: wherupon they stirred not, but only kept thē within the castel of CADMEA. The next morninge by breake of day, came the other banished THEBANS from ATHENS very B wel armed, & al the people of THEBES drew together in counsail. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas, & his cōsorts, & presented thē before the people, cōpassed about with priests & the professed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, & they praied the assembly of the citizens, that they would help their gods, & their contrie. Al the people that were present, whē they saw them, rose vp, & stoode on their feete, & with great showtes & clapping of hands receiued thē, as their sauiours, that had deliuered their contry frō bondage, & restored them again to liberty: & therupon, before them al, euen in the market place, by the whole voice & consent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon, & Charon, gouernors & captaines of all BOEOTIA. Pelopidas then immediatly made them besiege the castell of CADMEA about, with trenches, & force of wod, doing al he could possible to winne it, & to expulse the LACEDÆMO-
C NIANS, before any supply & aide came to them frō SPARTA. So he did, & preuēted it so sodainly, that the garrison being departed out of the castel by cōposition, as they returned towards LACEDÆMONIA, they found Cleombrotus king of SPARTA in the contry of MEGARA, comming towards thē with a great army to help thē. Afterward, of the three captaines which had charge of their garrison that lay at THEBES, the SPARTANS condēned two of them to death: Hermippidas, & Arcissius, were presently executed: & the third captaine, Dysacoridas, they set so greeuous a fyne on his head, that he wēt out of PELOPONESVS. This enterprise being attēpted, & executed with the like valiantnes, & the same daūger & trouble, that Thrasybulus practise was, whē he deliuered ATHENS from the slauery of the thirty gouernors & tyrans, & hauing the like fortune, & happy ende: the GRÆCIANS termed it cosyn german to Thrasybulus act. And in deede it were a harde D matter to find two other such, besides thē two, that with so few mē ouercame their enemies, being many moe in nōber then thē selues, or that with so small help did ouercome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprise with their only valiantnes & wisedō, & were cause besides of so great blessing & benefit to their contry, as Pelopidas & Thrasybulus attēpt was. But the great chaūge & alteracion of the state afterwards, did make their actes farre more noble & famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maiestie of SPARTA, & that tooke away al the seigniorie & rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS bothe by sea & by land, beganne the very same night, when Pelopidas him self making the twelut person, & entring into a priuate house, (taking nether citie, nor castel, nor stronge hold) to tel truly by figuratiue speach, did breake & cut in sonder the linkes & chaynes that lincked straight together, & strēgthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole E empire & monarchie ouer al GREECE: who vntil that presēt time were thought so strong, as no possibilitie could breake or sonder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning afterwards to inuade the cōtry of BOEOTIA with a mighty army: the ATHENIANS trēbling for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect thē, & renownced the league & alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did straightly prosecute law against those, that were accused to take part with the BOEOTIANS: wherof some of thē were put to death, other were banished from ATHENS, & the rest condēned in great summes of money. To be short, euery man sayd the THEBANS were but vndone, considering they had no help, & were beloued besides of none. At that presēt time it fel out Pelopidas & Gorgidas were generals ouer al BOEOTIA for that yere, who deuising to throw a bone betwixt the ATHENIANS & the LACEDÆMONIANS again, F to make thē square, they vsed this policie. There was a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valliāt mā, but else of smal capacity, & vainly giuē, hauing a certē fond ambitiō & humor, perswading him selfe he had done some notable good seruice in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the city of THESPIES, with a great band of souldiers, to receaue & fauor al the BOEO-

TIANS, that had a minde to reuolte frō the THEBANS. Pelopidas of him ſelfe ſent a marchaunt, (a very frende of his) vnto Sphodrias, with a great ſome of money from him; and certaine perſwaſions withall, which preuailed more then the money, wiſhinge him to attempt ſome greater matter, & to ſeke to winne the hauen of PIRAEA: a thing ſoone wonne, if he came to aſſault it on the ſodaine, & the rather, for that the ATHENIANS miſtruſte nothinge, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might aſſure him ſelfe, nothinge coulde be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, thē to make them lords of the city of ATHENS alſo. And againe, that the THEBANS, being at deadly foode with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betraied & forſake them in their nede, would not aide nor ſuccor thē in any reſpect. Sphodrias giuing to light eare to this vaine perſwaſion, tooke the ſouldiers he had with him, and marching away by night, entred the realme of ATTICA, & wēt on to the city of ELEVSIN: but whē he came thither, his ſouldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpoſe beinge diſcouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raiſed ſuch a warre to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fel out to be of no ſmall importance to them, nor eaſie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS ſought league & amity againe with the THEBANS, & did aide them very louingly: & moreouer, putting them ſelues to ſea, they ſailed vp & downe, procuring & drawing to their league all ſuch, as were willing to rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: & the THEBANS beſides, had many prety ſkirmiſhes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their own cōtry of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was ſuch a great learning & cōtinual training of them in marſhall diſcipline, as the THEBANS ſtil increaſed in corage & valliantnes, & waxed ſtronger & better ſouldiers: for by thoſe skirmiſhes they grewe not onely expert ſouldiers, but waxed more skilfull in vſing their weapons, then before. As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN ſaid one day to king Ageſilaus, cōminge home ſore hurt frō BOEOTIA: ſurely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching thē to be ſouldiours againſt their wils. But to ſay truly, Ageſilaus was not their maiſter to teache thē to make wars, but they were the good & wiſe leaders of the THEBANS, who like good wod mē in chooſing their game, could skilfully chooſe both time & place to giue their enemies battel, & make thē retire again with ſafety, after they had bin fleſhed, giuing thē a litle taſt of the frutes & cōmodity of victory: but among thē, Pelopidas was he that deſerued moſt honor and glory. For, ſince the firſt time they gaue him charge of men of warre, they neuer failed, but choſe him continually euery yeare, either Captaine of the holy bande, or gouernor of BOEOTIA ſo long as he liued: ſo that Pelopidas only did the moſt things in this warre. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowē in ſundry iorneis, that they were diſtreſſed by the cities of PLATEES, & of THESPIES, where Phœbidas himſelfe (that had before taken the caſtell of CADMEA) was ſlaine amongſt other. An other great power of theirs alſo was ouerthrowen nere to the city of TANAGRA, where Panthoidas gouernor of the ſame, was alſo ſlaine. Now all theſe victories, though they much encoraged the hearts of the conquerors, & made thē hardy: yet did they not therby altogether cōquer the mindes of thē vanquiſhed. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not ouercome in any pitched field, nor ſet battel, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, & skirmiſhes properly laid of purpoſe, where ſomtime flying, ſomtime driuing thē againe, they bickered very oft, & put thē to the worſt. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a floriſh & profe to the iourney of LEVCTRES, wan Pelopidas great honor. For he had no cōpaniō to chalēge any part of his glory & victory, neither did he leaue his enemies any lawful excuſe, to ſhadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he ſpied al occaſiō he might poſſible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and had receiued two enſignes of footemen of theirs to kepe it. Pelopidas being aduertiſed one day, that the garriſon of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the contrey of the LOCRIDES, hoping he ſhuld finde ORCHOMENE without garriſon: he marched thither with his holy band, & certaine nūber of horſemē. But whē he drew neere the city, he had intelligēce there was another garriſon cōming frō SPARTA, to ſupply the place of the garriſon that was abroad: wherupō he returned backe againe by the city of TEGYRA, for he could haue paſſed no other way, but to haue turned down by the foote of the moūtaine. For al the valley that lay betwen both, was drowned with the ouerflowing of the riuer of MELAS, which euē frō his very hed carieth euer ſuch bredth with it, as it maketh the mariſhes nauigable, ſo as it is vnpaſſable for any ſhallow it hath. Not far frō theſe mariſhes, ſtādeth the tēple of Apollo TEGYRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left of at this this day, & had neuer long continuance, but only vntill the time of the warres of the MEDES, when Echecrates was maister and chiefe priest there. And some holde opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they cal the next mountaine to it, DELOS, at the foote whereof the marishes of the riuer of MELAS doo end; and behinde the temple are two goodly springes, from whence commeth great aboundance of good sweete water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And some say also, that the goddesse Latona was not brought to bed betwene two trees, but betwene these two springes. For mowntill ROMA is hard by it also, from whence the wilde bore came on a sodaine that slighted her. And the tale that is tolde of the serpent Pytho, and of the gyaunt Tityus, doo both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe ouer manie other coniectures confirming the same, for that we doo not beleue in oure contrie that Apollo is among the nomber of those, who from mortall menne haue bene translated to immortall goddes; as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put of mortalitie, and tooke immortality apon them: but we rather take him for one of those that neuer had beginninge nor generation, at the least if those thinges be to be credited, which so many graue and auncient writers haue left in writing to vs, touching so great and holy things. The THEBANS returning backe from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side returning also from LOCRIDE, both at one time, they fortuned both armies to mete about the citty of TEGYRA. Now, so sone as the THEBANS had discouered the LACEDÆMONIANS passing the straite, one of them ranne sodainely to Pelopidas, and tolde him: Sir, we are fallen into the handes of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, answered Pelopidas againe? with these wordes, he commaunded his horsemen that were in the rereward, to come before, and sett apon them: and him selfe in the meane time put his footemen immediately into a pretie squadron close togeather, being in all, not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he should come to geue charge with his battell, he should make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater nomber. For the LACEDÆMONIANS deuided them selues in two companies, and euery company, as Ephorus writeth, had fiue hundred men: and as Callistenes sayed, seuen hundred. Polybius, and diuers other authors saye, they were nyne hundred men. So, Theopompus and Gargoleon, the Captaynes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, lustely marched agaynst the THEBANS: and it fell out so, that the first charge was geuen, where the chiefe taynes or generalles were of either side, with great furie on eyther parte, so as both the generalls of the LACEDÆMONIANS which set vppon Pelopidas together, were slayne. They being slayne, and all that were about them, being either hurt or killed in the fielde: the rest of the armie were so amased, that they deuided in two, and made a lane on either side, for the THEBANS to passe through them if they would. But when they saw Pelopidas mene not to take the passage they offered him, and that he came on still with his men to set apon those that were yet in battel raye, and slue all them that stoode before him: then they turned tayle, and tooke them to their legges. Howbeit the THEBANS did not chase them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from them, and the new garison besides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was the cause they were contented that they had ouercomed them by force, and had passed through their armie in despite of them, and broken and ouerthrowen them. So when he had set vp markes of triumphe, and spoyled their slayne enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obteyned victorie. For in all the warres the LACEDÆMONIANS euer made, aswell with the GREKIANS, as with the barbarous people also, there was neuer chronicle mencioned at any tyme, that their enemies being so fewe, did ouercome them that were so many, nor that they were ouercome also by any number equall in battell. Whereuppon they grewe so coragious and terrible, that no man durst once abyde them: for their onely fame did so terrifie their enemies that came to fight agaynst them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe asmuche as they had done. But this battell of TEGYRA was the first that made both them and the other GREKIANS knowe, that it was not the ryuer of EVROTAS alone, nor the valley that lyeth betweene the ryuers of GNACION, and of BARYCES, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places else, where they learne young men to be ashamed of dishoneſt and vyle thinges, and to venter their liues for honeſt cauſes, fearing more diſhonorable reproche, then honorable daunger. Theſe are the people moſt to be feared, & are moſt terrible alſo to their enemies. And for the holy bād we mēcioned before, it is ſaide, Gorgidas was the firſt erector of the ſame. They were three hundred choſen men entertained by the ſtate, and they alwaies kept within the caſtell of CADMEA, and the bande was called the townes bande: for at that time, and ſpecially in that part of GREECE, they called the caſtels and great holdes in citties, the townes. Other ſay it was a bande of footemen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Pammenes pleaſaunt wordes are noted, ſaiyng, that Neſtor coulde no skyll to ſet an armie in battell raye, ſeeing he gaue the GREECIANS counſell, in the ILIADES of HOMER, that they ſhould ſet them in battel raye, euery countrie and tribe by them ſelues.

The firſt inſtitution of the holie bande.

That by affections force, and lynkes of kyndly loue:
that one might alwaiſe helpe at hande, that other to behoue.

Men louing together, fight deſperately againſt their enemeis.

For, ſaide he, one frende ſhould rather be ſet by another that loues togeather: bicauſe in daunger, men commonly do litle regarde their contrie men, or ſuche as are of their tribe. But men that doo loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paſſion of loue that entertaineth eche others affection, for affection ſake, dothe kepe them from forſaking one another. And thoſe that are beloued, being aſhamed to doo any vyle or diſhoneſt thing before thoſe that loue them, for very loue will ſticke one by another to the death. And ſure the reaſon is good, if it be true that louers doo in deede more regard them they loue, though they be abſent: then other that be preſent. As appeareth by the example of hym, that being ſtriken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his ſwoorde to kyll him, he praied him he woulde geue him his deathes wounde before, leſt his frende that loued him, ſeeing a wounde on his backe, ſhoulde be aſhamed of him. It is reported alſo, that Iolaus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompanie him in all his labors and quarrels. Whereupon Ariſtotle writeth, that vnto his time, ſuch as loued hartily togeather, became ſworne brethren one to another, apon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this bande was firſt called the holy bande, by the ſelfe ſame reaſon that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine frende by goddes appointment. It is written alſo, that this bande was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowen, before the battel of CHAERONEA: After that battel, Philip taking vewe of the ſlaine bodies, he ſtayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that bande laye all dead on the grounde, one harde by another, and all of them ſlayne and thruſt through with pikes on their breſtes, whereat he wondred muche: and being tolde him that it was the louers bande, he fel a weeping for pittie, ſaying. Wo be to them that thinke theſe men did, or ſuffered any euyll or diſhoneſt thing. And to be ſhort, the miſfortune of Laius, that was ſlaine by his owne brother Oedipus, was not the firſt originall cauſe of this cuſtome, that the THEBANS beganne to be in loue one with an other as the POETS write: but they were their firſt lawmakers, who perceiuing them to be a ſtout & fierce natiō of nature, they ſought euen frō their youthe to make them gentell and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of ſport and earneſt, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, beinge highly eſtemed of them in thoſe dayes. They brought in the vſe alſo to make loue, in the middeſt of all their youthefull ſportes & exerciſes of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a ciuil lyfe. And therfore they had reaſō that gaue the goddeſſe HARMONIA to the THEBANS, for defender and patroneſſe of their cittie, who was begotten (as they ſay) betwene Mars and Venus. For that geueth vs to vnderſtande, that where force and warlike corage is ioyned with grace, to winne and perſwade: all thinges by this vnion and accorde are brought, to a goodly, proffitable, and moſt perfect gouernment. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy bande of the THEBANS. Gorgidas deuiding it in the former ranckes, and placing it all alongeſt the fronte of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to doo of them ſelues, for that he brought them not all into one body: ſo as thereby they might ſee what ſeruice the whole companie coulde doo, being togeather, conſidering that it was deuided and mingled amongeſt manie other, that were a great deale of leſſe value then them ſelues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valliauntnes before, when they fought

A about him of them ſelues, without others by them, at THEGYRA: woulde neuer after deuide nor ſeperat them one frō the other, but keeping them together as one entier body that had al his members, he would alwaies beginne with them to geue a charge, in his moſt daungerous battels. For, as we ſee in running of coches at games, that horſes being tyed all together in a fronte, doo runne faſter and ſtronger, then they doo when they are loſe, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many togeather doo breake through the ayer better, but for that the contention and enuy betweene them to outronne one another doth in dede ſet their hartes and ſtomakes a fyre. Euen ſo he thought, that valliaunt men geuing one another a deſire and enuie to doo well, ſhoulde haue the more corage, and woulde be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers ſight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwardes being B at peace and leagne with all the other GREECIANS, proclaymed open warres againſt the THEBANS onely: and kyng Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an army of tenne thowſande footemen, and a thowſande horſemen. Wherupon, the THEBANS were not only in the like daunger they ſtoode in before to loſe their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would vtterly deſtroy them for euer: ſo that all the contrie of BOEOTIA ſtoode in greater feare, then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his houſe to goe to the warres, his wife bringing him out of the doores to take her leaue of him, weeping, ſhe praied him hartely to looke well to him ſelfe. But he aunſwered her againe: my good wife, it is for priuate ſouldiers to be carefull of them ſelues, but not for captaines, for they muſt haue an eye to ſaue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he C founde the captaines and the Lieuetenantes of the armie, in ſundrie opinions: and he was the firſt that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it beſt they ſhoulde geue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither gouernor of BOEOTIA, nor generall of the armie, but onely captaine of the holy bande: notwithſtanding they had great affiance in him, & gaue him great authoritie in coūſaile concerning their affaiers: ſuch as became a man that had made ſo good teſtimonie of his naturall loue & affection to his contrie, as he had done. Now, being determined in counſaile that they ſhoulde geue the enemie battell, they all muſtred together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a viſion in his dreame, that troubled him verie muche. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedaſius, whiche by reaſon of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were D buried there, after they had bene defyled and rauiſhed, by certaine gueſtes of the SPARTANS that laye in their houſe, trauayling that way. This act being ſo horrible and wicked, the poore father of theſe defiled virgines, coulde neither haue iuſtice, nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had bande and curſed the LACEDÆMONIANS with moſt horrible and execrable raylinges and curſes as might be poſſible, he kylled him ſelfe vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many ſundrie oracles, prophecies & ſignes of the goddes to warne them, to take heede of the wrathe of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euerie man vnderſtoode not the ſignification of this prophecie, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a litle towne in the contrie of LACONIA, ſtanding apon the ſea, called LEVCTRVM: and in ARCADIA alſo by E the cittie of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the ſame name. This miſfortune chaunced longe before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his tente, thought he ſawe in a viſion the daughters of Scedaſius weeping about their graues, and curſing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that he ſawe their father alſo, commaunding him to ſacrifice a red mayden to his daughters, if they woulde obtaine the victorie. This commaundement at the firſt, ſeemed verie cruel and wicked: whereuppon when he roſe, he went to the Prognoſticators and generalles of the armie, and tolde them his dreame. So, ſome of them ſaide, this was no matter to be lightly paſſed ouer, but to be conſidered of, alledging manie examples in the like caſes. As of Menecius the ſonne of Creon in olde time, and of Macaria the daughter of Hercules. And yet of later memorie, the wife Phereclydes, whome the F LACEDÆMONIANS ſlue, and whoſe ſkynne their kynges doo keepe at this daye, by commaundement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecie of the goddes, did as it were ſacrifice him ſelfe, for the ſafetie of GREECE. And furthermore, the younge boyes which Themistocles did sacrifice to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating rawe flesh) before the battell of Salamina. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the goddes, as the victories following did plainely shewe it. In contrarie manner also king Agesilaus, comming from those very places, from whence king Agamemnon came in the time of the warres of Troia, and going also against the same enemies: dreamed one night in the cittie of AVLIDE, he sawe the goddesse Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes perfourme it: and thereupon was compelled to breake of his iorney, before he had executed his enterprise, and departed with small honor. Other to the contrarie stoode to it stowtely, and saide it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abhominable, and brutish a sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the goddes, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the ayre, nor gyants that rule the world, but the one onely mightie & eternal, God, father of gods, & men. And, to beleue that either goddes or demy goddes doo delite in murder, or sheading of mans blood, it is a meere mockery and folly. But, admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that haue no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirite, when they haue suche damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide styll with them. Now, the generalles and heads of the armie of the THEBANS being of sondry opinions, & Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a young mare colte, or fyllie, breaking by chaunce from other mares ronning and flynging through the campe, came to staye right against them. Then euery man beganne to looke apon her, and to marke what a faire fyllie it was, and red colored euery where, and what a pride she tooke with her selfe to heare her owne neying. Theocritus then the soothesayer being amongest them, did beholde her, and knew straight what the fyllie ment, and so cried out foorthwith: O happie Pelopidas, loe here is the sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgine for thy sacrifice, but take this that God him selfe doth send thee. When Theocritus had saide so, they tooke the fyllie, and laide her apon the tombe of Scedasus dawghters, and put garlandes of flowers about her, as they handled other sacrifices: and then after their praiers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great ioye, and told Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all the campe, and the sacrifice they had made also according to the signification thereof. Moreouer, when they came to ioyne battell, Epaminondas being generall, drew all his army on the left hande, bicause he woulde bring the right winge of the enemies army (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GREECIANS their frendes and allyes, that were set in the other wing of their battell: that he comming with his whole power together to geue a charge vppon Cleombrotus their king (being in a corner by him selfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowen. The enemies fynding Pelopidas intent, beganne to chaunge their order, and hauing meane nowe, ment to thruste out their ryght winge at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But, Pelopidas in the meane time sodainely preuented them, and ronning with great furie with his squadron of three hundred men, he set apon Cleombrotus before he coulde disorder his men to put furth the right winge, and ioyne them together againe. And so he founde the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet setled in their rankes, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in anothers place to put them selues againe in order: notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the only captaines and most expert souldiers in marshall discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no sodaine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, coulde either trouble or disorder them. For they were men so trained, that they could turne head or side vpon any sodaine occasion offered, and coulde fight and order them selues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to geue thonset apon them alone, with the whole force of his battaile togeather, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidas also with an incredible corage and readines, presenting him selfe in battell before them, did put them into such a terrible feare, that they cleane forgotte their skill in fightinge, and their wonted courage fayled them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and their were moe LACEDAEMONIANS slaine that day then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither gouernor of BOEOTIA, nor general of all the army, but onely captaine of the holy band: did notwithstanding winne as muche honor and glorie of this victorie, as Epaminondas, that was

A was gouernor of Boeotia, and generall of all the armie. In dede afterwardes they were both gouernors of Boeotia together, when they inuaded the contrey of Peloponnesvs: where they made moſt parte of the cities & people rebell againſt the Lacedæmonians, and take their parte. As the Elians, the Argives, and all Arcadia, and the beſt parte of Laconia ſelfe, notwithſtandinge it was in the hart of winter, and in the ſhorteſt dayes of the yeare, and towardes the latter ende alſo of the laſt moneth of their yeares authority and rule, hauing not many dayes to cõtinew in office, being forced to leaue their authority, apon paine of death if they did refuſe, vnto other officers new choſen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, & gouernors alſo of the contrie of Boeotia, what for feare to incurre the daunger of the lawe, as alſo to auoyde the trouble to lye in campe in the B ſharpeſt of winter: they did vrge and perſwade them to bring the armie backe againe into their contrie. But Pelopidas was the firſt that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other Thebans alſo to conſent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to geue aſſault to the city ſelfe of Sparta. So, through their perſwaſion they paſſed ouer the riuer of Evrotas, and tooke many litle townes of the Lacedaemonians, & waſted & deſtroyed all the contrie to the ſea ſide, leading vnder their enſignes an armie of threeſcore and ten thowſande fightinge men, and all Greecians, the Thebans not making vp the twelut parte of them. Now, the honor and great reputacion of theſe two perſones, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their frendes and confederates, that they followed them, without any reſolution of counſell or publike order, and neuer opened their mouthes againſt them, but willingly marched vnder their C conduction. And in my opinion, truely me thinkes it is the firſt and chiefeſt point in the lawe of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himſelfe, ſhould leane to one that is ſtrong, and able to defende bothe. Euen much like to freſhe water ſouldiers, and rawe ſea men, that lying at ſea in calme weather, & in ſafe harber, are as luſty & bragge with the maſters & boteſwaines as may be: and let a litle ſtorme of weather come apon them ſodainely, and that they be in any daunger, then they looke on the maſters, hoping for no life but at their handes. And euen in like maner the Elians and Argives, who though in all aſſemblies of counſel they woulde euer iarre and ſtriue with the Thebans, for honor and ſuperioritie in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherin they ſaw there was daunger, then their pecockes brauerie was gone, and they were glad to obey their generalles commaundement. In this D iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of Arcadia to be in league with them, and tooke all the contrie of Messenia from the Lacedaemonians, which they peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the auncient inhabitantes of the ſame, and reſtored them to their contrie, and repleniſhed the citie of Ithome: Then returninge afterwardes into their contrie by the citie of Cenchrees, they ouerthrew the Athenians that came to trouble them, in entringe into the ſtraight of Peloponnesvs, ſuppoſinge to haue ſtopped their paſſage. Thus was the valliantnes of theſe two worthy men greatly commended and honored of euery body, for ſo many notable exployts & victories as they had wonne, and their maruelous good ſucceſſe greatly wondered at. But as their glory and renowne increaſed abroade, ſo did their contrie mens malice and enuie encreaſe againſt them at home: who had E prepared ſuch a welcome home for them, as was to bad and vile for ſo honorable ſeruice as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas bothe, at their returne, were accuſed of treaſon. For there was a ſpeciall law at Thebes, that commaũded all ſuch as ſhould happen to be gouernors of Boeotia, to reſigne their office immediatly to the new officers elect, at the beginning of the firſt moneth of the yeare, which in Boeotia they call Bovcation: and they had kept it foure whole moneths aboue their tearme appointed, in which time they had done all that we haue ſpokẽ of before, as well in the prouince of Messenia & of Arcadia, as alſo in the contrie of Laconia. Pelopidas was the firſt of the two that was called in by proceſſe, therfore he ſtoode in the greater daũger: howbeit in the end, they were both diſcharged again. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his accuſatiõ & the attempt of his enemies (wherby they ſought to F haue caſt them both away) quietly enough: Iudging, that pacience to thoſe that deale in ſtate and gouernment, is a great ſhew of force & magnanimitie. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more chollericke, and ſet on beſides by ſome of his friendes, did take this occaſion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of those that came into Charons house with Pelopidas, and Melon, but notwithstandinge the THEBANS did nothing honor him, as they did the rest. He taking this ill at their handes, being maruelous eloquent of speeche, but vitiously geuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and mischieuous nature: did fondly abuse his eloquence, falsely accusinge those that were his betters, in honesty and credit. And not beinge contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernor of BOEOTIA, which he sued for: and moreouer he was euer against him in all matters of state he tooke in hande. But he coulde neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he sought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all spitefull persones, when they can not be thought so honest men as those whome they enuie: to go about to proue that they are not so honest and meete men, as those whome they preferre and commende. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble actes and victories, and specially that victory aboue other, which the THEBANS wanne before the iorney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmish of horsemen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauinge charge of the same: of the which he woulde leaue this memory. Androcydes a CYZICENIAN and painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to painte them some other battell in a table, and he did drawe this worke in the citie selfe of THEBES: but as he was in hand with all, the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out against the LACEDAEMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereuppon the painter forsooke THEBES, leauinge his worke in manner done and perfitte. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they woulde hange it vp in some temple or publicke place with an inscription apon it, sayinge thus. This was Charons victorie, of purpose to deface and obscure the glorie of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. To vaine and fond was his ambition, to set before so many noble battells and victories, one simple ouerthrowe of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest gentlemen of all SPARTA was slayne, and forty other with him: & this was all he did. Pelopidas misliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the lawes of THEBES, which did expresly forbid that no priuate person should be honored with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof should be attributed to all the people generally. In dede Pelopidas in all his orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstandinge, he made open proofe, howe Meneclidas was an enuious and spitefull detractor, and a naughty wicked man, oftentimes askinge the THEBANS, if they themselues were worthy of no honor? so as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in a great summe of money. But he finding him selfe vnable to pay it, beinge so great a summe: practised afterwardes to alter the whole state and gouernment. I thought good to dilate this at large, bicause me thinkes it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature, and maners, what they were. Now about that time, Alexander, the tyran of PHERES, was at open warres with many people of THESSALIE, and did vse all policie he coulde, to bringe them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free cities sent their Ambassadors vnto THEBES, to pray them to send them a captaine, with an armie to aide them. Then Pelopidas seeinge Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himselfe to the THESSALIAN Ambassadors, beinge lothe to drowne his experience and sufficiency in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idlenes, knowing that in those partes where Epaminondas lay, there neded no other captaine. Now when he came with his armie into THESSALIE the citie of LARISSA yelded presently vnto him: where the tyran Alexander came to mete with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempted to bring it to passe, seeking in steade of a tyran, to make him a gentle, iust, and lawefull gouernor of THESSALIE. But when he saw no perswasions could take place with the tyran, and that he grewe more stubborne and vntractable, and woulde not heare reason: and moreouer that he heard many greuous complaintes of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a maruelous dissolute and vnruly person in all his doinges, and extreamely couetous besides: then he beganne to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyran thereupon stole away secretely from him, and fled with his gard and souldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauinge the THESSALIANS out of all feare and daunger of the tyran, and furthermore in good peace and amity one with the other,

A ther, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomy made warre at that time with Alexander, beinge kinge of MACEDON, they bothe hauing ſent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and alſo to helpe him that had the right, againſt him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them bothe, and reſtored the baniſhed men of either ſide, to their landes and goodes againe. For aſſurance of the peace, he tooke the kinges brother in oſtage, whoſe name was Philip, and thirtie other children of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GREECIANS ſee, that the reputacion of the THEBANS power ſtretched farre, & the renowne alſo of their manner of gouernment and iuſtice. It is the ſame Philip, that made warre afterwardes with the GREECIANS, to take their libertie frō them: howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THE-

B BES in Pammenes houſe. And this is the cauſe, why ſome thought Philip did followe Epaminondas manner: and it might be paraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which in deede was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continency, iuſtice, magnanimitie, and clemencie, which were the ſpeciall pointes that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip coulde neither by nature, education, nor ſtudie euer attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS hauinge ſent afterwardes to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the tyran of PHERES, that did againe moleſt and trouble the free cities of THESSALIE: Pelopidas was ſent thither Ambaſſador with Iſmenias, carying no power with him frō THEBES, litle thinking he ſhoulde haue needed to haue made warres: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the contrie ſelfe, vppon the inſtant neceſſitie offered. At the very ſame time alſo, all MACEDON

C was vp in armes. For Ptolomy had ſlaine the king, and vſurped the kingdom, and the ſeruaunts and frendes of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for aide: who deſiring to come euen vppon the fact, and hauing brought no men of warre out of his owne contrie with him, did preſently leauie certaine men where he was, and ſo marched forward with them againſt Ptolomy. Nowe Ptolomy when bothe their powers met, did corrupt the ſouldiers Pelopidas had brought with money, to take his parte. But notwithſtandinge this policy he had practiſed, yet he was afeard of the name onely, and greatnes of Pelopidas reputacion: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man than him ſelfe, and making maruelous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promiſe, and bounde it by othe, that he would keepe the realme for the brethren of the dead king, and that he woulde take all thoſe for his frendes or enemies, whom the THEBANS

D did either loue or hate. And for aſſurance of his promiſe, he gaue him his ſonne Philoxenus in oſtage, and fifty other of his frendes, all the which Pelopidas ſent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, beinge maruelouſly offended with the treaſon of the ſouldiers againſt him, vnderſtandinge that the moſt parte of their goodes, their wiues and children, were in the citie of PHARSALE, he thought if he coulde winne that, it were a maruelous good way for him to be reuenged of the trechery of the ſouldiers againſt him: whereupon he leauied certaine THESSALIANS, & went to that citie. Pelopidas was no ſooner come thither, but Alexander the tyran arriued alſo with his armie. Pelopidas ſuppoſing he had come to iuſtifie him ſelfe, clearing the complaintes of the THESSALIANS made againſt him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delited in murder and ſheading of blood. Neuertheles, he ho-

E ped he durſt not haue attempted any thing againſt him, for the authority and ſeigniories ſake of THEBES, by whom he was ſent thither, as alſo for his owne reputacion. But the tyran ſeeing him ſlenderly accompanied, and without traine of ſouldiers: tooke him priſoner, and wanne the city of PHARSALE at that preſent time. But this act of his put his ſubiects in a great feare, who ſeeing him commit ſo ſhamefull a deede againſt all equity, did thinke ſtraighe he ment to ſpare no man, but would vſe men, and all thinges elſe that came in his handes, like a deſperate man, & one that reckned him ſelf caſt away. But when the THEBANS vnderſtoode this newes, they were maruelous ſorie, and ſtraight ſent an army thither appointinge other Captaines then Epaminondas, bicauſe then they had ſome miſliking of him. Alexander the tyran hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did ſuffer any man that woulde, at the firſt to

F come and ſee him, and ſpeake with him: ſuppoſinge his impriſonment had killed his hart, and had made him very humble. But when he was tolde the contrary, how Pelopidas did comforte the citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, tellinge them the power was now come that the tyran ſhould ſmarte for al the miſchiefes he had done: and that he ſent him word to his face, he had no reaſon to hang and put his poore citizens daily to death as he did, with ſundry kindes of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him, & did let him alone, knowinge that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyran wondering at this great ſtomake of his, & at his maruelous conſtancy fearing nothing: asked what he ment to long for haſty death? Pelopidas beinge tolde what he ſayd, aunſwered him againe: Mary, ſayd he, bicauſe thow ſhouldeſt dye the ſooner, beinge more odious to the goddes and men, then yet thou art. After this anſwere, the tyran would neuer ſuffer any man to come and ſpeake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyran Iaſon deceaſed, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyran, hearinge reporte of Pelopidas noble minde and corage by his keepers: ſhe hadde a meruelous deſire to ſee him, and to ſpeake with him. But when ſhe came to ſee him, like a woman ſhe could not at the firſt diſcerne the greatneſſe of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, findinge him in ſuch miſery: yet conieꝯturinge by exterior ſhow, notinge his ſimple apparell, his heares and beard growen very long, & how poorely he was ſerued, and worſe entertained: ſhe thought with her ſelfe his caſe was to be pitied, and that he was in no ſtate mete for the glory of his name, wherewith ſhe fell a weepinge for compaſſion. Pelopidas that knewe not what ſhe was, beganne to muſe at the firſt: but when it was tolde him ſhe was Iaſons daughter, then he curteouſly ſaluted her for her father Iaſons ſake, who while he liued was his very good frend. So Thebe ſaid vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, I pittie thy poore Lady & wife. Truely ſo do I pitty thee, quod Pelopidas againe to her: that thou beinge no priſoner, canſt abide ſuch a wicked Alexander. This aunſwere tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impacience did beare the cruelty, violence, and villany of the tyran her husband: that beſides all other infamous actes of his deteſtable life, committed Sodomy with her youngeſt brother. So ſhe oft viſitinge Pelopidas, and boldly makinge her mone to him, telling him cloſely all the iniuries her husbande offered her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle ſhe grew to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in heart againſt him, deſiring reuenge of him. But now the Captaines of the THEBANS that were ſent to deliuer Pelopidas, beinge entred into THESSALIE with their armie: (whether it was through default of ignorance, or their mishap) they returned home with ſhame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANS at their returne home, condemned them euerie man in the ſumme of tenne thouſande Drachmes, & ſent Epaminondas thither againe with an other armie: at whoſe comming, all THESSALIE roſe incontinently, for the reputation of ſo great a captaine. And his fortune was ſo good, that he had in a manner vtterly ouerthrowen all the whole ſtate of the tyran: his frends and captaines were ſo much afraid, and his ſubiectes on the other ſide ſo well diſpoſed to rebell, and maruelous glad for the hope they had, quickely to ſee the tyran haue his deſerued hyer, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithſtanding, Epaminondas preferring the deliuerie and ſafety of Pelopidas, before the conſideration of his owne honor & glorie, and fearinge leaſt Alexander ſeeinge him ſelfe in daunger to be turned out of all he had, falling in deſpayre like a bedlem beaſt, woulde bende all his deſperation and fury againſt Pelopidas: he drew theſe warres out in length, compaſſinge him rounde about, but not fiercely ſetting apon him, with culler to prepare his way the better by delaying ſtill, thereby to ſofter the cruell minde of this tyran, goinge on in this gentle ſorte, and partely to cutte his combe and extreme pride, but ſpecially to preſerue Pelopidas, from the daunger and crueltie of his beaſtly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruel man, and one that neither regarded reaſon, nor iuſtice in any ſorte, conſideringe howe he made ſome man to be buried aliue, and others to be put in the skinnes of beares and wilde bores, and then to ſet houndes apon them to teare them in peeces, or elſe him ſelfe for his paſtime would kill them, with ſhootinge or throwinge of dartes at them. And in the cities of MELIBAEA and of SCOTVSA, bothe of them beinge in league and frendſhippe with him, he ſpying a time one day when the citizens were aſſembled in counſaill together, ſodainely compaſſed them in with his gard and ſouldiers, and put them euery one to the ſword, euen to the litle children. And he conſecrated the darte also wherwith he had ſlaine his owne vncle Polyphron, and hauing put garlandes apon it, he did ſacrifice to it, as to a god, and called it TYCHON, as one woulde ſay, happy killer. And an other time being in Thebe the wife of Alexander the tyran.

Epaminondas ſent into Theſſalie with an army.

The bruiſhe cruelty of Alexander the tyran.

A in a Theater, where the tragedy of Troades of Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and ſent word to the players notwithſtandinge, that they ſhoulde go on with their playe, as if he had bene ſtill amonge them: ſaying, that he came not away for any miſliking he had of them or of the play, but bicauſe he was aſhamed his people ſhoulde ſee him weepe, to ſee the miſeries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer ſaw him pity the death of any one man, of ſo many of his citizens as he had cauſed to be ſlaine. The gilty conſcience therefore of this cruell and heathen tyran, did make him tremble at the only name and reputacion of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe ſayth:

He lett his vvinges dovvne fall, not much vnlike the cocke, vvhich doth refuſe the pit preparde, and lyſt not bide the shocke.

B So he ſent ſtraight vnto Epaminondas to excuſe him ſelfe. But Epaminondas woulde in no wiſe ſuffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with ſuch an hell hounde: only he yelded to abſtinēce of armes for thirty daies, apon deliuery of Pelopidas & Iſmenias into his handes, with whom he ſtraight returned vnto THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertiſed that the LACEDÆMONIANS & the ATHENIANS did ſende Ambaſſadors to Artaxerxes the mighty king of PERSIA, to make league with him: they ſent to him Pelopidas for them alſo, being wiſely conſidered of them to ſende a man of ſuch fame and reputacion. For Pelopidas paſſing firſt through contries ſubiect to the kinge of PERSIA, his fame was ſuch where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the reporte of the famous battells he had wonne of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not only caried into the next regions and contries of ASIA:

Epaminondas deliuered Pelopidas out of priſon.
Artaxerxes king of Perſia.
Pelopidas ſent Ambaſſador to the king of Perſia.

C but ſince the firſt newes of the iourney of LEVCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas hauinge after that wonne victorie apon victorie, his eſtimacion grewe ſo great, as it was blowen abroade through the worlde, euen to the higheſt and furtheſt partes of the Eaſt contries. And when he came to the king of PERSIAES court, the princes, great Lordes, and captaines of PERSIA that ſawe him, had him in great admiration, ſayinge: loe this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their ſeigniorie, and authority from them, bothe by ſea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS beyond the riuer of EVROTAS, and from mount TAVGETVM, who not longe before made warres with the great kinge of PERSIA, beinge ledde vnder their kinge Ageſilaus, euen to the middeſt of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes ſelfe was very glad of his comminge, and praiſed him aboue them all,

Pelopidas greatly honored of the king of Perſia.

D and made his eſtimacion greater then it was before, by his great and honorable entertaininge of him, meaninge thereby to returne the honor to him ſelfe againe: bicauſe menne ſhoulde thinke that the moſt famous men of the worlde came to honor him, and to ſee his court, as eſteeminge bothe him, and his greatneſſe, the onely happines of the worlde. But when he had ſeene his face, and heard him ſpeake, and perceiued that his wordes were much grauer then the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was further in loue with him then before, and without diſguiſing he did honor and fauor him aboue all the other Ambaſſadors, who found that he made more eſtimacion of him, then of thē all. Notwithſtanding, he ſeemed to beare greater good will vnto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, then to any other of the GREECIANS: for that one day beinge at the table, he tooke a garlande of flowers from his

E owne head, and waſhed it in perfuming water, and ſent it vnto him. In dede he did not vſe Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he ſend him the goodlieſt and richeſt preſentes he could deuiſe, & graunted him beſides al his requeſtes he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of GREECE ſhould be free: that the city & contrie of MESSINA, ſhould be inhabited againe: & that the citizens of THEBES by their ſucceſſors ſhould be takē, as ancient frends & allyes of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had receaued theſe aunſwers, he returned home againe, & would by no meanes accept any of the great preſents the king had offred him: which cauſed the other Ambaſſadors of the GREECIANS to be ſo ill welcome home to their cities. For among other, Timagoras was accuſed to the ATHENIANS, & condemned to dye, and was executed: which if they did in reſpect of the great preſents he had taken of the kinge, truely

Pelopidas refuſed the great gifies of the kinge Artaxerxes.
Timagoras Ambaſſador for the Athenians, put to death for taking great gifies of the kinge of Perſia.

F they had reaſon, & it was worthily done of thē. For he tooke not only gold & ſiluer enough, as much as they would giue him: but receaued a very rich bed alſo, & PERSIAN chamberlains to make and dreſſe it vp, as if no GREECIAN ſeruauntes of his could haue ſerued that turne.

Moreouer he receaued foure ſcore milche kine to the paile,& neateheards to keepe them,ha- A uing neede of cowes milke belike,to heale a diſeaſe that fell vpon him:and woulde needes be caried in a litter apon mens armes from the kings court,vnto the MEDITERRANIAN ſea,the king rewarding them for their paines that caried him, with foure Talents. Yet it ſeemeth the gifts he tooke did not offende the ATHENIANS ſo much,conſidering that Epicrates(a drudge or tanckerd bearer) did not onely confeſſe before the people,howe he had taken giftes of the king of PERSIA:but ſayd furthermore,that he would haue a law made,that as they did yerely chooſe nine officers to rule the whole city:ſo that they would chooſe nine of the pooreſt and meaneſt citizens,and ſende them Ambaſſadors vnto the king of PERSIA, that they might returne home rich men with his giftes. The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they demaunded:not conſidering that Pelopi- B the other could make,and ſpecially to a Prince that ſought alwaies to enterteine thoſe GRÆcreaſe euery mans loue and good will vnto Pelopidas, bicauſe of the repleniſhinge againe of MESSINA with inhabitants,& the infrancheſing & ſetting at liberty of all the other GREECI-ANS.But the tyran Alexander of PHERES,returning againe to his old accuſtomed cruelty,and hauing deſtroied many cities of THESSALIE,& placed his garriſons through al the contry of the PHTHIOTES,ACHAIANS, and MAGNESIANS:the cities being aduertiſed of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES,they ſent Ambaſſadors immediatly to THEBES,to pray thē to ſende thē an army,& namely Pelopidas for Captaine,to deliuer thē frō the miſerable bondage of the C tyran.The THEBANS willingly graunted them,& put all things in readines very ſodainely.But Pelopidas being ready to ſet forward in his iorney,there fel a ſodain eclipſe of the ſunne,ſo as at none daies it was very darke in THEBES.Pelopidas ſeing euery man afraid of this eclipſe aboue, he would not compell the people to depart with this feare,nor with ſo ill hope to hazard the loſſe of ſeuen thowſande THEBANS,being all billed to go this iorney:but notwithſtanding,he put him ſelfe alone into the THESSALIANS handes,with three hundred horſemen of ſtraun-gers,that were glad to ſerue with him,with whom he tooke his iorney againſt the ſoothſayers mindes,and againſt the good will of all his citizens,who thought this eclipſe did threaten the death of ſome great perſone like him ſelfe.But Pelopidas though he needed no ſpurre to be reuenged apon the tyran Alexander,being by nature hotte, and deſirous of him ſelfe to reuenge D the ſpite and villany he had offred him:yet he had a further hope to finde the tyrans houſe de-uided againſt himſelfe,by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe,in time of his impriſon-ment there. Neuertheles,the fame and reputacion of the iorney vndertaken,did wonderfully increaſe his noble corage,and the rather,bicauſe he was deſirous(all he coulde)the GREECIhyerlings tooke pay of the tyran Alexander of PHERES, in whoſe honor they had ſet vp a ſta-tue of braſſe in their city, as vnto their ſauior:the THEBANS only at the ſelfe ſame time tooke armes againſt thē,to deliuer thoſe whom the tyrans oppreſſed,& ſought to roote out al tyrannical gouernment ouer the GREECIANS.So, when he came to the city of PHARSALE,& had E

A forcible to clime them vp, being very high and ſteepe. But Alexander comming downe the hil, gaue charge apon them to their diſaduantage, & ſlue the firſt that gaue the attempt to get vp againſt the hil: and the reſidue beinge ſore hurt, retyred againe without their purpoſe. Pelopidas ſeeing that, ſounded the retreate for the horſemen that followed the chaſe, to repayre to the ſtandard, and commaunded them they ſhould ſet apon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell raye: and him ſelfe ranne to helpe thoſe that fought to winne the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and paſſing through the rereward, got to the formeſt ranckes: to whome, the ſight of his perſone did ſo redouble their force and corage, that the enemies them ſelues thought it hadde beene a freſhe ſupply of newe mens hartes and other bodies, then theirs with whom they hadde fought before, that came thus luſtely to ſette againe apon
B them. And yet they did abide two or three onſettes. Howebeit in the ende, perceiuing thoſe men did ſtill more fiercely force to gette vp the hill, and moreouer how their horſemen were come in from the chaſe: they gaue way, and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauinge wonne the hilles, ſtayed on the top of them, viewinge the army of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waued vp and downe in great diſorder. And there he looked all about, to ſee if he coulde ſpye out Alexander: and at the length he founde him out amongeſt others, in the right winge of his battell, ſettinge his men againe in order, and incoraging of them. After he had ſet eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his hart ſo roſe againſt him apon ſight of him, that geuinge place to wrath, he neither regarded his perſone, nor the intent of his iorney, but runninge farre before his men, he cried C with a lowde voyce to the tyran, and chalenged the combat of him. The tyran woulde not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid him ſelfe amongeſt his ſouldiers. But for his ſouldiers, the firſt that thought to ſet apon Pelopidas, were ſlaine by him, and many left dead in the fielde. The reſidue ſtanding ſtowtly to it, and cloſe together, did paſſe his curaces through with their long pykes, and thruſt him into the breſt. The THESSALIANS ſeeinge him thus ſore handled and diſtreſſed, for pities ſake came runninge from the toppe of thoſe hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But euen as they came, he fell downe deade before them. Then did they together with their horſemen ſo fiercely ſette apon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flye: and followinge them in chaſe a great waye from that place, they couered the valley with deade bodies, for they ſlue aboue three D thowſande men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauilie, and lamented bitterly: callinge him their father, their ſauiour, and maiſter, as one that hadde taught them the worthieſt thinges that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other frendes and confederates alſo of the citie of THEBES, beſides their excedinge in ſetting out their common proclamations and edictes in prayſe of his memorie, and doing him all the honor that could be due to the moſt rare and excellent perſone that euer was: they did yet more ſhewe their loue and affection towardes him, by their paſſinge great ſorowe and mourning they made for him. For it is ſayed, that they that were at the battell, did not put of their armor, nor vnbridle their horſes, nor woulde dreſſe their woundes, hearinge tell of his death: before they went firſt and ſawe his body not yet colde with fightinge, laying E great heapes of the enemies ſpoyles about it, as if he coulde haue tolde what they had done, nor before they hadde clipped of their owne heares, and the heare of their horſes, in token of ſorowe. And many of them alſo, when they were come into their tentes and pauilions, woulde neither haue fier, eate, nor drinke: and all the campe was full of ſorowe and mourninge, as if they hadde not wonne a notable victorie, but hadde beene ouerthrowen and made ſubiect by the tyranne. Afterwardes when the newes of his deathe was ſpread through all the contrie, the Magiſtrates of euerie cittie through which Pelopidas bodie was conueyed, went to receaue it verie honorablie, accompanied with all the younge menne, Prieſtes, and children, caryinge tokens and crownes of triumphe, and other ornamentes of golde. And when his funerall daye came, that his bodie ſhoulde be caried to be bu-
F ried, the oldeſt and nobleſt perſones of the THESSALIANS went to the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might haue the buryinge of him: and one amonge them beinge the mowthe of the reſte, ſpake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lordes of THEBES, Pelopidas ſlaine.

The great lamentacion & mourning for Pelopidas death.

The oration of the Thessaliās to the Thebans.

our good beloued frendes, and confederates, we onely craue this good turne at your handes, wherin you shal much honor vs,& in our great calamity somwhat also cōfort vs. For we shall neuer more accōpany Pelopidas aliue,nor requite his honorable deserts to vs,that he shal euer know them.But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our handes,and that we may bury him,and set forth his obsequies: we will imagine then at the least that you doe thinke that, which we our selues do certainly beleue:that we THESSALIANS,not you THEBANS,haue receiued the greatest losse of both.For you haue lost in deede a worthy Captaine, and we haue not only receaued that like losse with you,but the hope also of recoueringe of our liberty.For how dare we againe sende to you for an other Captaine, when we can not redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their peticion,graunted their desire:and in mine opinion, no funeralles could be done with greater pompe and honor,then the THESSALIANS performed his:being men that recken not dignity,magnificence, & pompe, to consist in ornaments of Iuory, nor of purple. As Philistus doth set it out, who praiseth to the moone the buryinge of Dionysius the tyran of SYRACVSA,which was the ende of his tyranny,as a sumptuous conclusion of a stately tragedy.And Alexander the great,at the death of Ephestion,did not only clippe his horse heares & mules,but plucked downe also the battellments of the wals of the city: because it shoulde appeare,that the very walles them selues did mourne for his death,shewinge that deformitie,in steede of their former beawtie. But all such thinges are done only by force and compulsion, apon the Lordes commaundementes, which doe but raise vp enuy against their memorie for whom they are done,and hatred of them that are against their willes constrained to do the thing they misliked:& are no iust proofes of honor nor good will,but rather vaine showes of barbarous pompe, and pride in him, that disposeth his authority and plenty of goodes,in trifling toyes not to be desired.Where contrariwise it plainely appeareth,that a priuate man dying in a foreine contry,by reason should be accompted most happy of all other creatures,that hauing neither his wife,kinne,nor his children by him,he should be conueyed to his funerals, accompanied with such multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one an other who should most honor the funerals,as being vnrequested,& least of all compelled. For saith Esope, the death of a happy man is not greuous, but most blessed, seeing it bringeth all good mens doinges to happines,and leaueth fortune to her fickle chaunge,and sportinge pleasure. But in my iudgement, a LACEDÆMONIAN spake better, when he sayd to Diagoras an old man,that had him selfe in old time gotten victory in the games Olympicall,& had sene besides,his own childrē,& his childrens childrē (both sonnes & daughters)crowned with victories also in the self same games:O Diagoras,die presently,els thou shalt neuer come to heauen.But these victories of the Olympicall & Pythian games,whosoeuer should put thē al together,are not to be cōpared with one of the battels only,that Pelopidas hath foughten & wonne:hauing spent the most parte of his time in great calling and dignity,& lastly ended the same,beinge gouernor of BOEOTIA the third time(which was the higheste office of state in all his contry)when he had distroied the tyrans that kept the THEBANS in bondage,and was also slaine himselfe,valiantly fighting for the recouery of the THESSALIANS liberty.But as Pelopidas death was greuous to the THEBANS frends & confederats: so fell it out very profitable for them.For the THEBANS hearinge of Pelopidas death,did not delay reuenge,but sent an army forthwith of seuen thowsande footemen, and seuen hundred horsemen, vnder the conduct of Malcitas,and of Diogiton.They findinge Alexanders army ouerthrowen,& that he had lost the most parte of his strength,did compel him to geue vp the THESSALIANS townes he kept by force against thē,& to set the MAGNESIANS, the PHTHIOTES, & the ACHAIANS at liberty, withdrawinge his garrisons he had placed in their strong holdes:and therewithall to sweare, that from thence forth he would marche vnder the THEBANS,against any enemy they should leade him,or commaunde him to go against.So,the THEBANS were pacified apon these conditions.Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him soone after for Pelopidas death,who(as we haue tolde you before)had pretily instructed Thebe his wife,that she shoulde not feare the outward appearance nor power of his tyranny,although she were enuironed with souldiers of baniſhed mē,whom the tyran enterteined to gard his person.Her self on the other side,fearing his falshode,as also hating his cruelty,conspired her husbands death with her three brethren,

Alexander the tyran of Pheres slaine by his wife.

Tisiphonus,

A Tisiphonus, Pytholaus, & Lycophron, & executed her cõspiracy after this sorte. The tyrans palice where he lay, was straightly garded euery where with souldiers, who nightly watched his persone: but their bed chamber which they cõmonly vsed to lie in, was in the top of al his palice, where they kept a dog tyed at the chamber dore, to giue warninge, which was a terrible dog, and knewe none but the tyran and his wife, and his keeper that gaue him meate. Nowe when Thebe purposed to worke her feate, she locked vp her three brethren a whole day neere vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, she went her selfe alone according to her maner, into Alexanders chamber: and finding him a sleepe, she stale out straight againe, and bad the keeper of the dogge to cary the dogge away, for her husbande was disposed to take rest, and would haue no noyse. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by B a ladder, which she let downe: and fearing least her brethren should make a noyse, she had couered the ladder staues with wolle before she let it fall downe. When she had gotten them vp with their swordes, and had set them before the dore, she went first her selfe into the chamber, & tooke away the tyrans sword that hong at his beds head, and shewed it them, as a token geuen them that he was a sleepe. When it came to the pinche to do the deede, these young men were afrayed, and their heartes beganne to faile them. But she tooke on with them and called them cowardly boyes, that would not stande to it, when it came to the point, & with all, sware in her rage, that she woulde goe wake the tyran, and open all the treason to him. So partely for shame, and partely for feare, she compelled them to come in, and to step to the bed, her selfe holding a lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feete, and C bounde them hard: an other caught him by the heare of his head, and pulled him backewards: & the third thrust him through with his sword. So by chaunce he dyed sooner then he should haue done, and otherwise then his wicked life deserued, for the maner of his death. So Alexander was the first tyran that was euer slaine by the treason of his wife, whose body was most villanously & dispitefully vsed after his death. For when the townes men of PHERES had drawen him through the city in myer and durt, they cast him out at length to the dogs to deuoure.

Alexander the tyran of Pheres was the first tyran that was slaine by his wife.

The ende of Pelopidas life.

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

Marcellus kinred.

Marcellus condicions.

Arcus Claudius that was fiue times Conſull at Rome, was the ſonne (as they ſay) of an other Marcus: and as Poſidonius wryteth, he was the firſt of his houſe ſurnamed Marcellus, as who would ſay, a marſhall & warlike man by nature. For he was cunninge at weapons, skilfull in warres, ſtronge and luſty of body, hardy, and naturally geuen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor ſhewed his great corage, but in warres againſt the enemy: otherwiſe he was euer gentle, and fayer condicioned. He loued learning, and delited in the Greeke tongue, and much eſteemed them that could ſpeake it. For, he him ſelfe was ſo troubled in matters of ſtate, that he could not ſtudy and follow it, as he deſired to haue done. For if God (as Homer ſayth) did euer make men

To vſe their youth in vvarres, and battells fierce and fell, till crooked age came creeping on, ſuch feates for to expell:

The Romaines troubled with warres.

They were the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of Rome at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the Carthaginians in Sicile: in their midle age, againſt the Gavles, to kepe them from the winning of all Italie: & againe in their old age, againſt Hannibal & the Carthaginians. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be diſpenced with, in the ſeruice of their warres, as it was elſe for common citizens: but they were bothe for their nobilitie, as alſo for their valliantnes and experience in warres, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them, by the Senate & people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battell could make him giue grounde, beinge practiſed in all fightes: but yet he was more valliant in priuate combate man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refuſed enemie that did chalenge him, but ſlue all thoſe in the fielde that called him to the combat. In Sicile he ſaued his brother Octacilius life, being ouerthrowen in a skirmiſhe: for with his ſhielde he couered his brothers body, & ſlue them that came to kill him. Theſe valliant partes of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the generalles vnder whom he ſerued, with many crownes, and warlike honors, vſually beſtowed apon valliant ſouldiers. Marcellus increaſing ſtill his valliantnes and good ſeruice, was by the people choſen Ædilis, as of the number of thoſe that were the worthieſt

Marcellus ſaued his brother Octacilius.

Marcellus choſen AEdilis and Augure.

A worthieſt men,and moſt honorable: and the Prieſtes did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Prieſthoode at ROME, hauing aithority by law,to conſider and obſerue the flying of birds, to diuine and prognoſticate thinges thereupon. But in the yere of his office of Ædile, he was forced againſt his wil to accuſe Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he being a raſh, and diſſolute man of life, fell in diſhoneſt loue with his colleagues ſonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who beinge a goodly younge gentleman, and newly come to mans ſtate, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhoode and good qualities, as any way for his beawty and perſonage. The firſt time Capitolinus moued this diſhoneſty to him, he did of him ſelfe repulſe his ſhameles offer, without any others priuitie: but when he ſaw he came againe to tempt him the ſeconde time, he ſtraight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his fa-
B ther beinge maruelouſly offended withall, (as he had good cauſe) went and accuſed Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the firſt, layed in many exceptions and fained excuſes, to kepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to aunſwere the matter before the Senate, and denied ſtarkly that he attempted euer any ſuch thinge, bicauſe there were no witneſſes to proue it againſt him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to ſende for young Marcellus, who comminge before them, bothe bluſhed, and wept together. The Senate ſeeinge ſhamefaſtneſſe in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that coulde not be pacified without ſeeking other proofe: they tooke it a cleare caſe, & ſo condemned Capitolinus preſently in a great ſumme of money, which Mar- C cellus conuerted into ſiluer veſſell, to ſerue at ſacrifices, and ſo did conſecrate them to the ſeruice of the goddes. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their firſt warre againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the ſpace of two and twenty yeares: Immediatly after that, they beganne a newe warre againſt the GAVLES. For the INSVBRIANS, beinge a people deriued frō the GAVLES, & dwelling at the foote of the moūtaines of the ALPES on ITALIE ſide, being able to make a good power of them ſelues, did notwithſtanding pray aide of the o-D ther GAVLES inhabiting on the other ſide of the mountaines: & they cauſed the GESSATES, a mercenary people and hierlings to them that woulde giue pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truely me thinkes it was a maruelous matter, and wonderfull good happe for the ROMAINES, that this warre of the GAVLES came not apon thē, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES alſo had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purpoſely ſworne to ſet apon the conquerors) expecting ſtill an end betwene thē, & then to ſet apon the cōquerors, when they had nothing to ſay to any other. Yet the ſcituacion of their cōtry did trouble the ROMAINES much, bicauſe they were ſo nere neighbours vnto them, & had warres as it were at their owne dores. And ſo did the auncient reputacion of the GAVLES ſomewhat appawle the ROMAINES, who as it ſhoulde ſeeme they did feare more, then any o-E ther nation whatſoeuer: bicauſe ROME had bene taken before by the GAVLES. Since which time, a law was made, that Prieſtes and eccleſiaſticall perſones ſhould be diſpenced with, from going to the warres, onles the GAVLES did riſe againſt them. The preparacion they made for this warre at that time, did plainly ſhow the feare they had thē of the GAVLES. For the world thinkes, that neuer before, nor ſince, there were ſo many naturall ROMAINES aſſembled toge-
F ther in fielde, as were then at that preſent. Moreouer, the new come cruelty they vſed in their ſacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before, they neuer vſed any ſtraunge maner in their ſacrifice, or barbarous facion, but were fauorable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, & agreeable to the GREECIANS, touching the ſeruice of the goddes. But then, they were compelled to obey certaine oracles, and auncient prophecies they found wrytten in SIBYLLES bookes: & they buried two GREECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man & a woman, and likewiſe two GAVLES, a man and a woman. Vnto them they doe yet continew certaine ſecret anniuerſaries in Nouēber, that are not to be ſene of euery body. The ROMAINES in their firſt battels of this warre, were often ouercommen, and did ouercome: but theſe battels were to litle purpoſe, for ending of the warres. In the yere that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Conſuls, and ſent with great armies to make warres apon the INSVBRIANS, people ſubiect to the ſtate of MILANE: newes were brought to ROME, that there was a riuer ſeene in the cõtry of ROMANIA, red as blood, & three moones also at the very same time in the city of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priestes & Soothsayers, that had obserued & considered the tokens, & significations of birdes on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls: they tolde plainly there was error in their election, & that they were directly chosen against all signes & tokens of the birdes. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the campe to them, & willed them to come home to depose themselues of their Consulshippe, before they did attempt any thing as Consuls against the enemies. The Consul Flaminius receaued the letters in time but bicause he was ready to giue battell, he woulde not open them, before he had first ouerthrowen his enemies, & spoyled their contrie, as in dede he did. But when he was come backe to ROME againe, and had brought marueious great spoyles with him, the people for all that woulde not goe out to meete him, bicause he did not presently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned apon it as they commaunded him, but contemptuously, without any regard of their displeasure, followed his owne phantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honor of triumphe. For his triumphe was no sooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Consulship, and made him a priuate man with his companion. The ROMAINES therein were so religiously bent, as they would all things shoulde be referred vnto the gods good grace & pleasure, & would suffer none to contemne the obseruations & prognosticatinge of the soothsayers, nor their auncient vses & customes, for any prosperity & felicity that could happen. For they thought it more necessary and profitable for benefit of the common weale, that the Senate and magistrates should reuerence the ceremonies and seruice of the goddes: then that they should ouercome their enemies in battell. As for example Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honored and esteemed of the ROMAINES for his iustice and valliantnes, as any other of his time: beinge one yeare Consul, did nominate & elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, & Caius Martius. These two being entred into their Consulship, and sent from ROME also to their seuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chaunce tooke certen litle bookes in his hande, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publike sacrifice, and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinaunce he neuer heard before. And this it was. That if a magistrate were set in any tent or hyred house without the citie, to beholde and obserue the prognostications of birdes, & that vpon any sodaine occasion he were driuẽ to come againe into the citie, before the birdes had giuen any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to ende his obseruations, there was no remedy, but he must leaue his tent or first hyred house, and take an other, and beginne new obseruations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignoraunt of this ordinaunce before, had kept his obseruations twise in one selfe house, and had chosen there, Nasica and Martius, Consulls to succeede him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it: who would not let slippe so litle a fault: but wrote to the newe Consulls, and they straight left their prouinces, and returned againe to ROME, willingly resigninge vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Againe also, about the very present time we write of nowe, there were two Priestes of noble houses (and noble persones also) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cethegus, bothe which were disgraded of their Priesthoode, bicause they had not giuen the intrayles of the sacrificed beast in order, as they should haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was disgraded of his Bishopricke, bicause his miter which the FLAMINES doe weare, fell of his head in his sacrificing. Minutius being Dictator also, and hauinge chosen Caius Flaminius generall of the horsemen: bicause they heard the noyse of a ratte at the electiõ of Flaminius, they were bothe put out of their authoritie, and other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise euen in trifles, it was not by reason of any superstition mingled with their religion: but bicause they woulde not breake any iotte of the auncient institucions and ceremonies of their contrie. But to our storie againe. Flaminius beinge depriued of his Consullshippe, Marcellus was created Consull in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being inuested in his office, chose Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the GAVLES beinge inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME also willinge to harken to peace, Marcellus did stirre vp the people, and made them rather desire warre. Notwithstandinge, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the wars againe.

For

A For there came ouer the mountaines of the ALPES, a thirty thowſand of them, & they ioyned with the INSVBRIANS, which were many moe in number then thē ſelues. Now, they being in a maruelous iolity, went incontinently to lay ſiege to the city of ACERRES, that ſtandeth apon the riuer of Po: and during the ſiege, king Britomarus taking ten thowſande GESSATES with him, went & deſtroyed all the contrie about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his compaſſion Cneus Cornelius, al the armed footemen, & the third parte of the horſemē, in his campe by ACERRES: & he him ſelfe with the reſidue of the horſemē, & ſix hundred footemē light armed, marched towards the enemy, trauelling night & day, vntil he met with the ten thowſand GESSATES, nere vnto a village of GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines, called CLASTIDIVM, which was ſubiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leaſure to take reſt, nor to B refreſh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew ſtraight he was come, & tooke him for no better then by and by ouercome, bicauſe he had ſo fewe footemen. And for his horſemen, the GAVLES made no reckening of them: for beſides themſelues are very good men at armes, and excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of horſemen farre aboue Marcellus. Therefore they ſtraight marched towardes him in a maruelous furie, and with thunderinge ſhowtes, as if they would haue deuowred them at their comminge. Britomarus their king, aduaunced him ſelfe before all his company. Marcellus fearing to be compaſſed in behinde, being ſo ſmall a number: he put out the winges of his horſemen as much as he could, to haue the contrie at large, ſo that his two wings were very ſlender, vntill he came nere his enemies. And being ready to gallop towardes the enemie, it fortuned his horſe beinge afraid with the noyſe C of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus backe againe in ſpite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES ſuperſticion, in taking this for an euill token, and that they woulde take a conceite apon the ſame: plucking the bridle with his left hande, turned his horſe head againe vppon the enemie, and then he worſhipped the ſunne, as though he had not turned his horſe by chaunce, but purpoſely for that cauſe. For it is the ROMAINES manner to turne about ſo, when they do honor their goddes. So when they beganne to ioyne battell, he made a vowe to Iupiter Feretrian, to offer him vppe the goodlieſt ſpoyles of his enemies, if he did ouercome. The kinge of the GAVLES ſeeinge him at that inſtant, imagined by the markes and tokens he ſaw, that he ſhould be the general of his enemies: So he ſet ſpurres to his horſe, and gallopped towardes him from all his company geuing him defiance, & chalenged him, ſhaking his ſtaffe D in his hande. He was the goodlieſt perſone and ſtrongeſt man of all the GAVLES, and his armor was all guilt and ſiluered, and ſo ſet foorth with ſundry workes and colours, that it ſhined as the ſunne. Marcellus on the other ſide hauinge viewed all the army of his enemies through out, and perceauinge none ſo richely armed as the king: thought ſtraight it was againſt him, that he had made his prayer and vowe to Iupiter. Then he put his horſe in full cariere againſt him, and came with ſuch a force & fury to him, that he pearced his armor with his ſtaffe, and ouerthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead: wherupon he ſodainly redoubled two or three ſtrokes beſides apon him, and ſo ſlew him right out. Then he lighted from his horſe, & taking the dead kinges armor in his hande, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and ſaid. O Iupiter Feretrian, thou that doeſt from heauen beholde and direct, all marſhall feates and Captaines deedes: thy E ſelfe I call to witnes, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being generall of the army, haue ſlaine with my owne handes, the king and generall of the enemies: and I promiſe here to thee, to offer thee vp the richeſt ſpoyles of mine enemies, ſo thy godheade will vouchſafe to graunt vs the like good fortune in all this warre beſides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horſemen & footemen of the GAVLES, one being vnparted from an other: and fortune did ſo fauor them, that they wanne a paſſing victory, in ſuch a ſtraunge and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer ſeene before nor ſince, that ſo fewe horſemen did ouerthrow, ſo great a number of men of armes and footemen ranged together. Now when Marcellus hadde ſlaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their ſpoyles & all their baggage: he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom F he founde makinge warres vnfortunately with the GAVLES, before the greateſt and moſt populous city they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLES on this ſide the mountaines take for their chiefe city, and from whence all other had their firſt originall. Whereupon they did all their possible endeuor to defende it, and did as straightly besiege the Consull Cornelius, as he did them. Now, when Marcellus was come to the campe againe, the GESSATES vnderstãding that their king Britomarus was slaine in battel, returned backe againe into their contry, & the city of MILLAINE was taken. After that, all the other cities there about yelded of them selues, without force of siege, and the GAVLES wholly submitted them selues & all that they had, to the mercy of the ROMAINES, who graunted them peace vppon easie condicions. For these famous victories, the Senate of ROME gaue all the honor of triumphe vnto Marcellus only, and that was as wonderfull and worthy a sight, as any that euer past before him: what for the infinite spoyles, and the numbers of great men taken prisoners, and also for the exceeding sumptuousnes & stately shew thereof. But the goodliest sight of all for the rarenes, was to behold Marcellus selfe, carying on his shoulders the whole spoyle of the barbarous king, to offer vp to Iupiter Feretrian. For he had cut downe a goodly younge oke of the mountaine, straight, and shut vp very long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumphe, hanging all the armed peces he had wonne of the king, very orderly rounde about it. Then, when all the show of his triumphe was past, he him selfe tooke the oke on his shoulders, and gotte vp vpon his triumphing charet, and so marched through the city, carying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest sight, and honorablest show, of the whole triumphe. His army followed after the charet, singing verses and songes of victory, in praise of the goddes and their Captaine: and when he had passed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrius, there he set vp this young oke, and token of triumphe. This Marcellus is the third and last ROMAINE Captaine, to whom happened this honor in our age. For the first man that euer offred vp to Iupiter the spoyles of the general of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wanne the like spoyles of Acron, king of the CÆNINIANS. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slue Tolumnius, generall of the THVSCANS. And the third was Marcellus, who slue with his owne handes Britomarus, king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer since could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom these maner of spoyles are consecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretrian, so tearmed as some write, bicause they do cary this token of triumphe to him, following the deriuation of this Greeke word, Ferin, which signifieth to cary: for in those former times, many Greeke words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the surnames of Iupiter, signifying as much as lightening: for Ferire in the Latine tonge, signifieth to strike. And some say also, in warres it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne handes: for the ROMAINES do vse at this day when they geue a charge apon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chase flying, to crie, incoraging one an other, Feri, Feri: which is as much, as kill, kill. And the spoyles taken frõ the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenantes, generall, or generalles, do take from the generalles of their enemies, when they haue slaine them, they are called particularly Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion, that kinge Numa Pompilius mencioning the rich spoyles, or Spolia opima in his cõmentaries, speaketh of the first, the second, and the third: and commaundeth that the first spoyles which are wonne, should be consecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they should giue to him that had wonne the first spoyles, three hundred Asses: the second, two hundred: & the third a hũdred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion & vsuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the first spoyles wonne in a foughten field, & those which the Lieutenãt of an army, or a general, doth take frõ the general of the enemies, after he hath slaine him with his owne handes. And thus much for declaracion of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMAINES were so ioyfull of this victory, & of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a massie cuppe of golde to be made of the spoyle they had gotten, weyinge a hundred pounde weight, which they sent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias: in the city of DELPHES, in token of thankes: and they made liberall diuision besides of the spoyles vnto their frendes and confederates, and sent a great parte of it vnto Hieron king of SYRACVSA, who was their confederate. Not lõg after, Hannibal being entred ITALIE, Marcellus was sent with an army by sea, into SICILE. And after the great ouerthrow was giuen at the battel of CANNES, wherin there died so many thowsande ROMAINES, and that very few of them saued them selues by flyinge, into the city of CANNVSIVM: they looked that Hannibal hauinge ouercome the flower of all the

A the ROMAINES youth, and their greateſt force, woulde not fayle to come ſtraight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus firſt ſent fifteene hundred of his men by ſea, to help to defende ROME: and hauinge afterwardes receaued commaundement from the Senate, he came to CANNVSIVM, where he tooke ſuch as were fled thither for ſuccor after the battell, & ſo brought them out to the fielde, to defende the contrie. Now the ROMAINES hauing loſt the moſt parte of all their beſt Captaines, in diuerſe ſundry battells before: of all thoſe that remained, Fabius Maximus was the onely able and reputed man for commendacion of his honeſty and wiſedom, yet they miſliked of him notwithſtanding, for a timerous man, and of no corage, as a man to ful of doubts and conſideracion, and loth to put any thing in hazard: ſaying, he was a good Captaine to defende, but not to offende the enemy. Whereupon they thought good to ioyne Marcel-
B lus liuely youth & corage, with Fabius feminine feare and wiſedom: and therefore ſome yeares they choſe them both Conſulls together, or elſe they ſent one of them as Conſull, and the other as Proconſull, eche in his turne, to the contrie where they hadde warres. And for proofe hereof, Poſidonius wryteth, that the ROMAINES at that time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their ſword. Therefore Hannibal him ſelfe ſayed, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gouernor, and Marcellus as his enemy: bicauſe the one kept him from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to him ſelfe. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hannibals ſouldiers became ſo bolde, ſo careleſſe, and diſordered, that they kept the fielde without feare of any thing, and diſperſed them ſelues farre from their campe: wherefore Marcellus ſetting apon thoſe ſtragglers, he ſlue them euery man, & ſo by litſe and litle did ſtill leſſen the power
C and ſtrength of his enemy. Afterwardes he aided the cities of BIZANTIVM and of NOLA, and ſtabliſhed the true deuotion and loue of the BIZANTINES towardes the ROMAINES: from thence he went to NOLA, & found great ſedition there betwixt the Senate & people, bicauſe the Senate coulde not keepe the people in obedience, but they woulde needes take Hannibals parte. The cauſe of the peoples ſtubbornneſſe grewe, by occaſion of a gentleman of the city called Bandius, a noble gentleman to the people, and a valliant man of his hands. This Bandius hauing fought valliantly at the battell of CANNES, after he hadde ſlaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was him ſelfe in the ende ſtriken downe, and founde lyinge amonge deade bodies, ſore wounded and mangled: whereupon Hannibal greatly commending his valliantnes, did not onely let him go without ranſome, but furthermore preſented him, & made him his hoſte and D frende. Hereupon Bandius at his comming home, to requite Hannibals honor and curteſie, became one of thoſe that moſt fauored Hannibal, & moſt perſwaded the people of NOLA to take his parte. Notwithſtandinge this, Marcellus thinking it to great a ſinne againſt the goddes, to put a man to death that had made ſo great proofe of his valliantnes, and had ſerued with the ROMAINES in their greateſt warres and extremeſt daunger, and who beſides the goodnes of his nature, hadde a maruelous gift alſo, to winne mens good wills by his great curteſie: when this Bandius came one day to do his duety to him, Marcellus of purpoſe asked him what he was, though he had knowen him long before, only to take occaſion to talke with him. The other aunſwered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus ſeeming to be maruelous glad, and to wonder at him, ſayed: and art thou that Bandius they ſpeake of ſo much at ROME, E whom they ſay did ſo notable ſeruice in perſone at the battel of CANNES, and neuer forſooke Paulus AEmilius the Conſull, but receaued ſo many woundes vppon thy body in defence of him? Bandius aunſwered, that he was the man, and therewith ſhewed him many woundes he had apon his body. Marcellus then replyed: alas, thou that carieſt ſuch notable markes of thy vnfained loue towards vs, what diddeſt thou meane, that thou cameſt not ſtraight againe vnto vs? art thou perſwaded we are ſo miſerable & vnthankefull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valliantneſſe of our frendes, whom our enemies ſelues do honor? After Marcellus had vſed this curteous ſpeach vnto him, and had imbraced him, he gaue him a goodly horſe for ſeruice in the warres, & fiue hundred Drachmes of ſiluer beſides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus parte, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, F and ſhewed him ſelfe very ſeueare and earneſt to accuſe them, that tooke Hannibals parte in the city: which were many in number, & had conſpired among them ſelues, that the firſt time the ROMAINES ſhould go into the fielde to skirmiſhe with the enemies, they woulde ſhut the gates after them,& take the ſpoyle of al their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treaſon,did ſet his men in battell raye within the city, hard by the gates,& behind them he placed al the ſumpters & cariage in good order:beſides that,he made proclamation by trompet,that no citizen apon paine of death ſhoulde approch the walles. This occaſion drew Hannibal to come hard to the city,ſeeinge no watche apon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in diſorder, imagininge there had bene ſome mutinie or ſedition within, betwene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus ſet open the gates being hard by, and ſayling out apon the ſodaine with the beſt men of armes he had,he gaue a charge vpō Hannibal in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footemen at an other gate,running ſtraight vpon Hannibal,with a wonderfull crie and ſhowte:ſo as Hannibal to withſtand them, was driuen to deuide his men in two companies. But as he was deuidinge of them, ſodainely a third gate opened apon them, from whence all the reſidue of the Romaines iſſued out, who ſette vppon the Carthaginians on euery ſide, they beinge maruelouſly amazed to be ſo ſodainely ſet on, which they looked not for: ſo hauing their handes full with thoſe that came firſt apon them, beinge ſcant able to defende them ſelues againſt them, and ſeeinge this newe and laſt charge alſo: they were forced to retyre. This was the firſt time, that euer Hannibals ſouldiers beganne to giue place to the Romaines,who draue them backe vnto their campe, and ſlewe a great number of them, and did hurt diuerſe of them beſides. For ſome wryte, there were ſlaine of the Carthaginians at that conflict, aboue fiue thowſande : and of the Romaines there died not paſt fiue hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not ſet out the ouerthrow ſo great,and yet confeſſeth that Marcellus wanne great honor by it, & that it made the Romaines maruelous valliant againe, after ſo many and ſundry battells as they had loſt one after an other: for then they were perſwaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether vnuincible,but that he might ſomtime alſo, as well as them ſelues,receiue both loſſe and hurt. Therefore, one of the Conſulls dyinge about that time,the people cauſed Marcellus to be ſent for, & placed him in his roome:and in ſpite of the Senate they deferred all deputacion vntill his returne from the campe. Marcellus came no ſooner to Rome, but he was choſen Conſull in the deade mans roome,by all the voyces of the people. Notwithſtandinge, when they went to chooſe him,it thundered maruelouſly : which the Prieſtes & Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durſt not openly ſpeake againſt his election, bicauſe they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of him ſelfe did willingly giue vp his Conſullſhippe,and yet was it no exception to him for his ſeruice in the warres:for they created him Proconſull, and ſent him againe to the campe at Nola, where he did ſeuerely puniſhe ſuch as tooke Hannibals parte. Who being aduertiſed thereof,came thither with all poſſible ſpede to helpe them:and euen at his firſt comming, he offered Marcellus battell,which refuſed it at that time. Neuertheles he tooke his time, when Hannibal hadde ſent the beſt parte of his army to forrage, as meaning to fight no more battels:and then he ſet apon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pykes, ſuch as they vſe in fight apon the ſea, and taught them alſo,howe to hurt the enemy a farre of,keping them ſtill in their handes. But the Carthaginians hauing no skill of their pykes,and fighting with ſhorte iauelings in their hands, did ſtrike downe right blowes:which was the cauſe, that they being ſet apon by the Romaines,were driuen to turne their backes, and flee before them. So there were fiue thowſande of the Carthaginians left dead in the field,foure elephants ſlaine,and two taken aliue:and furthermore,three dayes after the battell, there came a three hundred horſemen, ſome of them Spaniards, and other Numidians, that ſubmitted them ſelues to the Romaines. Neuer came there ſuch a misfortune before to Hannibal:who had of lōg time kept together in great loue & amity,an army aſſembled of ſundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit theſe three hundred continued euer after faithfull to the end,both to Marcellus,and to all other Lieutenants & generals of the Romaines. Shortely after, Marcellus beinge againe choſen Conſull the thirde time, went into Sicile. For Hannibals proſperous ſucceſſe and victories had ſo incoraged the Carthaginians, as they ſought againe to conquer this Ilande:and ſpecially bicauſe that after the death of Hieronimus the tyran, there roſe ſome tumult at Syracvsa. Vppon which occaſion,the Romaines had ſent an army thither before,and a Prætor called Appius : at whoſe handes Marcellus hauing

A hauing receiued the army, a great number of the ROMAINES became humble ſuters to him, to pray him to aide them in their calamity, which was this. Of thoſe that ſcaped from the battell of CANNES, ſome ſaued them ſelues by flying, other were taken priſoners, of which there were ſuch a number, as it appeared that ROME had not people enough left onely to keepe the walles. Neuertheles, thoſe few that remained, their hartes were ſo great, that they would neuer redeeme the priſoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliuer them vppon ſmall ranſome, but made a decree they ſhould not be redeemed: and ſo ſuffered ſome of them to be killed, others to be ſolde for ſlaues out of ITALIE. And moreouer, thoſe that ſaued them ſelues by flying, they ſent ſtraight into SICILE: commaunding they ſhould not once ſet foote againe in ITALIE, whileſt they had warres with Hannibal. Theſe were the men that came altogether,

B and fell downe at Marcellus feete, ſo ſoone as he arriued in SICILE, & humbly beſought him, to appoint them to ſerue vnder ſome enſigne, that they might fight to do their contrie honor and ſeruice: promiſing him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull ſeruice then ſhould witneſſe for them, that the ouerthrow they had at CANNES, fell apon them rather by misfortune, then through lacke of corage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compaſſion on them, wrote to the Senate in their fauor, & prayed them that they would graunt him licence to ſupply the bands of his army, as they diminiſhed, with thoſe poore ROMAINES his contrymen. Many reaſons paſſed to, and fro, againſt this ſute: neuertheles, it was concluded in the ende by the Senate, that the common wealth made no reckening of the ſeruice of faint harted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their ſeruice, yet it ſhoulde Cowardes deteſted of the Romaines.

C not be lawfull for him to giue them any crownes or rewards of honor, for any notable ſeruice ſoeuer they did, as all generalles are wont to giue to honeſt men that ſerue valliantly. This order of the Senate miſliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of SICILE, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifeſt wrong, to deny him that fauor, that hauing done his common wealth ſuch faithful ſeruice diuerſe times, as he had done, he might not reſtore ſo many poore ROMAINES to their honor againe. Nowe, when Marcellus was in SICILE, he receiued great hurtes and iniuries by Hippocrates, generall of the SYRACVSANS: who, to pleaſure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their meanes to make him ſelfe chiefe Lord of SYRACVSA, did put many ROMAINE citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and layed ſiege to the city of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by aſſault, Hippocrates generall of the Syracuſans.

Marcellus wanne the city of the Leontines.

D he hurt neuer a townes man, nor naturall citizen of the ſame: but ſuch traytors as he founde there, and had fled from his campe, & yelded to the enemies, them he cauſed to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithſtanding, Hippocrates had before cauſed it to be bruted at SYRACVSA, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the ſword, not ſparing litle children: and afterwards Hippocrates comming thither on the ſodaine, in the feare and garboyle of this falſe brute, he eaſily tooke the city. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACVSA, left forthwith the LEONTINES, & went with his whole army, & camped hard by SYRACVSA: and ſent his Ambaſſadors to tell the SYRACVSANS truely, what he had done in the city of the LEONTINES, and quite contrarie to that they were informed of. Howbeit that preuailed not, for they beleued not Marcellus, bicauſe Hippocrates being the ſtronger, had wonne the city. Wher-

Marcellus beſiegeth Syracuſa.

E upon he beganne then to approch the walles, and to aſſault in euery quarter, as well by ſea as by lande. Appius tooke charge of them that gaue aſſault by lande. Marcellus him ſelfe, with three ſcore galleyes of fiue owers at euery bancke, well armed, and full of all ſortes of artillery and fire works, did aſſault by ſea, and rowed hard to the walle, hauing made a great engine and deuiſe of battery, vppon eight galleyes chained together, to batter the walle: truſting in the great multitude of his engines of battery, and to all ſuch other neceſſarie prouiſion as he had for warres, as alſo in his owne reputacion. But Archimedes made light accompt of all his deuiſes, as in deede they were nothinge comparable to the engines him ſelfe had inuented: and yet were not his owne ſuch, as him ſelfe did recken of, to ſhew ſingularity of worke and deuiſe. For thoſe he had made, were but his recreations of Geometry, and thinges done to paſſe the

F time with, at the requeſt of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to minde a litle his geometricall ſpeculation, and to apply it to thinges corporall and ſenſible, and to make the reaſon of it demonſtratiue, and plaine, to the vnderſtanding of the common people by experiments, and to the benefit and commodity of vse. For this inuentiue arte to frame instruments and engines, (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, so highly commended and esteemed of all sortes of people) were first set forth by Architas, and by Eudoxus: partely to beawtifie a litle the science of Geometry by this fineness, and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and sencible instruments, certeine Geometrical conclusions, wherof a man can not finde out the conceiueable demonstrations, by enforced reasons and proofes. As that conclusion which instructeth one to searche out two lynes meane proportionall, which can not be proued by reason demonstratiue, and yet notwithstandinge is a principall and an accepted grounde, for many thinges which are conteined in the arte of portraiture. Both of them haue facioned it to the workemanship of certeine instruments, called Mesolabes or Mesographes, which serue to finde these meane lines proportionall, by drawing certaine curue lines, and ouerthwart and oblike sextions. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and mainteined against them, that they did vtterly corrupt and disgrace, the worthines & excellency of Geometry, making it to discende from things not comprehensible, and without body, vnto things sencible and materiall, and to bringe it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handie worke of man is to be employed: since that time I say, handy craft, or the arte of engines, came to be separated from Geometry, and being long time despised by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike artes. But Archimedes hauinge tolde king Hieron, his kinseman and very frende, that it was possible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as litle strength as he lifted to put to it: and boasting him selfe thus (as they reporte of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proued this cõclusion, that if there were an other globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, and passe it ouer to the other: kinge Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this deuise in execution, and to make him see by experience, some great or heauy weight remoued, by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greatest carects, or hulkes of the king (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, required a maruelous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done so) and put a great number of men more into her, than her ordinary burden: and he himselfe sittinge alone at his ease farre of, without any straining at all, drawing the ende of an engine with many wheeles and pullyes, fayer and softly with his hande, made it come as gently and smoothly to him, as it had floted in the sea. The king wondering to see the sight, and knowing by proofe the greatnes of his arte: he prayed him to make him some engines, both to assault and defend in all maner of sieges and assaultes. So Archimedes made him many engines, but kinge Hieron neuer occupied any of them, bicause he raigned the most parte of his time in peace, without any warres. But this prouision and munition of engines, serued the SYRACVSANS turne maruelously at that time: and not only the prouision of the engines ready made, but also the enginer & worke maister him selfe, that had inuented them. Now, the SYRACVSANS seeing them selues assaulted by the ROMAINES, both by sea and by land, were maruelously perplexed, and could not tel what to say they were so afrayed: imagining it was impossible for them to withstande so great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to set them at liberty, there flue in the ayer infinite kindes of shot, and maruelous great stones, with an vncredible noyse and force on the sodaine, apon the footemen that came to assault the city by land, bearing downe, and tearing in peeces all those, which came against them, or in what place soeuer they lighted, no earthly body beinge able to resist the violence of so heauy a weight: so that all their rankes were maruelously disordered. And as for the gallies that gaue assault by sea, some were soncke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of shippes, whereto they fasten their sailes, which were sodainly blowen ouer the walles with force of their engines into their gallies, and so soncke them by their ouergreat weight. Other being hoysed vp by the prooes with handes of Iron, and hookes made like cranes billes, plonged their poupes into the sea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines fastened within, one contrary to an other, made them turne in the ayer like a whirlegigge, & so cast them apon the rockes by the towne walles, and splitted them all to fitters, to the great spoyle and murder of the persons that were within them. And sometimes the shippes and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearfull thing to see them hang and turne in the ayer as they did: vntill that casting their men men within them ouer the hatches, ſome here, ſome there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be empty, and to breake againſt the walls, or elſe to fall into the ſea againe, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought againſt the walles, vppon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reaſon of the facion it had like to an inſtrument of muſicke of the ſame name, which is a harpe. The ſame being yet a good prety way of frō the walls, there fell a great ſtone apon it ſent frō the walls, weying ten talents. Then, a ſeconde after that, and a third one after that, the which falling all intō this engine with ſuch a thunder and terrible tempeſt, brake the fundacion of the engine, and tare all the bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that ſuſteined it. So that Marcellus being amazed with all, not knowing well what it ment: was glad to retyre quickely, and ſent to make his trompet ſound the retreate to thoſe that gaue aſſault by land. Hereupon they ſate in counſaill to determine what was to be done, and they reſolued, that the next morninge before day they ſhoulde approche the walles if it were poſſible: bicauſe that Archimedes engines, which were very ſtrong and hard wounde vp, ſhould by this meanes ſende all the force and furie of their ſtones and ſhot ouer their heades, and that neere hande alſo he coulde do no good with them, for that they had not the ſcope of their leauel and cariage they ſhould haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuiſe by long preparation before, hauing made prouiſion of engines for farre and neere, the leauell and cariage whereof was proportioned for all diſtances: their ſhot ſhorte, the arrowes not very long, many holes and arches in the walles one harde by an other, where there were ſtore of crosbowes to kill neere hande, ſette in ſuch places, as the enemies coulde not ſee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINES thought to approche, thinking they had bene ſafe and cloſe, that no man ſaw them: it amazed them all when they were receaued againe with infinite ſhot, and ſtriken to the ground with ſtones that fell apon their heades like leade: (for there was no parte of all the walles, from whence they had not the like ſhotte.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retyre from the walles. And yet when they were further of from them, the arrowes, ſtones, and other kinde of ſhotte that flue in euery place amonge them, killed a great nomber of them, ſcattered farre from thence: ſo that many of them were ſlaine and ſore wounded, and diuerſe of their ſhippes ſplitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, bicauſe Archimedes had placed his engines very cloſely behinde the walles, and not apon the walles in ſight of the enemy. So that it appeared the goddes fought againſt the ROMAINES, they were ſo ſlaine and wounded, and yet they coulde not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithſtanding, Marcellus eſcaped with life, ſafe from hurt, and mocking his workemaiſters and enginers he had in his campe, he ſayd vnto them. What, ſhall we not leaue to make warres with this Briarian enginer and Geometrician here? who ſitting ſtill apon the wharfe, in ſporting manner hath with ſhame ouerthrowen our nauy, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred handes of the Gyants, diſchargінge at one inſtant ſo many ſhot among vs? For in deede, all the reſidue of the SYRACVSANS were, as the body and members of Archimedes preparacion: and he him ſelfe was the only creature that moued and did all, all weapons elſe being quiet, and his engines only occupied, to aſſault and defend. At the length, Marcellus ſeeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but ſee the ende of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the walle, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting looſe ſome of his engines apon them: he would no more approche the walles, nor geue aſſault, determininge to ſee if he coulde winne it by longe ſiege. Notwithſtanding, Archimedes had ſuch a great minde, and was ſo profoundly learned, hauing hidden in him the onely treaſure and ſecrets of Geometricall inuentions: as he would neuer ſet forth any booke how to make all theſe warlicke engynes, which wanne him at that time the fame & glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wiſedom. But he eſteminge all kinde of handy craft & inuention to make engines, & generally all maner of ſciences bringing common commodity by the vſe of them, to be but vyle, beggerly, & mercenary droſſe: employed his witte & ſtudy onely to write thinges, the beawty and ſubtiltie whereof, were not mingled any thinge at all with neceſſitie. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propoſicions, which are without compariſon of any other writings whatſoeuer: bicauſe the ſubiect whereof they treate, doeth appeare by demonſtracion, the matter giuing them the grace & the greatnes, and the demon-ſtracion prouing it ſo exquiſitely, with wonderfull reaſon and facilitie, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be founde more profounde and difficulte matters wrytten, in more plaine and ſimple tearmes, & by more eaſie principles, then thoſe which he hath inuented. Now ſome do impute this, to the ſharpnes of his wit & vnderſtanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made theſe things come ſo eaſily from him, that they ſeemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man liuinge of him ſelfe can deuiſe the demonſtracion of his propoſitions, what paine ſoeuer he take to ſeeke it: & yet ſtraight ſo ſoone as he commeth to declare & open it, euery man then imagineth with him ſelfe he could haue found it out well enough, he can then ſo plainly make demonſtracio of the thing he meaneth to ſhew. And therfore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was ſo rauiſhed & dronke with the ſwete intyſements of this Sirene, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgate his meate & drinke, and was careles otherwiſe of him ſelfe, that oftentimes his ſeruants got him againſt his will to the bathes, to waſhe & annoynt him: & yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oyles & ſwete ſauors, with his finger he did draw lines apon his naked body: ſo farre was he take frō himſelf, & brought into an extaſy or traunſe, with the delite he had in the ſtudy of Geometry, & truely rauiſhed with the loue of the Muſes. But amongſt many notable things he deuiſed, it appeareth, that he moſt eſtemed the demonſtracion of the proportion betwene the Cylinder (to wit, the round colomne) & the Sphære or globe conteined in the ſame: for he prayed his kinſemē & frends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder apon his tombe, conteining a maſſie Sphære, with an inſcription of the proportion, wherof the continent excedeth the thing cōteined. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did aſmuch as lay in him, both ſaue him ſelfe & Syracvsa from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the ſiege at Syracvsa, wanne the city of Megares in Sicile, one of the auncienteſt cities in all the Ilande: & he tooke beſides, the campe of Hippocrates, lying by Aciles, where he ſlue aboue eight thouſand men, ſurpriſing them apon the ſodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, & to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great parte of the champion contrie of Sicile, & made the cities to rebel that tooke the Carthaginians parte: & in al the battels he fought, he euer ouercame them that durſt bid him battell. It chaunced afterwards, that he tooke a Lacedæmonian Captaine priſoner, called Danippus: euen as he came out of Syracvsa by ſea. The Syracvsans deſirous to redeme him, ſent to him to pray he might be ranſommed. They made many parlees about his raunſome, and drew out this practiſe to diuerſe meetings: vntil Marcellus had taken good markes of a certeine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, & into the which he might ſecretly cōuey a certeine number of men, the walle of the city in that place being no very hard thing to skale. Therefore when he had geuen a good geſſe by eſtimacion at the height of that tower, by often approching to it, hauing parled many a time hard by it: he prouided skaling ladders, & tooke the oportunity of a feaſt which the Syracvsans ſolemniſed in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue thē ſelues to al feaſting, ſporting & playes. So he tooke not only the tower, but filled all the walls round about with armed mē before day, & brake open the maine gate & entry of the citie called Hexapyle. And as the Syracvsans began to ſtirre, perceiuing the Romaines on the wals: Marcellus made his men ſound their trompets on euery ſide. Whereupon the Syracvsans were ſo afraid & amazed, that they beganne to flie, thinkinge all the city beſides had bene taken, where in deede the greateſt & ſtrongeſt quarter of the city called Acradina, was not yet touched: bicauſe it is walled in rounde about, and ſeparated from the reſt of the citie, which is deuided into two other partes, the one called the newe citie, and the other fortune. The two partes whereof beinge wonne, Marcellus by the breake of the daye forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapyle. And when his Captaynes tolde him he was happie, to winne ſo goodly a citie, ſo eaſely: they ſay, that he lookinge about him, and conſideringe the greatneſſe and ſtatelineſſe of the ſame, he wept for verie pitie, foreſeeinge whereto it ſhoulde come, thinking with him ſelfe what a ſodayne chaunge it ſhoulde haue, when his armie came to ſpoyle and ſacke the ſame. For there was not a Captaine that durſt denie the ſouldiers when they demaunded

A the ſpoyle, and yet were there many that would nedes haue it burnt and raſed to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any caſe, and beſides, it was ſore againſt his minde to graunt them the ſpoyle of the goodes and ſlaues: ſtraightly commaunding them notwithſtanding, not to lay handes of any free man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACVSAN ſlaue. Wherein, though he ſhewed great fauor and mercy, yet it greued him to ſee ſo famous a citie, brought to that miſerable ſtate: and in the middeſt of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pity to ſee ſo rich and wealthie a citie, in the turning of a hand, ſpoyled, and brought to nought. For it is ſayd, that the riches and goodes taken away at the ſacke of SYRACVSA, were nothinge inferior to the ſpoyles of CARTHAGE, which was alſo ſacked not longe after that: for the other parte of the city of SYRACVSA called A-

SYRACVSA beinge taken, nothinge greued Marcellus more, then the loſſe of Archimedes. Who beinge in his ſtudie when the citie was taken, buſily ſeekinge out by him ſelfe the demonſtracion of ſome Geometricall propoſition which he hadde drawen in figure, and ſo earneſtly occupied therein, as he neither ſawe nor hearde any noyſe of enemies that ranne vppe and downe the citie, and much leſſe knewe it was taken: He wondered when he ſawe a ſouldier by him, that bad him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithſtandinge, he ſpake to the ſouldier, and bad him tary vntill he had done his concluſion, and brought it to demonſtracion: but the ſouldier being angry with his aunſwer, drew out his ſword, and killed him. Other ſay, that

But the ſouldier makinge no reckening of his ſpeculation, killed him preſently. It is reported a third way alſo, ſayinge, that certeine ſouldiers met him in the ſtreetes going to Marcellus, carying certeine Mathematicall inſtrumentes in a litle pretie coffer, as dialles for the ſunne, Sphæres and Angles, wherewith they meaſure the greatneſſe of the body of the ſunne by viewe: and they ſuppoſing he hadde caried ſome golde or ſiluer, or other pretious Iuells in that litle coffer, ſlue him for it. But it is moſt true, that Marcellus was maruelous ſorie for his death, and euer after hated the villen that ſlue him, as a curſed and execrable perſone: and howe he made alſo maruelous much af-

The ROMAINES were eſtemed of at that time by all nations, for maruelous expert ſouldiers, and taken for verie vallyant and daungerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer ſhewed any example of their clemencie and curteſie, and leaſt of all of any ciuill manner to any ſtraungers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whoſe actes did ſhewe the GREECIANS then, that the ROMAINES were more gratious and merciſull, then they. For he did ſo curteouſlie intreate thoſe that hadde to do with him, and ſhewed ſuch fauour to priuate perſones, and alſo to whole citties: that if there were any crueltie ſhewed in the citties of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or againſt the SYRACVSANS, it was rather through their owne fault and follie that were hurt, then theirs that didde them the hurte. And for proſe hereof, I will recite you one example onely amongeſt many. There is Marcellus clemency.

E a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thinge, but a verie auncient citie of name, by reaſon of the trafficke thither, for that there are certeine goddeſſes to be ſeene, whome they worſhip, called the mothers. Some ſay the CRETANS were the firſt builders and founders of the temple there, where you ſhall ſee ſpeares and helmets of copper, and apon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and apon others, Vlyſſes name alſo, which are conſecrated to theſe goddeſſes. This citie ſtoode altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias beinge the chiefeſt man of the ſame, was all he might againſt it, and perſwaded them openlie in all their counſailles to take parte with the ROMAINES, prouinge it by many reaſons, that his enemies counſaylinge the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Whereuppon Nicias enemies fearinge his greatneſſe and au-very ill ſpeeches againſt the goddeſſes, and did many things in derogation of their honor: and ſayd the ſight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but deuiſe, and that there was no credit to be geuen to them. Theſe words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the miſchiefe they pretended againſt him, to him ſelfe, as the only cauſer of his owne hurt. So they hauinge appointed a day to apprehende him, by chaunce a common counſaill was kept that day they hadde determined of: where Nicias ſpeaking to the people about matter of counſaill, in the middeſt of his oration fell to the grounde, to the great wonder of the whole aſſembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit neuer a man ſturred, & a prety while after he beganne to lift vppe his head a litle, and to looke gaſtely about him, with a faint trembling voyce, which he ſtill gathered higher and lowder by litle and litle, vntill he ſawe all the people wonderouſly afrayed and amazed, that not one of them durſt ſpeake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ranne towardes the gate of the Theater, cryinge out that the goddeſſes mothers did torment him: and not a man durſt once come neere him, nor offer to ſtoppe him, they were ſo ſuperſticious and fooliſhly afrayed of the goddeſſes, imagining it was ſome diuine puniſhment. But by this meanes he eaſily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he was neuer ſeene after that time, to do, or ſpeake, like a madde man in any thing. His wife that was made priuy to his deuiſe, and furthered his intent, went firſt and fell downe on her knees before the goddeſſes mothers in their temple, as ſhe had hartily prayed vnto them: & fayning afterwards ſhe would go ſeeke her husbande, that ranne vp and downe the fieldes like a madde man, ſhe went out of the city with her litle childrẽ, and no body troubled her. Thus did they eſcape without daunger, and went vnto Marcellus to Syracvsa. The Engienians afterwards played ſuch inſolent partes, that Marcellus in the ende went thither, and cauſed them all to be taken and bounde, as though he woulde haue put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with the teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiſſinge his handes, beſought him to take pitie of his poore citizens, beginning firſt with thoſe that were his greateſt enemies. This good nature of Nicias ſo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, & did no hurt to the city, and gaue Nicias certeine land, beſides many other rich giftes he beſtowed apon him. Thus it is reported in the hiſtory of Poſidonius the Philoſopher. Now Marcellus being ſent for home by the Romanes, bicauſe they had warres in their owne contrie, and euen at Rome gates: he departed out of Sicile, returning towardes Rome, and caried the goodlieſt tables, pictures, and ſtatues, and other ſuch ornamentes as were in Syracvsa, meaning firſt to beautifie his triumphe with them, and to leaue them afterwardes for an ornament to Rome, which before that time neuer knewe what ſuch curious workes ment. For, this finenes, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into Rome before, but was throughly ſet out with armor and weapons of barbarous people, and with bloody ſpoyles, and was alſo crowned with monumentes of victories and triumphes of diuerſe enemies, which were no pleaſaunt, but rather feareſull ſightes to looke apon, farre vnfitte for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas did call the plaine of Boeotia, Mars ſcaffolde, where he kept his games: and Xenophon alſo called the city of Ephesvs, the armorers ſhoppe: euen ſo me thinkes (as Pindarus ſaid) they might rightly haue tearmed Rome, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wanne the peoples good willes much more to Marcellus, bicauſe he did ſo paſſingly ſet foorth Rome, with ſuch excellent fine toyes of Greece. But Fabius Maximus on the other ſide, was better beloued of the old men: bicauſe he brought no ſuch toyes with him from the city of Tarentvm, when he wanne it. In deede he brought away golde and ready coyne, and much other goodes that were profitable: but for images and tables, he left them ſtanding in their places, ſpeaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the Tarentines their goddes offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, ſaying, that by this act he had purchaſed Rome great malice and hate. Firſt, bicauſe he did not onely leade men priſoners in his triumphe, but the gods alſo: and ſecondly, bicauſe he had filled the people full of pritle pratle, & idle curioſity, ſpending all the whole day in gaſinge, and wondering at the excellency of the workemen, and of their workes, where before they woulde fall to their labor, or elſe they went to the warres, not being acquainted with curioſity, nor idle life as Euripides ſayd, ſpeaking of Hercules;

In

In vvicked practises, he simple vvas to see, but he excelld in vertuous dedes, and feates that vvorthy be.

Notwithstandinge, Marcellus did glory amongest the GREECIANS them selues, sayinge: that he had taught the ROMAINES to esteeme the wonderfull workes of GREECE, which they knewe not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honor of triumphe was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in SICILE, and that the warre was not altogether ended, and fearing besides least a third triumphe would make him to much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor of the great triumphe, in the mountaine of ALBA only: & of the litle triumphe, in the city of ROME: This maner of litle triumphe is called in Greeke, Euan, and the ROMAINES call it Ouatio. And this difference there is betwene them: that in the Ouation triumphe, the party to whom it is graunted, doth not enter into the city apon triumphing charet drawen with foure horses, nor doth cary any lawrell apon his head in token of triumphe, nor hath any trompettes or hornes blowen before him, but doth marche a foote with a payer of slippers on his fete, hauing flutes and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garlande of fyrre tree apon his heade: so as this maner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasaunt then fearefull sight. And that reason doth flatly drawe me to beleue, that these two kindes of entries they graunted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were deuided in the olde time, rather for the maner, then for the greatnes of the doings. For such as had ouercomen their enemies by great slaughter and bloody battells, they did make their entry with pompe of triumphe, that was altogether marshall and terrible, followed with their souldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlandes, as their custome was in musteringe their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary side, that without any exployte of armes returned home with victorie, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law graunted them the honor of Ouation triumphe, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an instrument of pleasure belonginge to peace, and the fyrre tree is a tree consecrated to Venus, which goddesse, aboue all goddes and goddesses doth most deteste warres. This second kinde of entry was called Ouatio, not as many GREECIANS haue taken it, comming of this word Euan, which is a voyce and song of ioy, although they did vse also to accompanie the Captaines making their entry in this sorte, crying and singing Euan: but there were certeine GREECIANS that would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common custome they had: & were of opinion besides, that parte of this honor did apperteine to god Bacchus, whose surname we cal Euius, and somtimes Thriambus. Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the name, but after this sorte. At the great triumphe and entry made, the Captaine or generall that triumpheth as a conqueror, did offer and sacrifice (by the old orders and ancient customes of ROME) one, or diuers oxen: where at the seconde triumphe called the Ouation, he onely sacrificed a mutton, which the ROMAINES call in their tongue Ouem, and thereof was it called Ouation. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the lawe maker of the ROMAINE lawes and customes, and the law maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how both of them were contrary to the other, in appointinge their sacrifices for victorie. For at SPARTA, the Captaine or generall that had done his feate by policy or frendshippe, the sacrifice he did offer vppe to the goddes, was an oxe: and he that by force, and bloody battell had obtained victory, only offred vp a cocke for sacrifice. For though they were very good souldiers, yet they thought better of his seruice, that by his wisedom & wise perswasions obteined victory: then of his, that wanne it by valliantnes, and force of armes. Thus may you see which of these two lawemakers hadde best reason in his ordinaunces. But nowe to Marcellus againe. He beinge chosen Consull the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did stirre vppe the SYRACVSANS against him, and perswaded them to complayne to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly, and vncurteously vsed them, contrary to the auncient league & allyances made long time before with the ROMAINES. Marcellus beinge sacrificinge one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were sette in counsaill: the SYRACVSANS deputies came before them, & kneeling downe, besought the to giue them audience, & that they would do them iustice. The other Consull that was present rebuked them, being angry they had so maliciously spyed the occasion of Marcellus absence.

But when Marcellus hearde of it, he ſtraight left of all, and came to the Senate, and firſt ſatte him downe in his Conſulls chayer, where he gaue audience as Conſull, and diſpatched diuerſe cauſes: when he had done ſo, he roſe out of his chayer, and came downe among them, ſtandinge as a priuate perſone to aunſwere at the barre, as other offenders and men accuſed, ſuffering the SYRACVSANS to alleadge and ſay againſt him what they would. Then were the SYRACVSANS blancke, when they ſaw the maieſty of Marcellus, and his ſtayed countenance in all thinges: ſo that hauing founde him before a very valliant man in warres and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no leſſe dreadful in his Conſuls robe: that they hong downe their eyes, and durſt not looke him in the face. Notwithſtanding, they being ſuborned by his enemies, beganne at the length boldely to accuſe him, and yet with ſorow and lamentacion, the effect whereof was this. That they beinge the ROMAINES frendes and confederates, had abidden ſuch iniuries at Marcellus handes, as all other generalles neuer offred their very enemies. Whereto Marcellus ſtraight aunſwered againe to the contrary. That for many iniuries the ROMAINES had receiued of thē, they ſuffred nothing but that, which was vnpoſſible they ſhould not ſuffer, that reſiſted vntill they were taken by force: and yet they might thanke themſelues for any thing they ſuffered, bicauſe they would not obey nor conſent, to reaſonable capitulacions and articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alleage for their excuſe, that the tyrans had compelled them to make warres: when they to the contrary, bicauſe they would enter into warres, were contented to be ſubiect to a tyran. So, when both parties hadde ſpoken their mindes, the SYRACVSANS (as the maner is) went out of the Senate houſe, and Marcellus alſo, leauinge his fellowe Conſull in his place in the Senate, and taried without the dore, attending the ſentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenaunce nor wonted looke, neither for feare of ſentence, nor for malice or anger againſt the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgement. Afterwards when the Senators voyces were gathered together, and that Marcellus was cleared by the moſt voyces: then the SYRACVSANS fell downe at his feete weeping, and beſought him not to wreake his anger apon them that were preſent, and moreouer that he would haue compaſſion of the reſidue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confeſſed themſelues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them, and euer after did all the SYRACVSANS what pleaſure he coulde poſſible. For through his intreaty and requeſt, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his graunt vnto them, which was: that they might vſe the liberty and benefit of their owne lawes, and quietly enioy their goodes alſo which were left them. To requite this ſpecial grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors, & among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or houſe came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS ſhould kepe a ſolemne feaſt, with garlands on their heades, and ſhould alſo ſacrifice vnto the goddes. After this, Marcellus went againſt Hanniball. And where all the other Conſulls almoſt, & generalles, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vſed this only policie with him, not to come to battell: he tooke a contrarie courſe to them all, thinkinge that tract of time, (whereby they thought to eate out Hannibals force) was rather a direct conſuming and deſtroying of all ITALIE: and that Fabius Maximus ſtandinge to much vpon ſafety, tooke not the way to cure the diſeaſe and weakenes of the common weale of ROME, looking to ende this warre, conſuming by litle and litle the ſtrength and power of ROME, committing a fearefull phiſitions fault and error, being afraid to heale their pacient ſodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth leſſen the diſeaſe. So, firſt of all he went to beſiege certeine great cities of the SAMNITES, which were reuolted from obedience of the ROMAINES: and thoſe he wanne againe with a great prouiſion of corne and money he founde in them, beſides three thouſande ſouldiers Hanniball left in garriſon there, whome he tooke priſoners. Hanniball after that, hauinge ſlaine the viceconſul Cneus Fuluius in APVLIA, with eleuen Tribunis militum (to wit, Colonels, euery one hauinge charge of a thouſande footemen) and ouerthrowen the greateſt parte of his armie: Marcellus wrote letters to ROME, hoping to comforte the Senate & people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he woulde driue Hanniball out of APVLIA. When the ROMAINES had red his letters, they were nothing the more cōforted, but rather (as Liuie writeth) more

A more afraid and discouraged: bicause they doubted the daunger to come woulde be greater, then the losse past, takinge Marcellus to be a farre greater and better generall, then euer was Fuluius. Neuertheless, Marcellus performing the contentes of his letters wrytten to ROME, draue Hanniball out of APVLIA, and made him retyre into LVCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that contry, by a city called NVMISTRON, lodged apon hilles, and in places of strength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morninge he was the first that presented his enemy battell. Hannibal on the other side, came downe into the valley, and they ioyned battell: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it coulde not be discerned who had the better. For the battell being begonne at nine of the clocke in the morning, it was darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by pepe of day, Marcellus set his men

B againe in battell raye, in the middest of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the fielde, and chalenged Hanniball, to proue who should haue the field. But Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leasure left him to strippe his slaine enemies, and also to bury his owne souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemie by the foote, who layed many ambushes for him, but he coulde neuer trappe him in any: and in euery encounter or skirmishe they had together, Marcellus hadde euer the better, which wanne him great fame and credit. Nowe time beinge commen about to choose newe Consulls, the Senate thought good to sende rather for the other Consul that was in SICILE, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hanniball. So when the other Consull was come to ROME, the Senate commaunded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, bi-

C cause the Dictator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prætors, in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Dictator, as he liketh of. Wherefore it seemeth, that this word Dictator, came apon that word naming: for, Dicere in the ROMAINE tongue, signifieth to name. Howebeit other holde opinion, that he was called Dictator, bicause he commaundeth of him selfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voyces of the people: and this seemeth to be true, bicause the commaundements of the Senate of ROME are called Edicta, which we GREECIANS call Diatagmata. Now the other Consull and companion of Marcellus being come out of SICILE, he would nedes name an other Dictator, then him whom the Senate offred him: and bicause he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he stale away one night, and returned againe into Si-

Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fuluius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their letters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, and authorised the peoples election. So he him selfe was chosen againe Proconsul, for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the warres, they were agreed, that Fabius should proue if he could winne the city of TARENTVM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time shoulde keepe Hannibal occupied, that he might not come to aide it. This resolution being taken betwene them, Marcellus went to meete Hannibal by the city of CANNVSIVM: who as he still chaunged and shifted lodginge, bicause he woulde not come to the battell against his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Insomuch as Hannibal remouinge thus his campe, Marcellus plyed him so one day with continuall alaroms and skir-

E mishes, that he brought him to a battell that held all day long till night, and compelled them both to leaue of til the next morning: where Marcellus shewed againe in field by breake of the day, in battell ray. Whereat Hannibal being in a maruelous rage, he called his souldiers together, and made an oration to them, earnestly mouinge them once againe to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had heretofore fought for his sake. You see, sayd he, that hauing fought so many battells, and gotten such victories as we haue done, we can not yet take breath as we would, nor be in quiet, how much soeuer we winne, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hannibal had ended his oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the battell: where Marcellus, to no purpose, and out of time, would nedes shew Hannibal a stra-

F tageame of warre, that turned him selfe to the worst. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his army distressed, made one of his legyons that was set in ray in the rereward of his hoste, to marche to the fronte of his battell, to helpe those that needed ayde. But this remouing of the legyon, troubled them that fought, and gaue the enemies the victorie: who slue that day two thouſand ſeuen hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he ſtraight called his ſouldiers before him, to whome he ſpake in this maner: that he ſaw a great deale of armor, and bodies of men, but he coulde ſee no ROMAINES. The ROMAINES hearing him ſay ſo, beſought him to pardon the fault they had committed. Marcellus aunſwered, he woulde neuer pardon them, ſo long as they were ouercome: but when they ouercame againe, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bringe them againe to fight with the enemy, that ſuch as were at ROME ſhould rather heare newes of their victorie, then of their running away. When he had ſayed, he appointed they ſhoulde geue thoſe bandes that firſt turned their backes to Hanniball, barley for wheate. So, as there were many of them in great daunger of their liues, for the ſore woundes they hadde geuen them in the battell: yet was there not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more greue them, then the greuous woundes they had. The next morning betimes was ſet out of the generalles tent, the coate armor died in skarlet, which is the ordinary ſigne of battell: and the bandes that had receiued diſhonor the day before, were placed at their owne requeſt in the fronte of the battell. The other Captaines beſides, that were not ouerthrowen: did leade their bandes alſo to the fielde, and did ſet them in battell raye. Hanniball hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that can not be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the only odde man, that neuer giueth reſt to his enemy, when he hath ouercommed him: nor taketh any for him ſelfe, when he is ouercome. We ſhal neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I ſee: ſith ſhame, whether he winne or looſe, doth ſtill prouoke him to be bolder and vallianter. After orations made of bothe ſides, bothe armies marched forwardes to ioyne battell. The ROMAINES being as ſtrong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hanniball put his Elephants in the voward and fronte of his battell, and commaunded his men to driue them apon the ROMAINES: and ſo they did. Which in deede did ſomewhat trouble and diſorder the firſt ranckes of the ROMAINES: vntill ſuch time as Flauius, Tribune of the ſouldiers, tooke an enſigne in his hande, and marched before the beaſtes, and gaue the firſt of them ſuch a thruſt with the poynt of his enſigne, that he made her turne backe. The firſt beaſt being turned backe thus, ranne apon the ſeconde that followed her, and the ſecond made the third go backe alſo, and ſo from one to an other, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commaunded his horſemen to ſet apon the enemies with all the fury they coulde, in that place where he ſawe them, ſomewhat troubled with theſe beaſtes, that turned backe againe vpon them: and that they ſhould driue them further in amongeſt them. Which they did, and gaue ſo hotte a charge apon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backes, & runne away, and they purſued them ſtill, killing them downe right, euen to their campe ſide: where was the greateſt ſlaughter of all, by reaſon their Elephants that were wounded, fell downe ſtarke deade within the gate of their campe. And they ſaye of the CARTHAGINIANS there were ſlaine at this battell, aboue eight thowſande, and of the ROMAINES, onely three thowſande: howbeit all the reſt of them for the moſt parte were very ſore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hanniball, that he might march away at his pleaſure, as he did that night, and got him away farre of from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in ſtate to follow him ouerſodainely, bicauſe of his great number of hurt men in his campe: and ſo by ſmall iorneys he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garriſon all the ſommer, in the city of SINVESSE, to heale the woundes of his ſore mangled ſouldiers. Hanniball hauing now gotten him ſelfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, & hauing his army free to ſerue him as he thought good: he burned & deſtroyed all ITALIE where he went & ſtoode no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill ſpoken of at ROME, and cauſed his enemies to take holde of ſuch a matter againſt him: for they ſtraight raiſed Publius Bibulus Tribune, to accuſe him, who was a hotte harebrained man, but very eloquent, and coulde deliuer his minde very well. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counſaill, and tolde them there, that they muſt nedes call home Marcellus, and appoint ſome other to take charge of the army: for as for him, ſayd he, bicauſe he hath fought a litle with Hanniball (and as a man might ſay, wreſtled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to ſolace him ſelfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenantes in the campe, and went him ſelfe to ROME, to aunſwer to the vntrue accuſations layd againſt him, and there he perceiued at his comming, how they

A intended to proſecute the matter againſt him apon theſe informations. So a day of hearinge was appointed for his matter, & the parties came before the people aſſembled in counſaill, in the great liſtes or ſhow place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, ſitting in his chayer, layd open his accuſation with great circumſtance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had tolde his tale, aunſwered him in few wordes, and very diſcretely, only touchinge his purgation. But the noble and chiefeſt men of the citie, roſe vppe, and ſpake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainely, that they did Marcellus wrong, to recken worſe of his valliantnes, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, conſidering Hannibal only fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no meanes fight with him, neuer refuſinge to fight with any other whatſoeuer. Theſe perſwaſions tooke ſuch effect, as where

B Marcellus accuſer looked for his condēnation: Marcellus to the contrary, was not only cleared of his accuſation, but furthermore they choſe him Conſull againe the fift time. So beinge entred into his office, he went firſt into THVSCAN: where viſiting the good cities one after an other, and quietinge them, he pacified a great ſedition in the contry, when they were all ready to riſe and rebell. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to conſecrate the temple of honor & vertue, which he had built with the ſpoyles he gotte in the warres of SICILE. But the Prieſtes were againſt it, ſaying, two goddes might not be in one church. Thereupon he built an other temple, and ioyned it to the firſt, being very angry the Prieſtes denied ſo his conſecration: and he did take it for an euill token, beſides diuerſe other ſignes in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. And it is reported alſo, that an oxe did ſpeake: and a childe came out of the heade of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Prieſtes and Soothſayers ſacrificing to the goddes, to withdraw this euill from them theſe ſiniſter tokens did threaten: they could neuer finde any fauorable ſignes in their ſacrifices. Whereuppon they ſought to keepe Marcellus ſtill at ROME, who had a maruelous earneſt deſire to be gone with ſpeede to the warres: for neuer man longed for any thing ſo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hanniball. Inſomuch he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor ſpake of any matter els in the day to his frendes and companions, nor prayed to the goddes for any other thinge, but that he might fight with Hanniball in the fielde: and I thincke he woulde willingliеſt haue fought a priuate

Neuertheles, after he had ended all his propitiatory ſacrifices and purifications, ſuch as the Soothſayers had appointed: he departed from ROME with his fellow Conſul Quintus Criſpinus to the warres. He found Hanniball lying betwene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and ſought all the meanes he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. E army to beſiege the city of the LOCRIANS, ſurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS: (as ye would ſay, the occidentals, bicauſe the GREECIANS, in reſpect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he layd an ambuſh for them that went, vnder the hill of PETELIVM, which was directly in their way, where he ſlew about two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did ſette Marcellus on fire, and made him more deſirous of battell: whereupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched neater to his enemy. Betwene their two campes, there was a prety litle hill, ſtrong of ſcituacion, a wilde thing ouergrowen with wod, and there were high hillocks. Frō whēce they might diſcerne a great way, both the one & the others campe, & at the foote of the ſame ranne prety ſprings: Inſomuch as the ROMAINES wondered, that Hannibal comminge thither firſt, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. How-

F beit Hannibal was crafty enough, leauing it of purpoſe: for as it was commodious to lodge his campe in, ſo it ſerued his turne better for an ambuſh. So he filled the wodde, the hollow places, and the valleys there about, with ſtore of ſhot and ſpearemen, aſſuringe him ſelfe that the place woulde intyse the ROMAINES thither: and in deede he gesſed rightly, for so fell it out. Straight, there flew a rumor abroade in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a passing place to lodge in, and euery man tooke apon him like a skilfull souldier, to tell what vantage they should haue apon their enemies, by taking that place, and specially if they did lodge there, or otherwise built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to goe see the place himselfe, taking a few horsemen with him. Notwithstanding, before he would take horse, he called for his Soothsayer to sacrifice to the goddes. The first beast that was sacrificed, the Soothsayer shewed Marcellus the liuer of it without a head. The second beast sacrificed, had a fayer great head of a liuer, and all the other partes were also sounde, and very newe: that by them it appeared al the feare of the first ill signes and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothsayers on the other side sayd, it did make them worse afraid then before: for these so fauorable and lucky tokens of the sacrifice, followinge immediatly after the first fowle and nawghty signes, made them doubt them much by reason of so straunge and sodaine an alteracion. But as the Poet Pindarus sayth, Ill signes to Marcellus.

Nor force of burning fire, nor vvall of steele nor stone, nor vvhatsoeuer other thing, is here this earth vpon:

So Marcellus tooke his horse, with Quintus Crispinus his fellow Consull, and his sonne one of the Tribunes of the souldiers, hauing onely two hundred and twenty horsemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but all were THVSCANS, sauing forty FREGELLANIANS, who from the beginning of these warres had alwayes shewed themselues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hill we spake of before, being thicke couered with wodde and bushes, the enemies hadde set a skowte to watche on the toppe of it, to geue warning if they saw any comming towardes it. The ROMAINES coulde not see him, and he on the other side might see euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done, as he did aduertise those at that time that lay in ambushe for Marcellus comminge: and they suffered him to passe on, vntill he came directly against them. Then they shewed vpon the sodaine, and compassing in Marcellus, they both shot and strake at him, some following them that fled, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which only stucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the THVSCANS were fled) apon the first crie they heard, to defend the two Consulls, vntill such time as the Consull Crispinus hauinge two woundes on his body with a dart, did turne his horse to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus such a sore blowe with a speare hauinge a broade iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, beinge but a few in number, seeinge Marcellus slaine, left him lyinge on the grounde, and tooke his sonne away with them that was very sore hurt, and by the swiftnes of their horses recouered their campe, and saued them selues. At this ouerthrowe, there were not slayne aboue fortie men, and fiue and twentie taken prisonners, of which, fiue of them were the Consulls sergeauntes, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horsemen. Within few dayes after, the other Consull Crispinus died also of his hurtes, which was such a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, that both their Consulls were slaine at one battell. Now Hannibal made no great reckeninge of all that were slaine, or taken at this fielde: but when he heard that Marcellus selfe was slaine at this ouerthrow, he went him selfe straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the partes of him, he spake no proude word against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would haue done, that had slaine so valliant and daungerous an enemy: but wondering how he came to be slaine so straungely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that sealed his letters, and geuing his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honorably burnt, and then put all his bones and ashes into a siluer potte, on which he him selfe put a crowne of golde, and sent it vnto Marcellus sonne. It fortuned so, that certaine light horsemen of the NVMIDIANS mette with them that caried this siluer pot, and would haue taken it from them by force: but they stood to it, and woulde not

A not parte withall, and ſo fightinge and ſtriuing together for it, the bones and aſhes were ſcattered all about. Hannibal hearinge this, ſayed to them that were about him : ſee, howe nothinge can be, which the goddes will not. So he puniſhed the NVMIDIANS, and cared no more to gette Marcellus bones together, but perſwaded him ſelfe it was the will of the goddes he ſhoulde dye ſo ſtraungely, and that his body ſhoulde haue no buriall. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus wryte it thus : but Liuie, and Auguſtus Cæſar ſay, that the pot was caried vnto his ſonne, and honorably buried. Marcellus did conſecrate many monumentes in diuerſe places, beſides thoſe at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE : a place for young men to exerciſe them ſelues in. In the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires: many images and tables he brought from SYRACVSA. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of B Minerua, where among other, there is a ſtatue of his, and this epigramme grauen vnder it, as Poſidonius the Philoſopher wryteth.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

THeſe are the greateſt thinges and beſt worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doinges : and for their maners and naturall condicions otherwiſe, they were all one, bicauſe they were both valliant, painefull, and noble minded : ſauing that this difference onely was betwene them. That Marcellus in many cities he tooke by aſſault, did cruelly murder them, and ſpilt much bloode : where Epamınondas and Pelopidas contrarily did neuer put any to the ſword they ouercame, neither did they take away the libertie from any citie they tooke : and it is thought the THEBANS woulde not haue handeled the ORCHOMENIANS ſo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene preſent. Nowe for their actes, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of ſeruice that Marcellus did, with ſo ſmall a company of horſemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow ſo great a number of horſemen & footemen both, of the GAVLES: a thinge that neuer Generall but him ſelfe did, and ſpecially that ſlewe with his owne handes in the fielde, the Generall of his enemies. Which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto: for he ſeeking to kill Alexander the tyran of PHERES, was ſlaine firſt him ſelfe, and ſuffered that, which he deſired to haue done to an other. And yet for that ſeruice may be obiected, the battells of LEVCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with thoſe, there was no notable ambuſhe or ſecrete practiſe done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he ſlew the tyrans that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and ſodaine an enterpriſe ſtolen apon, as none was euer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hanniball, who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy: ſo were the THEBANS alſo at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithſtanding were ouercome of Pelopidas, at the battells of TEGYRA, and of LEVCTRES. Wheras Marcellus did neuer ſo much as once ouercome Hanniball, as Polybius wryteth, but remained vnconquered alwayes, vntill that Scipio ouercame him in battell. Notwithſtandinge, we do geue beſt credit to the reportes of Cæſar, Liuie, Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GREECIANS: who wryte, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hanniballs companies, howebeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to ſpeake of, & it ſeemeth rather, it was through ſome mockerie or deceite of that AFRICAN, then otherwiſe. Yet ſure it was a great matter, and worthy much cõmendacion, that the ROMAINES were brought to that corage, as they durſt abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, hauing loſt ſo many great ouerthrowes, & hauing ſo many generalls of their armies ſlaine in battell, and hauing the whole Empire of ROME in ſo great daunger of vtter deſtruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other generalls, that put the ROMAINES in hart againe, after ſo great and longe a feare thorowly rooted in them: and incoraged the ſouldiers alſo to longe to fight with their enemy, and not onely to hope, but to aſſure them ſelues of victory. For, where by reaſon of their continuall loſſes and fearefull ouerthrowes they hadde, they thought them ſelues happy men to eſcape Hannibals handes by runninge away: he taught them to be aſhamed to flie like cowardes, to confeſſe they were in diſtreſſe, to retyre, & leaue the fielde, before they had ouercome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell beinge generall, and Marcellus did ouercome more then any generall in his time: it might ſeeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, ſhould compare with the good happe of the other that was neuer ouercome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of SYRACVSA, & Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke, that it was more valliantly done of Pelopidas, to come ſo neere SPARTA as he did, and that he was the firſt that paſſed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, than it was of Marcellus to winne all SICILE. Vnles ſome paraduenture will ſay againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas acte, as alſo in the victorie of LEVCTRES: where no man liuing can pretend any parte of glory to the doinges of Marcellus. For he tooke SYRACVSA, being onely generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES without his fellow Conſull, and fought with Hanniball, without any mans helpe or incoragement (for all other were againſt it, and perſwaded the contrary) and he was the firſt that altered the maner of warres the ROMAINES vſed then, and that trained his ſouldiers, that they durſt fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the ſtraungeneſſe of either of their deathes doth greue me maruelouſly: as I do greatly wonder alſo, how Hanniball in ſo many battells as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwayes ſcape vnhurt. I can not but greatly commende alſo the valliantnes of one Chryſantas, whom Xenophon ſpeaketh of in his booke of the inſtitucion of Cyrus, ſaying: that he hauing lift vp his ſword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trompet ſound the retreate, he ſoftly retyred, & would not ſtrike him. Howbeit it ſeemeth Pelopidas is more to be excuſed: for beſide that he was very hot and deſirous of battel, yet his anger was honorable and iuſt, and moued him to ſeeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides ſayth:

Marcellus made the Romaines coragious.

Raſhnes in a Captaine deſerueth blame.

The valliantnes and obedience of Chryſantas a ſouldier.

The

The best that may betyde, is vvhen a captaine liues, and doth suruiue the victories, vvhich he vvith force achieues.
But if he needes must fall, then let him valliantly euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there vvith honor dye.

For so becometh his death famous, & not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there an other respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his victorie ended, in the death of the tyran. Otherwise he shoulde hardly haue founde so noble an occasion to haue shewed his valliantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and hauinge no cause of heate or choller, (which putteth all men valliant in fight besides them selues, that they know not what they do) did rashly, and vnaduisedly thrust him selfe into the middest of the daunger, where he dyed not as a generall, but as a light horseman and skowt, (forsakinge his three triumphes, his fiue Consullshippes, and his spoyles and tokens of triumphe, which he had gotten of kinges with his owne hands) among venturous SPANIARDS and NVMIDIANS, that solde their blood and liues for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with thē selues (as a man would say) for so great and happy a victory, to haue slaine amongest FREGELLANIAN skowtes, and light horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMAINES. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two famous men, but as a griefe onely of them and their valliantnes: which they imployed so, as they bleamished all their other vertues, by the vndiscrete hazarding of their persones and liues without cause, as if they woulde and shoulde haue dyed for them selues, and not rather for their contry and frendes. And also when they were dead, Pelopidas was buried by the allies & confederats of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was slaine: and Marcellus in like maner, by the enemies selues that hadde slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondered at. That the enemy him selfe shoulde honor his valliantriesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of frendshippe performed by a thankefull frende. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honor his deade enemy, then the admiration of his worthines: and the frende sheweth frendeship many times, rather for respect of the benefit he hath receiued, then for the loue he beareth to his vertue.

Plutarch excuseth his free speech and Iudgement of these famous men.

The ende of Marcellus life.

THE LIFE OF Aristides.

Aristides wealth.

Aristides the sonne of Lysimachus, was certeinly of the tribe of Antiochides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goodes and wealth, they diuersely write of him. For some say, he liued poorely all the daies of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeres after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do cõfirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, wryteth the contrary: that he knew certeine landes Aristides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Aristides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to shew that he was well to liue, and that his house was rich and wealthy, he bringeth foorth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare mayer or prouost of ATHENS, whom they called, Archon Eponymos, bicause the yeare tooke the name of him that hadde it yearely. And they say he came to it, by drawing of the beane, according to the auncient vse of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of makinge their election of the said office: In which election none were admitted to drawe the beane, but such as were highest set in their subsidie bookes, according to the value & rate of their goodes, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would say, those that might dispend fiue hundred bushels of wheate by the yere, and vpwards. Secondly, he alleageth he was banished by the Ostracismon, which banisheth the nobilitie and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, bicause of their greatnesse, and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes is, that he left of his gift, three footed stooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer vp, as haue won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other such like pastimes, wherof they them selues had borne the charge. And those threefooted stooles remaine there yet, which they say were geuen by Aristides, and haue this inscription vppon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Aristides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archestratus the Poet taught them to playe his comedies. This last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whome euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes liued in great pouertie) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke apon him to defraye the charges of games that were of no small expence, the one hauing borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dawnce of the children

A which dawnced in a rounde at ATHENS: towards the furnithing of which charges, Dion the SYRACVSAN gaue Plato money, and Pelopidas alſo gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not ſpoken that vertuous men ſhould alwayes refuſe the gifts of their frends, and that they might not in ſome ſorte accept their frendes curteſie offered them: but bicauſe they ſhould thinke it vncomely and diſhonorable for them, to take any thing to enrich them ſelues, or to ſpare and hourde vp. Howebeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike ſhow to be made, not tending to their priuate benefit: in ſuch a caſe they ſhould not refuſe their frendes louing offer, and goodwill towardes them. And where Demetrius ſaith the three footed ſtoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panætius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceaued by the ſemblance of the name. For ſince the time of the warres of the MEDES, vnto B the beginninge of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, in all the regiſters and recordes kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were founde but two men bearinge name of Ariſtides, that obteined victory: & neither of them both was ſonne vnto Lyſimachus, whom we wryte of at this preſent. For the one is expreſly named the ſonne of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the ſame Ariſtides we now ſpeake of: as appeareth eaſily by the wrytinge and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we haue vſed in GREECE euer ſince Euclides time. Moreouer it is eaſie to be knowen, by the name of the Poet Archeſtratus that is adioyned to it. For there is no man that maketh mencion of a Poet of this name, in all the warres of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many doe put him in for an author and maker of rymes and ſonges that were ſong in common daunces. Yet C for all Panætius obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and conſidered of. But for the Oſtraciſinon baniſhment, it is true, that ſuch as were great men in eſtimacion aboue the common people, either in fame, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were ſubiect vnto this baniſhment. For Damon himſelfe, beinge Pericles ſchoolemaiſter, was baniſhed: onely bicauſe the common people thought him to wiſe. Moreouer, Idomeneus wryteth, that Ariſtides was their prouoſt for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voyces of the ATHENIANS that choſe him. And if he were prouoſt ſince the iorney of PLATEES, as Demetrius wryteth: it is likely enough that they didde him this honor, for his great vertue and notable ſeruice, which other were wont to obteine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defende Ariſtides, but alſo Socrates pouerty, as if it were a fowle vyce and reproche to be poore. For he wryteth, that D he had not only a houſe of his owne, but alſo three ſcore and ten Minas at vſery, which Criton gaue him intereſt for. But now to our ſtory againe. Ariſtides was Cliſthenes very frend, he that reſtored the gouernment at ATHENS after the expulſion of the thirty tyrannes, and did reuerence Lycurgus the Lawmaker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauored the ſtate of Ariſtocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the ſouerainty. Howbeit he euer had Themiſtocles (Neocles ſonne) his continuall aduerſary, as takinge parte with the contrary, and defending the popular ſtate of gouernment. Some ſay, that being ſchollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one to an other in all their actions and doinges, were it in ſporte, or in matters of earneſt: and euer after, men beganne to ſee the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections. E For Themiſtocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and ſubtill, and would venter on any thing, apon light occaſion. Ariſtides contrariwiſe was very quiet, temperate, conſtant, and maruelous well ſtayed, who woulde for no reſpect be drawen away from equity and iuſtice, neither would lye, flatter, nor abuſe any body, though it were but in ſporte. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtus of CHIO wryteth, that their malice beganne firſt of light loue, and that it grewe to greatneſſe by proceſſe of time betwene them: for (ſayeth he) both the one and the other of them fell in loue with Steſileus, borne in the Ile of CEOS. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eaſily from them, nor the enuy they conceiued one againſt an other, but continued againſt eche other in matters of ſtate: ſuch was their malice towardes one an other. In which calling, Themiſtocles ſought the way to winne frendes, by whoſe meanes he came to great preferment in ſhorte F time, and had made him ſelfe very ſtrong by them. Therefore, when a frende of his tolde him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fitte for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall. gouernour, where my frendes ſhoulde not finde more fauor then ſtraungers, that doe me no pleaſure. But Ariſtides taking an other courſe by him ſelfe, would not ſtande apon his frendes in gouernment. Firſt, bicauſe he woulde do no man wrong, with pleaſuring his frendes: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requeſtes. Secondly, bicauſe he ſaw many rulers and men of authority bolde to do iniuſtice, and manifeſt wrong, bearinge them ſelues apon their frendes: but he caried this opinion, that no honeſt man, or good citizen, ſhoulde truſt to any bolſtring of frendes, but to his owne iuſt and vpright doings. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtides perceiuinge that Themiſtocles did raſhly alter many thinges, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings: he was enforced ſomtime to croſſe Themiſtocles againe, & to ſpeake againſt that he preferred, partely to be euen with him, but moſt to hinder his credit and authority, which increaſed ſtill through the peoples fauor and goodwilles towardes him: thinking it better by contrarying him a litle to diſapoint ſometime a thing that might haue fallen out well for the common wealth, rather then by geuing him the head, to ſuffer him to grow to great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themiſtocles hauing preferred a matter very profitable for the common wealth, Ariſtides was ſo much againſt it, as Themiſtocles purpoſe tooke no place. Moreouer Ariſtides was ſo earneſt againſt him, that when the counſaill brake vp after Themiſtocles motion was reiected, he ſpake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of ATHENS would neuer proſper, vntill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a priſon or hole, wherein they put all theeues and condemned men. An other time, Ariſtides moued a matter to the people, which diuerſe were againſt, but yet it went with him. And when the iudge or preſident of the counſaill did put it to the people, to knowe their allowance of it: Ariſtides perceiuing by the argumentes made againſt it, that the matter he preferred was hurtfull to the common wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it paſſe. Many times alſo Ariſtides ſpake by other men, when he would haue a thing go forward, for feare leaſt Themiſtocles ſpight towardes him, woulde hinder the benefitte of the common wealth. They founde him very conſtant and reſolute in matters of ſtate, whatſoeuer happened: which wanne him great commẽdacion. For he was neuer the prouder for any honor they gaue him, nor thought him ſelfe diſgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwayes of this minde, that it was the duety of an honeſt citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to doe his contry ſeruice, without reſpect and hope of reward of money, or for honor and glory. Therefore when certeine verſes were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of AEſchilus, made in commendacion of the auncient Soothſayer Amphiaraus, to this effect.

All the people ſtraight caſt their eyes vpon Ariſtides, as vppon him, that in troth aboue all other moſt deſerued the praiſe of ſo great a vertue. For he was ſo ſtoute and reſolute, not only to reſiſt fauor and frendſhippe: but to reiect hate and anger alſo. For in caſe of iuſtice, neither coulde frendſhippe make him go away for his frendes ſake: nor enuy coulde moue him to do iniuſtice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is wrytten, that he had an enemie of his in ſute of law, & did proſecute it to iudgement: inſomuch as after the plaint was red, the iudges were ſo angrie with the offendor, that without any more hearinge of him, they woulde haue geuen ſentence againſt him. But Ariſtides riſing from his place, went & kneeled at the iudges feete with the offendor his enemy, and beſought them to geue him leaue to ſpeake, to iuſtifie and defende his cauſe, according to the courſe of the law. An other time he being iudge betwene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them ſayd vnto him: Ariſtides, this fellow mine aduerſary here, hath done you great iniurie. My frende (quod Ariſtides againe) I pray thee tell me onely the iniury he hath done thee, for I am iudge here to do thee right, and not my ſelfe. Moreouer, he beinge choſen high treaſorer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, and other his late predeceſſors, hadde greatly robbed and ſpoyled the common treaſure, but ſpecially Themiſtocles: who was a wiſe man, & of great iudgement, but yet ſomewhat light fingered. Therefore when Ariſtides was to geue vppe his accompt, accompt, Themiſtocles, and many other ſuborned by him, were againſt him, and accuſed him for abuſing his office, and followed him ſo hard, that through their practiſe they condemned him, as Idomeneus wryteth. Yet the nobleſt citizens ſeeing what iniury they offered Ariſtides, tooke his cauſe in hande, and founde meanes to procure the people not onely to releaſe the fine impoſed vpon him, but to reſtore him againe to his office of high treaſorer for the yeare following: in the which he ſeemed to repent his former ſtraightnes and gouernment the yere before, and ſo dealt more fauorably with thoſe he hadde to do, and would not examine euery thing ſo ſtraightly as he did before. Whereupon ſuch as were theeues and ſtealers of the treaſure of the common wealth, did maruelouſly praiſe and like him, and became ſuters for him to continew in the office. But when the day of election came, that the Athenians woulde chooſe him againe, Ariſtides ſelfe reproued them, and ſayd. When I faithfully diſcharged the duety of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued ſhame and reproche at your handes: and now that I haue diſſembled, not ſeeminge to ſee the theftes and robberies done apon your treaſure, ye claw me, and ſay I am an honeſt man, and a good citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more aſhamed of the honor you do me now, then I was of the fine you did ſet apon me, when you condemned me the laſt yeare: and I am ſorie to ſpeake it, that you ſhoulde thinke it more commendation to pleaſure the wicked, then to preſerue the common wealth. After he had ſpoken theſe words, and had bewrayed the common theftes the officers of the city did commit: he ſtopped the theeues mouthes that ſo highly praiſed and commended him for ſo honeſt a man, but yet of the noble and honeſt citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of Persia, was come with all his nauy to go a lande about Marathon, in the contrie of Attica, apon pretence (as he ſayd) to be reuenged onely of the Athenians that had burnt the city of Sardis, but in dede of minde to conquer all Greece, and to deſtroy the whole contrie before him: the Athenians choſe tenne Captaines to go to the warres, amonge whom Miltiades was the chiefeſt man of authority. But Ariſtides drew very neere him in reputacion and creditte, bicauſe he did very good ſeruice in obtaining the victorie, ſpecially when he agreed with Miltiades in counſaill, to geue battell apon the barbarous people: and alſo when he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For euery one of the tenne Captaines did by turnes leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Ariſtides turne came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no ſhame, but honor for them, to be ruled by the wiſeſt. Thus by his example, he appeaſed all ſtrife that might haue growen amonge them, and perſwaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counſaill, that had beſt experience in warre. And ſo he did much aduaunce Miltiades honor. For, after that Ariſtides had once yelded his authority vnto him, euery one of the reſt did the like when it came to their turne: and ſo they all ſubmitted them ſelues vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battel, the place where the Athenians were moſt combred, was in the middeſt of the battell, where they had ſet the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, and made their greateſt fight in that place. By which occaſion, Themiſtocles and Ariſtides fighting one hard by an other, for that the one was of the tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one an other: ſo as the barbarous people at the laſt being ouerthrowen, they made them flie, and draue them to their ſhippes. But when they were imbarked & gone, the Captaines of the Athenians perceiuing they made not towardes the Iles which was their direct courſe to returne into Asia, but that they were driuen backe by ſtorme of winde and pyrries of the ſea, towardes the coaſt of Attica, and the city of Athens, fearinge leaſt they might finde Athens vnfurniſhed for defence, and might ſet apon it: they thereupon ſent away preſently nine tribes that marched thither with ſuch ſpeede, as they came to Athens the very ſame day, and left Ariſtides in the campe at Marathon, with his tribe and contry men, to looke to the priſoners and ſpoyle they hadde wonne of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of his wiſdom. For notwithſtanding there was great ſtore of golde and ſiluer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goodes and riches in all their tentes and pauillions, and in the ſhippes alſo they had taken of theirs: he was not ſo couetous as once to touch them, nor to ſuffer any other to medle with them, vnleſſe by ſtealth ſome prouided for them ſelues. As amongſt other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Prieſtes, called Dadouchos, as you woulde ſaye the torche bearer: (for in the ſecret ſacrifices of Ceres, his office was to holde the torche) whom when one of the barbarous people ſaw, and how he ware a bande about his head, and long heare, he toke him for ſome king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kiſſed his hand, and ſhewed him great ſtore of golde he hadde hidden and buried in a ditche. But Callias, like a moſt cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore ſoule that had ſhewed him the place, bicauſe he ſhoulde not tell it to others. Hereof it commeth, that the comicall Poets do call thoſe that came of him in mockery, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a ditch: bicauſe of the golde that Callias founde in it. Immediatly after this battell, Ariſtides was choſen prouoſt of Athens for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a litle before his death, after the iorney of Platees. For in their Chronicles, where they ſet in order their prouoſts of Athens for the yere, ſince Xanthippides time, there appeareth no one name of Ariſtides in that yeare, that Mardonius the kinge of Persiaes Lieutenant was ouerthrowen by Platees, which was many yeares after. But contrariwiſe they finde Ariſtides enrolled amonge the prouoſtes immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at Marathon. Now the people did moſt commende Ariſtides iuſtice, as of all other his vertues and qualities: bicauſe that vertue is moſt common and in vſe in our life, and deliuereth moſt benefitte to men. Hereof it came, that he beinge a meane man, obteined the worthieſt name that one coulde haue, to be called by the whole city, a iuſt man. This ſurname was neuer deſired of kinges, princes, nor of tyrannes, but they alwayes delited to be ſurnamed, ſome Poliorcetes, to ſay, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to ſay, lightening or terrible: other Nicanores, to ſay, ſubduers: and ſome other, Aeti and Hieraces, to ſay Eagles or Fawcons, or ſuch like birdes that praye: deſiringe rather (as it ſhould appeare by thoſe ſurnames) the praiſe and reputacion growinge by force and power, then the commendacion that riſeth by vertue and goodnes. And notwithſtanding, God whom men deſire moſt to be likened to, doth excell all humaine nature in three ſpeciall thinges: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the moſt honorable and pretious thing. For as the naturall Philoſophers reaſon, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and ſo are force and power, earthquakes, lighteninge, terrible ſtormes, runninge riuers, and inundacions of waters: but as for iuſtice and equity, no man is partaker of them, ſaue onely God, by meanes of reaſon and vnderſtandinge. Therefore, bicauſe men commonly haue three ſundry honors to the gods: the firſt, that they thinke them bleſſed: the ſecond, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleſſed, for the eternitie and immortality of their godhead: that they feare them, bicauſe of their omnipotency & power: and that they loue and worſhippe them, for their iuſtice and equitie. And yet notwithſtanding, of thoſe three, men do couet immortality, which no fleſh can attaine vnto: and alſo power, which dependeth moſt vppon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the goddes of their goodnes haue made vs capable. But here they ſhewe themſelues fooles. For iuſtice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, ſeeme diuine and celeſtiall: where without iuſtice, and dealinge vniuſtly, his life is moſt beaſtly, and odious to the worlde. But now againe to Ariſtides. This ſurname of a iuſt man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwardes it turned him to great ill will, and ſpecially by Themiſtocles practiſe. Who gaue it out euery where, that Ariſtides had ouerthrowen all iuſtice, bicauſe by conſent of the parties he was euer choſen Arbitrator to ende all controuerſies: & how by this meanes he ſecretly had procured the abſolute power of a kinge, not needing any gard or ſouldiers about him. The people moreouer beinge growen very diſſolute and licentious, by reaſon of the victorie of Marathon, who ſought that all thinges ſhould paſſe by them, and their authoritie: beganne nowe to miſlike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man ſhould go before the reſt in good fame and reputacion. Whereupon, they came out of all ſhyeres of Attica into the city of Athens, and ſo baniſhed Ariſtides with the Oſtraciſmon: diſguiſing the enuy they bare to his glory, with the name of feare of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called Ostracismon, or Exostracismon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to gene it an honest cloke, they sayd it was onely a pulling downe and tying shorte, of to much greatnesse and authority, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise, thē a gentle meane to qualify the peoples enuy against some priuate person: which enuy bred no malice to him whose greatnes did offende them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for tenne yeares. But afterwardes that by practise, this Ostracismon banishment was layed apon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished: they neuer after vsed it any more at Athens. And by the way, it shall not be amisse to tell you here, why, & wherfore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of Athens at that time, and they both were euer at square together, a common thing amongest great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples assembling, that they went about to execute the Ostracismon, were maruelously afrayed it was ment to banishe one of them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers frends with eche other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, insomuch, when the most voyces of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they founde it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to see the Ostracismon so embased and scorned, that they neuer after woulde vse it againe, and so left it of for euer. But briefely to let you vnderstande what the Ostracismon was, and after what sorte they vsed it, ye are to know: that at a certaine day appointed, euery citizen caried a great shell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he woulde haue banished, and brought it into a certeine place railed about with wodden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man hadde brought in his shell: the magistrates, and officers of the city, did count and tell the number of them. For if there were lesse then sixe thowsand citizens, that had thus brought these shels together: the Ostracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they layd a parte euery mans name written in these shels: and whose name they founde wrytten by most citizens, they proclaimed him by sounde of trompet, a banished man for tenne yeares, during which time notwithstanding, the party did enioy all his goodes. Now euery man wryting thus his name in a shell, whom they would haue banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the contry (very simple) that coulde neither wryte, nor read, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) & gaue him his shell, praying him to wryte Aristides name vpon it. He beinge abashed withall, did aske the contrie man, if Aristides had euer done him any displeasure. No, sayed the contrie man, he neuer did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it greeues me to heare euery man call him a iust man. Aristides hearing him say so, gaue him no aunswere, but wrote his owne name vpon the shell, and deliuered it againe to the contrie man. But as he went his way out of the citie, he lift vppe his handes to heauen, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, besechinge the goddes that the Athenians might neuer haue such troubles in hande, as they shoulde be compelled to call for Aristides againe. Notwithstandinge, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of Persia came with his army through the contries of Thessalie and Boeotia, and entred into the heart of the contrie of Attica: the Athenians reuoking the law of their Ostracismon, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, bicause they were afrayd Aristides would take parte with the barbarous people, and that his example should moue many other to do the like, wherin they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man. For before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, perswading and incoraginge the Greecians to mainteine and defende their liberty. After that lawe was repealed, and published, and that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant generall of Athens, he did alwayes faithfully aide and assist him in all thinges, as well with his trauell, as also with his counsaill: and thereby wanne his enemy great honor, bicause it stoode apon the safetie and preseruation of his contrie. For when Eurybiades, generall of the armie of the Greecians, had determined to forsake the Ile of Salamina, & that the gallyes of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and had enuironned the Iles all about, & the mouth of the arme of the straight of Salamina, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Ile of AEgina with a maruelous boldenes, ventred through the middeſt of all the barbarous ſhippes and fleete, and by good happe gotte in the night into Themiſtocles tent, and calling him out, ſpake with him there in this ſorte. Themiſtocles, if we be both wiſe, it is high time we ſhoulde nowe leaue of this vaine enuie and ſpite we haue longe time borne eche other, and that we ſhould enter into an other ſorte of enuy more honorable and profitable for vs both. I meane, which of vs two ſhould do his beſt indeuor to ſaue GREECE: you, by ruling and commaunding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counſelling you for the beſt, and executing your commaundement: conſideringe you are the man alone that will roundlieſt come vnto the point that is beſt: which is in my opinion, that we ſhoulde hazard battell by ſea within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, and that as ſoone as might be poſſible. But if our frendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do aſſure you, your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is ſayd, that the ſea, both before and behinde vs, and rounde about vs, is couered all ouer with their ſhippes, ſo as they that would not before, ſhall be now compelled of force, and in ſpite of their heartes, to fight and beſturre them like men: bicauſe they are compaſſed in all about, and there is no paſſage left open for them to eſcape, nor to flie. Whereunto Themiſtocles aunſwered. I am ſory, Ariſtides, that herein your honeſty appeareth greater then mine: but ſince it is ſo, that you haue deſerued the honor in beginning, and procuring ſuch an honorable and commendable ſtrife betwene vs, I will henceforth indeuor my ſelfe to excede you in continuing this your deſire. After which aunſwere, he told Ariſtides, how he purpoſed to mocke the barbarous kinge, and prayed him to intreate Eurybiades to yelde to his deuiſe, & to perſwade him that there was no other way to ſaue GREECE, but to fight by ſea: for Eurybiades gaue more creditte to Ariſtides perſwaſions, then he did to Themiſtocles wordes. For when all the Captaines were called to counſell, to determine whether they ſhould geue battell or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN ſayd to Themiſtocles, that his counſell did not like Ariſtides at all, as it ſeemed, bicauſe he ſpake neuer a worde to it being preſent. Ariſtides anſwered him ſtraight, that he vtterly miſtooke him. For, quod he, if I did not thinke his counſell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any good will I beare him, but bicauſe I finde his counſell wiſe and ſounde. While the Captaines of the GREECIANS were reaſoning in this ſorte, Ariſtides ſeeing PSYTTALEA (a litle Ilande before SALAMINA within the ſtraight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valliantеſt and luſtieſt ſouldiers he hadde of all his contry men, into the leaſt foyſtes or pynnaſies he had among all his gallyes: and went with them, and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrewe all the barbarous people he founde there, and put them to the ſworde euery man, taking the chiefeſt of them only priſoners, among which, were three ſonnes of Sandauce, the kinges ſiſter, whome he ſent vnto Themiſtocles. Theſe three Lordes were all ſlaine by the commaundement of Euphrantidas the Soothſayer, and ſacrificed to Bacchus Omeſtes, as to ſay, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw fleſh, and all vpon an oracle they had receiued. That done, Ariſtides diſperſed his ſouldiers about the Ile, to receiue all ſuch as were by fortune of warre, or of the ſea, caſt into the Ilande: to the end that no enemy of theirs ſhould ſcape their hands, nor any of his frendes ſhould periſh. For the greateſt fleete of all their ſhippes, and the ſharpeſt encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Ilande: and therefore the tokens of triumphe were ſet there. After the battell was wonne, Themiſtocles to feele Ariſtides opinion, ſayed vnto him: we haue done a good peece of ſeruice, but yet there is an other behinde of greater importance, and that is this. We muſt bringe all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may eaſily do, if we ſaile with all ſpeede to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Ariſtides cried out, ſtay there, neuer ſpeake of that: but I pray you let vs rather ſeeke al the wayes we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of GREECE, leaſt if we kepe him in ſtill with ſo great an army (and he ſhall ſee no way before him to eſcape out) we driue him then to fight like a deſperate man, and perill our ſelues, we can not tell to what. When Themiſtocles had hearde his opinion, he ſecretely ſent the euenuke Arnaces his priſoner, vnto kinge Xerxes, to aduertiſe him from him, that he had altered the GREECIANS purpoſe, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he hadde made at the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to paſſe ouer his army: and that he was the willinger to let him vnderſtande it, that he might the better prouide for the ſafety of his perſon. King Xerxes being netled with this

this aduertiſement, tooke ſtraight his iorney, and with all ſpeede went to recouer the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant general in GREECE, with three hundred thowſand of the beſt ſouldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruelouſly dreaded of all the GREECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he hadde by lande, and he did threaten them alſo by his letters he wrote vnto them. You haue, (ſayed he) with your ſhippes by ſea, ouercome men acquainted to fight by lande, and that neuer handeled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fieldes of BOEOTIA, are very fayer and large for horſemen and footemen to make proofe of their valliantnes, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the kinge his maiſters commaundement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to builde vp their city againe, to geue them a great pencion, and furthermore to make them Lordes of all GREECE, ſo they woulde geue ouer, and leaue of theſe warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS beinge forthwith aduertiſed of his letters wrytten to the ATHENIANS, and fearing leaſt they would haue bene perſwaded by them: ſent their Ambaſſadors with al ſpeede to ATHENS, to pray them to ſend their wiues and children vnto SPARTA, and alſo to offer them vittailles, to relieue their poore olde people, bicauſe of the great ſcarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt and raſed, and all their contry beſides deſtroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambaſſadors of LACEDÆMON, made them a maruelous anſwer through Ariſtides counſell, and this it was. That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all thinges were to be ſold for gold & ſiluer, bicauſe they eſteemed nothing more pretious, nor better in this world, then to be riche and wealthy: but on the other ſide, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they only regarded the preſent pouerty and neceſſity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue and noble corage, thinking to make them fight more valliantly for the preſeruacion of GREECE, by offering them vittells to liue withall. The people approuing this aunſwere, Ariſtides then cauſed the Ambaſſadors of SPARTA to come to the aſſembly, and commaunded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by worde of mouth, that all the golde aboue, or vnder the grounde, coulde not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any ſumme of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GREECE: & to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he ſhewed him the ſunne, and ſayd vnto him: ſo long as yonder ſunne keepeth his courſe about the worlde, ſo long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the PERSIANS, bicauſe they haue ſpoyled and deſtroyed all their contry, and haue defiled and burnt the temples of their goddes. Beſides, he willed that the Prieſtes, by commaundement of the people, ſhoulde excommunicate and curſe him that woulde procure them to ſende vnto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their league and allyance with the other GREECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the ſeconde time to ouerrunne the contry of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS got thē againe into the Ile of SALAMINA, and then they ſent Ariſtides Ambaſſador vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He ſharpely tooke them vp, and reproued their ſloth and negligence, bicauſe they had againe forſaken ATHENS, and left it to the ſpoyle of the barbarous people: and prayed them yet they woulde looke to ſaue the reſt of GREECE. The Ephori (which were certeine officers that ruled all things within the city of SPARTA) when they had hearde Ariſtides perſwaſions: ſtraight tooke order for ayde, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their ſolemne feaſtes they called Hyacinthia. Howebeit the next night following, they ſent out fiue thowſande citizens borne in SPARTA, into the fielde, all proper men and valliant ſouldiers, euery one of them carying with him, ſeuen Ilotes (which are the contry men and ſlaues in the contrie of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS priuy to it at all. Wherefore Ariſtides came againe an other time into their counſell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughinge, and ſayd he dreamed, or elſe he mocked them: for their army which they had ſent againſt the ſtraungers (for ſo they called the PERSIANS) was already at the city of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Ariſtides hearing their aunſwere, replyed, that they were to blame to mocke them in that ſorte, to ſende away their men ſo ſecretly, that they might not knowe of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceiue their frendes, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his ſtory reporteth the matter

thus in euery point. Notwithstanding, in the decree that was made to sende Ambassadors to SPARTA, Aristides is not named for Ambassador, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Myronides. Afterwardes Aristides was chosen by voyces of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS, in this warre against the PERSIANS, and went vnto the campe of the GREECIANS by the citie of PLATÆES, with eight thousande footemen wel armed and appointed. There he found king Pausanias the only general of all the whole power and army of the GREECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his campe one after an other, a maruelous great multitude of other GREECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incāped all alongest the riuer of ASOPVS: but bicause their campe stretched out a maruelous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had onely fortified a peece of grounde foure square with a walle about, which was ten furlonges on euery side, to place all their cariage and chiefest thinges in. And for the GREECIANS againe, the foothsayer Tisamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Pausanias, & all the GREECIANS together, that they should haue the victory, so they did not assault at all, but only defend. And Aristides, that had sent to the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the name of the ATHENIANS, had aunswer: they should ouercome their enemies, so they did sacrifice and make speciall prayers, vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount CITHÆRON, vnto Pan, and vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, and also vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Damocrates, Hypsion, Actæon, & Polyidus: and so that they did hazard battel also within their owne territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and of Proserpina. This oracle troubled Aristides maruelously, bicause the demy goddes whome they had commaundement to do sacrifice vnto, were the fownders and auncesters of the PLATÆIANS: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the toppes of mount CITHÆRON, looking towards the west, where the sunne setteth in sommer. They say there was an oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many inhabitants thereabouts, and bestraught them of their wittes: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepty, as who would say, taken with the Nymphes. And againe to tel the ATHENIANS they shoulde haue the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to sende them backe againe into the contry of ATTICA. Aristides being thus perplexed, Arimnestus Captaine of the PLATÆIANS, hadde such a vision in the night in his sleepe. Him thought that Iupiter the sauior did appeare vntohim, and asked him what the GREECIANS intended to do? and that he answered: my Lord, we must to morrowe remoue our campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, and there we will fight with the barbarous people, accordinge to the commaundement the oracle Apollo hath geuen vs. Then that Iupiter replyed, that they were greatly deceaued: for all that Apollo had declared by his oracle was ment within the territorie of the PLATÆIANS, and that they shoulde finde it true, if they considered it well. Arimnestus hauinge plainely seene this vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight sent for the oldest citizens, and consideringe with them where this place shoulde be, he founde at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, by the city of NYSIA, there was an olde temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleusinian, and of her daughter Proserpina. When he hearde them say so, he went straight and tolde Aristides of it, and founde that it was an excellent place to set an army in battell raye, that hadde but fewe horsemen: for that the foote of mount CITHÆRON did lette the horsemen, they coulde not goe to the place where the temple stoode, and where the playne and valley did ende: besides also, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wodde rounde about it. And bicause they shoulde lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commaundement of the oracle for hope of victory: the PLATÆIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and aduise) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATÆES should be taken away towardes ATHENS side, and that the lande thereof shoulde be geuen clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, bicause they shoulde fight with the barbarous people in their owne lande, for the defence and preseruation of GREECE, accordinge to the commaundement of the oracle. This noble gift and present of the PLATÆIANS was so famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of ASIA, built vp the walles againe of the city of PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a herauld

The magnanimity of the Platæians.

Alexander the great doth honor the Platæians for their noble mindes.

A herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympicall: that Alexander hadde done the PLATÆIANS that honor and dignitie, for a memoriall and honor of their magnanimity. Bicause in the warre againſt the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally geuen away their lande vnto the ATHENIANS, for the ſafetie of the GREECIANS: and had ſhewed them ſelues of a noble corage alſo, and very willinge to defende the ſtate of GREECE. Now when the army of the GREECIANS came to be ſette in order of battell, there fell a ſtrife betwene the ATHENIANS and the TEGEATES, bicauſe the ATHENIANS would nedes (according to their old cuſtome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right winge: and the TEGEATES on the contrary parte, woulde haue the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alleaging the famous acts and notable ſeruice of their auncеſters in former warres, whereupon Strife betwene the Athenians & Tegeates.

B the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Ariſtides ſtept betwene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contende with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valliantneſſe: and as for you, my Lords of SPARTA, ſayed he, and you alſo my maiſters of GREECE: we tell you, that the place neither geueth nor taketh vertue away, and we doe aſſure you that whereſoeuer you place vs, we will ſo defend and kepe it, as we will not impayre nor blemiſh the honor we haue wonne in former foughten battells, and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarell and fall out with our frends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to bragge of our anceſters doings, but to ſhow our ſelues valliant in defence of al GREECE. For this battail wil make good proofe to all the GREECIANS, how much eſtimacion euery city, euery Captaine, & particular perſon wil deſerue for his parte. When Ariſtides had ſpoken, the Captaines & all Ariſtides wiſely pacifieth the mutinie.

C other of the counſel concluded in fauor of the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould haue one of the winges of the battell. But by this meanes, all GREECE ſtoode in maruelous garboyle at that time, and the ſtate of the ATHENIANS ſpecially in great daunger. For a number of the nobleſt citizens of ATHENS. And that brought great ſubſtance with them to the warres, being now at low ſtate, & in pouerty, their goods being ſpent & gone, & ſeeing thē ſelues diſcountenāced, not bearing that rule & authority in the common wealth they were wont to do, bicauſe other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and met at a houſe in the city of PLATÆES, & there conſpyred to ouerthrow the authority of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpoſe, then that they would rather looſe all, and betray their contry vnto the barbarous people. While theſe thinges were pra-

The conſpiracy of the rich noble men of Athens.

D ctiſed in the campe, many beinge of the conſpiracy, Ariſtides came to an Incklinge of it, and was maruelouſly afrayed, bicauſe of the time: wherefore he beganne to be carefull of the matter, being of ſuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderſtand the whole conſpiracy, litle knowing what a number might be drawen into this treaſon, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather reſpected that which was iuſt, then what was profitable for the time. So he cauſed eight perſones only of the great number to be apprehended, and of theſe eight, the two firſt whom they would haue indited as principalles, and were moſt to be burdened for the conſpiracy, AEſchines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egeſias of the towne of ACHARNA, they founde meanes to flie out of the campe, and to ſaue themſelues. And for the other, Ariſtides ſet them at liberty, and gaue them occaſion that were not diſcouered, to be bold, and to

E repent them of their follies: ſaying, that the battell ſhould be their iudge, where they ſhould purge them ſelues of all accuſations layed againſt them, and ſhow the world alſo, that they neuer had any other intencion but honeſt, and good, towards their contry. Mardonius, to proue the corage of the GREECIANS, had ſent all his horſemen, (wherein he was farre ſtronger then the GREECIANS) to skirmiſh with thē. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, in ſtrong places and full of ſtones, ſauing the three thouſande MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reaſon whereof, they were ſore troubled and hurt, by the horſemen of the barbarous people that ſette vppon them on euery ſide, for they might charge them where they woulde. Inſomuch, in the ende, perceiuinge they alone could no longer reſiſt the force of ſo great a multitude of the barbarous people: they ſent with all ſpeede poſſible to Pauſanias, to Mount Citheron.

F pray him to ſend them preſent aide. Pauſanias hearing this newes, and ſeeing in his owne ſight the campe of the MEGARIANS almoſt all couered with ſhot and dartes which the barbarous people threw at them, & that they were compelled to ſtand cloſe together in a litle corner: he wiſt not what to do. For, to go thither in perſon with the LACEDÆMONIANS that were foote men heauy armed, he thought that was no way to help them. So he proued to put ſome ambitious deſire and enuy of honor, among the priuate Captaines and generalls of the army of the other GREECIANS, which were then about him: to ſee if he coulde moue any mans courage and deſire, to offer him ſelfe willingly to goe aide the MEGARIANS. Howebeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariſtides: who promiſed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the fielde, (one of the valliantest Captaines that ſerued vnder him) with his company of three hundred choſen men, and certaine ſhot mingled amongeſt them. Theſe ſouldiers were ready in a moment, and marched ſtraight in battell ray, a great pace towards the barbarous people. Maſiſtius, that was generall of the horſemen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their comming towards him: turned his horſe, and gallopped to them. The ATHENIANS taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hotte, bicauſe both the one and the other ſide did the beſt they could at this firſt onſet to put the reſt of the battell in ieopardy: and they fought ſo long, that Maſiſtius horſe was ſhot through the body with an arrow, that put him to ſuch paine, as he neuer lin flinging, till he caſt his maiſter on the ground, armed as he was at all peces. So being on the ground, he could not riſe againe, as well for the waight of his armor, as for that the ATHENIANS came ſo ſodainely vpon him. And notwithſtanding there were many about him to hew him in peces, yet they could find no way how to kill him, he was ſo throughly armed and loden with gold, copper, & iron, not only vppon his body and his heade, but alſo on his legges and armes: vntill at the length there was one that thruſt the head of his dart through his beuer, and ſo killed him. The PERSIANS perceiuing that, fled immediatly, & forſooke the body of their generall. Shortly after it appeared to the GREECIANS that they had ſped well at this skirmiſhe, not bicauſe they had ſlaine many enemies, but for the great lamentacion the barbarous people made for the loſſe of Maſiſtius. For his death did ſo greue them, that they powled themſelues, they clipped of their horſe and moyles heares, & filled beſides all the field therabouts with pitiefull cries & ſhreekes, as thoſe that had loſt the valliantest and chiefeſt man of authority of all their campe, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this firſt skirmiſh, both the one and the other ſide kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the Soothſayers did promiſe both ſides the victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GREECIANS, ſo they did but onely defend: and contrarywiſe, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowen, that did aſſault. But Mardonius finding vittells waxed ſcant, and that they were ſtored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GREECIANS daily grewe ſtronger by continuall repayre to their campe, the lenger he delayed: in the end he reſolued to tary no lenger, but to paſſe the riuer of ASOPVS the next morning by breake of the day, & ſodainly to ſet apon the GREECIANS. So he gaue the Captaines warning the night before what they ſhould do, bicauſe euery man ſhould be redy: but about midnight there came a horſeman without any noyſe at all, ſo neere to the GREECIANS campe, that he ſpake to the watche, and told them he would ſpeake with Ariſtides, generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariſtides was called for ſtraight, and when he came to him, the horſeman ſaid vnto Ariſtides. I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great good will I beare you, haue put my ſelf in the greateſt daũger that may be, to come at this preſent time to aduertiſe you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battel: bicauſe your enemies ſodaine comming apon you, ſhould not make you afrayd, being ſodainly charged, and ſhould not hinder alſo your valliant fightinge. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight: but only ſcarcety of vittells that forceth him to do it, conſidering that the prognoſticators are all againſt it that he ſhould geue you battel, both by reaſon of the il tokens of their ſacrifices, as alſo by the aunſwers of their oracles, which hath put all the armie in a maruelous feare, and ſtande in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to putte all at aduenture, or elſe if he will needes lye ſtill, to be ſtarued to death for very famine. After king Alexander hadde imparted this ſecrete to Ariſtides, he prayed him to keepe it to him ſelfe, and to remember it in time to come. Ariſtides aunſwered him then, that it was no reaſon he ſhoulde keepe a matter of ſo great importance as that, from Pauſanias, who was their Lieutenant generall of the whole armie: notwithſtandinge, he promiſed him he woulde tell it no

A no man elſe before the battell, and that if the goddes gaue the GREECIANS the victorie, he did aſſure him, they ſhould all acknowledge his great fauor and good will ſhewed vnto them. After they hadde talked thus together, kinge Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Ariſtides alſo went immediatly to Pauſanias tent, and tolde him the talke kinge Alexander and he hadde together. Thereupon the priuate Captaines were ſent for ſtraight to counſaill, and there order was geuen, that euery manne ſhoulde haue his bandes ready, for they ſhoulde fight in the morninge. So Pauſanias at that time (as Herodotus wryteth) ſayed vnto Ariſtides, that he woulde remoue the ATHENIANS from the left to the right winge, bicauſe they ſhoulde haue the PERSIANS them ſelues right before them, and that they ſhoulde fight ſo much the luſtier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as alſo bicauſe they B hadde ouercommed them before in the firſt encounter: and that him ſelfe would take the left winge of the battell, where he ſhoulde encounter with the GREECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS ſide. But when all the other priuate Captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderſtoode it, they were maruelous angrie with Pauſanias, and ſayed he did them wronge, and hadde no reaſon to lette all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and onely to remoue them, as if they were ſlaues, to be appointed at his pleaſure, now of one ſide, then of the other, and to ſette them to fight with the valliantеſt ſouldiers they had of all their enemies. Then ſayed Ariſtides to them, that they knewe not what they ſayed, and how before they miſliked, and did ſtriue with the TEGEATES, onely for hauinge the left wing of the battell, and when it was graunted, they thought them ſelues greatly honored that they
C were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and nowe where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of them ſelues to geue them the place of the right winge, and did in maner offer them the preheminence of the whole armie: they do not thankefully take the honor offered them, nor yet doe recken of the vantage and benefitte geuen them to fight againſt the PERSIANS ſelues, their auncient enemies, and not againſt their natural contry men anciently diſcended of them. When Ariſtides had vſed all theſe perſwaſions vnto them, they were very well contented to chaunge place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke amonge them was to encorage one an other, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came againſt them, had no better hartes nor weapons, then thoſe whom they before hadde ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For ſayed they, they haue the ſame bowes, the ſame riche imbro-
D dered gownes, the ſame golden chaines and carcanettes of womaniſhe perſones, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint hartes: where we haue alſo the ſame weapons and bodies we hadde, and our hartes more liuely and coragious then before, through the ſundrie victories we haue ſince gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more. That we doe not fight as our other confederates the GREECIANS do, for our city and contry onely, but alſo to continewe the fame and renowme of our former noble ſeruice, which we wanne at the iorneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the ende the worlde ſhoulde not thinke that the glory of theſe triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the corage and worthineſſe of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GREECIANS throughly occupied to chaunge the order of their battell in haſt. The THEBANS on the other ſide that tooke
E parte with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the alteringe of their battell, by traytors that ranne betwene both campes: they ſtraight tolde Mardonius of it. He thereupon did ſodainly alſo chaunge the order of his battell, and placed the PERSIANS from the right winge to the left winge of his enemies: either bicauſe he was afrayed of the ATHENIANS, or elſe for greater glorie that he hadde a deſire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded the GREECIANS that tooke his parte, that they ſhoulde fight againſt the ATHENIANS. This alteracion was ſo openly done, that euerie manne might ſee it: whereuppon Pauſanias remoued the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and ſette them in the right winge. Mardonius ſeeinge that, remoued the PERSIANS againe from the left winge, and brought them to the right winge (where they were before) againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they con-F ſumed all that day in chaunginge their men to and fro. So the Captaines of the GREECIANS ſate in counſel at night, and there they agreed, that they muſt nedes remoue their campe, and lodge in ſome other place where they might haue water at cõmaundement: bicauſe their enemies did continually trouble and ſpoyle that water they had about them, with their horſes. Now when night came, the Captaines woulde haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodginge they had appointed: but the people went very ill willinge to it, and they hadde much a do to keepe them together. For they were no ſooner out of the trenches and fortification of their campe, but the moſt parte of them ranne to the citie of PLATÆES, and were maruelouſly out of order, diſperſing them ſelues here and there, and ſet vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behinde, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was againſt their willes. For one of their Captaines called Amompharetus, a maruelous hardie man, that feared no daunger, and longed ſore for battell: he was in ſuch a rage with theſe triflinge delayes, that he cried it out in the campe, that this remouinge was a goodly runninge away, and ſware he woulde not from thence, but woulde there tary Mardonius comminge with his companie. Pauſanias went to him, and tolde him he muſt doe that the other GREECIANS hadde conſented to in counſell, by moſt voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great ſtone in his handes, and threw it downe at Pauſanias feete, and told him there is the ſigne I geue to conclude battel, and I paſſe not for all your cowardly concluſions. Amompharetus ſtubbornneſſe did ſo amaze Pauſanias, that he was at his wittes ende. So he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwardes on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might goe together: and therewithall made the reſt of his menne to marche towardes the citie of PLATÆES, ſuppoſinge thereby to haue drawen Amompharetus to haue followed him, or elſe he ment to remaine alone behinde. But in triflinge thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderſtandinge that the GREECIANS did forſake their firſt lodging, he made his army preſently marche in battell ray to ſette apon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great ſhowtes and cries, not thinking to goe fight, but to goe ſacke and ſpoyle the GREECIANS flyinge away, as in deede they did litle better. For, Pauſanias ſeeinge the countenaunce of his enemies, made his enſignes to ſtay, and commaunded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to geue the GREECIANS the ſignall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke againſt Amompharetus, or for the ſodayne onſet of the enemies, which made them that they came not in ſtraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begonne, but ſtragglinge in ſmall companies, ſome here, and ſome there. In the meane time, Pauſanias was buſie in ſacrificinge to the goddes, and ſeeinge that the firſt ſacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothſayers obſeruations they made: he commaunded the SPARTANS to throwe their targettes at their feete, and not to ſturre out of their places, but onely to doe as he bad them, without reſiſtinge their enemies. When he hadde geuen this ſtraight order, he went againe and did ſacrifice, when the horſemen of the enemies were at hande, and that their arrowes flewe amongeſt the thickeſt of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did hurte diuerſe of them, and ſpecially poore Callicrates amonge the reſt, that was one of the goodlieſt menne in all the GREECIANS hoſte and armie. He hauing his deathes wounde with an arrow, before he gaue vppe the ghoſt, ſayed his death did not greue him, bicauſe he came out of his contrie to dye for the defence of GREECE: but it greued him to dye ſo cowardly, hauinge geuen the enemie neuer a blowe. His death was maruelous lamentable, and the conſtancy of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they neuer ſtirred out of their places, nor made any countenaunce to defende them ſelues againſt their enemies that came apon them, but ſuffred them ſelues to be thruſt through with arrowes, and ſlaine in the field, lookinge for the houre the goddes would appoint them, and that their Captaine would commaunde them to fight. Some wryte alſo, that as Pauſanias was at his prayers, and doing ſacrifice vnto the goddes a litle behinde the battell, certeine of the LYDIANS came apon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his ſacrifice: and how Pauſanias, and thoſe that were about him, (hauinge no other weapons in their handes) draue them awaye with force of ſtaues and whippes. In memorie whereof, they ſaye there is a ſoleinne proceſſion kept at SPARTA on that daye, which they call the LYDIANS proceſſion, where they whippe and beate younge boyes about the aulter. Then was Pauſanias in great diſtreſſe, to ſee the Prieſtes offer ſacrifice vpon ſacrifice, and that not one of them pleaſed the goddes: at the laſt he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holdinge vp his handes, beſought Iuno Cytheron, and

Note the obedience of the Spartan ſouldiers vnto death.

A and all the other goddes, (patrones and protectors of the contry of the PLATÆIANS) that if it were not the will of the goddes the GREECIANS ſhoulde haue the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the leaſt ſhould buie their deathes dearely, and that they ſhoulde finde they fought againſt valliant men and worthy ſouldiers. Pauſanias had no ſooner ended his prayer, but the ſacrifices fell out very fauorable, inſomuch the Prieſtes and Soothſayers came to promiſe him victory. Thereupon, he ſtraight gaue commaundement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently how they ſhoulde march. So as he that hadde ſeene the Squadrõ of the LACEDÆMONIANS, would haue ſaid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaſt raiſing vp his briſtels, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people ſaw they ſhoulde haue a hotte battel, and that they ſhould mete with men that would fight it out to the death: where-
B fore they couered their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN facion, & beſtowed their arrowes luſtely apon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But they keeping cloſe together, and coueringe them ſelues with their ſhieldes, marched on ſtil apon them, vntill they came to ioyne with the enemy ſo luſtely, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thruſtes and blowes of their pikes & ſpeares apon their breaſtes, and ouerthwart their faces, that they ſlew many of them, and layed them on the grounde. For all that, they dyed not cowardly, but tooke the LACEDÆMONIANS pikes and ſpeares in their bare hands, and brake them in two by ſtrength of their armes: and then they quickely pluckt out their cimeters and axes, and luſtely layed about them, and wrong the LACEDÆMONIANS ſhields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with thẽ a great while hand to hand. Now, whileſt the LACEDÆMONIANS were C buſily fighting with the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS ſtoode ſtill imbattelled farre of, & kept their ground. But when they ſaw the LACEDÆMONIANS tary ſo long, & that they came not, and heard a maruelous noyſe of men as though they were fighting, and beſides that there came a ſpeedy meſſenger vnto them ſent from Pauſanias, to let thẽ vnderſtand they were fighting: then they marched with all ſpeede they could to help them. But as they were comming on a great pace ouer the playne, vnto that parte where they heard the noyſe: the GREECIANS that were on Mardonius ſide came againſt them. Ariſtides ſeeing them cõming towards them, went a good way before his company, & cried out as loude as he could for life, and coniured the GREECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GREECE, to leaue of theſe warres, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe thẽ that ventured their liues, to D defend the common wealth & ſafety of all GREECE. But when he ſaw they would nedes fight for any requeſt and coniuration he could vſe, and that they came ſtill apon him, bending them ſelues to giue charge: then he ſtayed his going to relieue the LACEDÆMONIANS, & was compelled to make head againſt thoſe that ſet apon him and his company, they beinge about fifty thouſand men, of the which, the moſt parte notwithſtanding went their waies, and left the army, ſpecially when they vnderſtoode the PERSIANS were ouerthrowen and fled. The fury of the battell, and cruelleſt fight (as they ſay) was where the THEBANS were: bicauſe the nobility & chiefeſt men of the contry fought very earneſtly for the PERSIANS, but the people refuſed, being led by a ſmal nomber of the nobility that cõmaunded thẽ. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the firſt that ouerthrew the PERSIANS, & made thẽ flie:
E & they ſlue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a ſtone one Arimneſtus a SPARTAN gaue him apon his head, rightly as the oracle of Amphiaraus had prophecied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battel had ſent thither a LYDIAN, & a CARIAN, vnto the oracle of Trophonius, of the which, the prophet made anſwere vnto the CARIAN, in the CARIAN tonge: & the man of LYDIA lay within the ſanctuary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dreame that one of the prieſtes of the tẽple willed him to go out of the place he was in, and he denying it, the Prieſt tooke vp a great ſtone and threw it at his head, and ſo thought he was ſlaine with the blow. And thus it is writtẽ. And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chaſe the PERSIANS flying, into their fortificatiõ they had in a wodde: & the ATHENIANS alſo ſhortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS whereof they ſlue in the field, a three hũdred of the nobleſt & chiefeſt
F of them. For euen as the THEBANS began to turne tayle, newes came vnto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched them ſelues within their forte and ſtrength in the wodde, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did beſiege them. The ATHENIANS ſuffered the GREECIANS that fled to saue them selues, and they went to help the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the spoile of the barbarous people: who went before but slenderly about it, bicause they had no experience to make an assault, nor force vpon a walle. But so soone as the ATHENIANS came into them, they straight tooke it by assault, and made great slaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous people. For of three hundred thowsand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were saued only but forty thowsand led vnder Artabazus: and of the GREECIANS side, there were not slaine aboue thirtene hundred and three score in all, amongst which also there were two and fifty ATHENIANS, all of the tribe of AEantides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the AEantides made a solemne sacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order geuen them by the oracle of Apollo, to geue them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there dyed foure score and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES, sixteene. But I maruell Herodotus sayth, that none but these people onely fought in that iorney against the barbarous nation, and no other GREECIANS besides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues also do shewe, that it was a generall victorie and exployte of all the GREECIANS together. And Moreouer, if there had beene but these three people onely that hadde fought against them, and that all the rest had stoode and looked on, and done nothinge: sure there had bene no such epigramme as this, engrauen apon the alter or tombe that was set vp in the place of the battell.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Boedromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the BOEOTIANS accompt, the six & twenty of the moneth, they call Panemus, on which day there is yet kept a common assembly of the estates of GREECE, in the cities of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a solemne sacrifice vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, to geue him thankes alwayes for this victorie. It is no maruaill that there was such difference then betwixt the monethes and dayes, considering that euen nowe when astronomie is more perfectly vnderstanded, then it was then: some do yet beginne and ende their monethes at one day, and some at an other. After this great battel and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there rose great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honor of the victorie. For the ATHENIANS would not geue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor suffer them to set vp any tokens or signes of triumphe. Whereupon the GREECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occasion they had almost spoyled one an other: had not Aristides through his wisedom and wise perswasions, stayed, and quieted the other Captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wanne with such discrete and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbitrement and iudgement of the other people of GREECE. So the GREECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersie. In this counsell holden there, Theogiton a Captaine of the MEGARIANS, sayd for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might growe betwene the GREECIANS apon this quarrell: he thought it very requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victorie, vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to euery man there that he woulde haue requested this honor for the cittie of CORINTHE, beinge in deede the thirde cittie in estimacion of all GREECE, next vnto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendacion of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruelously liked, & well thought of of euery man. For his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to ende this strife, they should geue the honor of this victorie vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and so woulde neither of both parties be angrie that they shoulde be honored. Apon his wordes, Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, and

A and then Pauſanias for the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the PLATÆIANS ſhould haue the reward. Now they both beinge agreed, before the ſpoyle was deuided betwene them, they ſette aſide foure ſcore talentes that were geuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and ſett out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithſtanding, did ſet vp their tokens of victorie by them ſelues, and the ATHENIANS theirs alſo by them ſelues. So, they ſending vnto the oracle of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they ſhould do ſacrifice: Apollo aunſwered them that they ſhoulde builde vp an aulter vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, howbeit that they ſhoulde put no ſacrifice vpon it, vntill they had firſt put out all the fier through the whole contrie, bicauſe it had bene polluted and defiled by the B barbarous people: and then, that they ſhoulde fetche pure and cleane fyre at the common aulter, whereon they doe ſacrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the city of DELPHES. This aunſwer being deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GREECE went through all the contrie, to put out the fyre euery where. And there was a man of the ſame city of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered him ſelfe, and promiſed he woulde bringe them fyre from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all poſſible ſpeede that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he hadde ſprinckled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of lawrell apon his heade, and went in that manner to take fyre from the aulter of Apollo. When he had done, he hyed him againe as faſt as he coulde ronne for life, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and came thither before the ſunne was ſet, hauing commen and gone that day C a thowſande furlonges. But after he hadd ſaluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fyre he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghoſt. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp ſtarke deade, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to ſay, of good renowme: and cauſed afterwards this Epitaphe following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

Many thinke that this goddeſſe Euclia is Diana, and ſo they call her. But other holde opinion ſhe was the daughter of Hercules, and of Myrto the Nymphe, Menetius daughter, and *Pa*D troclus ſiſter, that dyed a virgine, and was honored afterwardes as a goddeſſe, of the BOEOTIANS, & of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they finde an aulter and image dedicated vnto her: and all that are maried, doe ſacrifice to her apon that aulter. Afterwards there was a generall counſell holden by all the GREECIANS, in the which Ariſtides made a motion, that all the cities of GREECE ſhoulde yearely ſende their deputies at a certeine day appointed, vnto the city of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers & ſacrifices vnto the goddes: and that from fiue yeares, to fiue yeares, they ſhoulde celebrate common games, that ſhould be called the games of liberty: and that they ſhould alſo leauy through all the prouinces of GREECE, for maintenance of the warres againſt the PERSIANS and barbarous people, tenne thowſand footemen, a thowſand horſemen, and a flete of a hundred ſayle.

E Item that the PLATÆIANS thencefoorth ſhould be taken alſo for deuoute and holy men, and that no man ſhould ſo hardy hurt or offende them, and that they ſhoulde onely tende the ſacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and proſperitie of GREECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and maner aforeſayed, and the PLATÆIANS bounde them ſelues yearely to kepe ſolemne ſacrifices and anniuerſaries for the ſoules of the GREECIANS that were ſlaine in their territories, fightinge for defence of the libertie of the GREECIANS. And this they obſerue yet vnto this daye in this ſorte. The ſixteenth day of the moneth of Mæmacterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuary) they goe a proceſſion, and before the proceſſion there goeth a trompetor that ſoundeth the alarom. Then there follow certeine charrettes loden with braunches of fyrre tree, and with noſegayes F and garlandes of triumphe: then a blacke bul, & certeine yong gentlemen noble men ſonnes, that cary great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, ſuch as they vſe to powre apon the graues of deade men for propiciatory oblations, and other young boyes free borne, that cary oyles, perfumes, and other ſweete odours in vyoll glaſſes. For no ſeruaunt or bonde man may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this miſtery, for that they whoſe memory they honor, dyed all fighting for defence of the liberty of GREECE. After all this ſhew, followeth the prouoſt of the PLATÆIANS for that time being, laſt of all: who may not all the reſt of the yeare beſides ſo much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howebeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall potte in one of his handes, which he taketh in the towne houſe, and a naked ſworde in the other hande, and ſo goeth through the cittie in this ſorte after all the pompe aforeſayed, vnto the church yarde where all their graues be that were ſlaine at that battell. So when he commeth thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the ſame he waſheth the foure-ſquare pillers and images that ſtand apon thoſe tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and ſweete ſauors: afterwardes, he ſacrificeth a bulle, and layeth him apon a heape of wodde hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men, and making certaine praiers and peticions vnto Iupiter, and Mercurie, goddes of the earth, he doth ſolemnely inuite the ſoules of thoſe valliant men that dyed, fightinge for the liberty of GREECE, vnto the feaſt of this funerall ſacrifice. Then he taketh a cuppe full of wine in his hande, and ſpilling it all vpon their tombes, he ſpeaketh theſe wordes aloude: I drinke to the worthy and valliant men, that dyed ſometime in defence of the liberty of GREECE. This ſolemne ceremony and anniuerſarie, the PLATÆIANS doe duely obſerue vnto this preſent day. Nowe when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Ariſtides perceiuing the people were bent to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate, where the people might beare the whole rule and authoritie, iudginge them well worthy to be conſidered of, in reſpect of their noble ſeruice and valiant courage they had ſhewed in this warre: & cõſidering alſo that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernment, being yet in armes, and very ſtowte, by reaſon of the famous victories they had obteyned: he cauſed a law to be made, that all authority of gouernment ſhould runne in equality among the citizens, and that thencefoorth all burgeſſes (as well poore as rich) ſhould be choſen by voyces of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreouer, when Themiſtocles tolde in open aſſembly, that he had a thing in his heade woulde be greatly to the profit and commodity of the ſtate, but yet it was not to be ſpoken openly for diuerſe reſpects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Ariſtides onely, and to take his aduiſe in it, to knowe whether it was meete to be done or not. Then Themiſtocles tolde him ſecretly betwene them, that he thought to ſette the arcenall afyre, where all the GREECIANS ſhips lay: alleaging, that by this meanes the ATHENIANS ſhould be the greateſt men of power in all GREECE. Ariſtides hearinge that, without any more, came preſently to the people againe, and tolde the whole counſell openly: that nothinge coulde be more profitable in deede for the whole common wealth, and withal more wicked and vniuſt, then that Themiſtocles thought good to do. When the people heard Ariſtides aunſwere, they willed Themiſtocles to lette his deuiſe alone whatſoeuer it were: ſo great iuſticers were the ATHENIANS, and ſo much did they truſt Ariſtides wiſedom and equitie beſides. So they made Ariſtides afterwards generall of the army of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, & ſent them to make warre againſt the barbarous people. Ariſtides at his comming thither, ſeeing Pauſanias, & the other Captaines that were generals ouer the whole army, dealinge hardly, and churliſhely with people their confederates: he on the contrary ſide, ſpake gently vnto them, and ſhewed him ſelfe as curteous and familiar to them as he coulde poſſible, making his companion alſo familiar to all, and iuſt to euery body, not oppreſſing ſome to eaſe other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Ariſtides takinge this courſe, it was not noted howe by litle and litle he cutte of the rule and authoritie of the LACEDÆMONIANS in GREECE, not by force of armes, nor by ſhippes, nor by numbers of horſes, but onely by his graue and wiſe gouernment. For if the iuſtice and vertue of Ariſtides, and the myldenes and curteſy of Cimon made the gouernment of the ATHENIANS to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of GREECE: the couetouſnes, pride, and fiercenes of Pauſanias, made it much more to be deſired. For Pauſanias neuer ſpake vnto the other Captaynes of the people, allyes, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was to ſharp with them: and for the poore priuate ſouldiers, he woulde cauſe them to be cruelly whipped for

A for euery ſmall offence, or elſe to make them ſtande a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron ancker apon their ſhoulders. No man durſt goe forrage, neither for ſtrawe nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durſt water their horſe before the SPARTANS: for he had ſette skowtes for them to whippe them home, that went out before them. And one day when Ariſtides thought to haue ſpoken to him, and to haue tolde him ſome thinge: he frowned apon him, and ſayed he hadde no leaſure to ſpeake with him now, and ſo would not heare him. Whereupon the Captaines of the other GREECIANS, & ſpecially thoſe of CHIO, of SAMOS, and of LESBOS, did afterwardes follow Ariſtides, and perſwaded him to take apon him the charge and authority to commaunde the other people of GREECE, and to take into his protection the allyes and confederats of the ſame, who long ſithence wiſhed to reuolt B from the gouernment of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and onely to ſubmitte them ſelues vnto the ATHENIANS. Ariſtides aunſwered them thus: that they had not only reaſon to doe that they ſayd, but that they were alſo conſtrained to do it. Notwithſtanding, bicauſe the ATHENIANS might haue good grounde and aſſurance of their vndoubted fidelitie and good ſeruice, they ſhoulde deliuer them manifeſt teſtimony and aſſurance thereof, by ſome famous act attempted againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durſt neuer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, and Antagoras of CHIO hearing him ſay ſo, both Captaines of galleys confedered together: they went one day to ſet apon the admirall galley of Pauſanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one ſide of her, and the other on the other ſide, as ſhe was rowing before all the fleete. Pauſanias ſeeinge them, ſtoode vppe ſtraight in a C maruelous rage againſt them, and threatned them that before it were longe he woulde make them knowe they had bene better to haue aſſaulted their owne naturall contrie, then to haue ſet vpon him as they had done. But they aunſwered him, and bad him get him away quickely and he were wiſe, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the GREECIANS victory at the battell of PLATÆES vnder his leading: and that it was nothing elſe but the onely reuerence and reſpect of the ſame, that had made the GREECIANS hold their hands till now, from geuing him that iuſt puniſhment his pride and arrogancy had deſerued. So the end was, they left the LACEDÆMONIANS, & ſtacke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherin was eaſily diſcerned the great corage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For when they ſawe their Captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouergreat authority, & liberty they D had, they willingly gaue vp their commaundement ouer the other GREECIANS, and did no more ſende their Captaines to be generalls of the whole army of GREECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they ſhould be obedient, and in euery point obſerue the diſcipline and law of their contrie, then if they had bene otherwiſe the only rulers and Lords ouer the whole contrie. Now at what time the LACEDÆMONIANS did commaunde all GREECE, as Lordes: the cities and people of GREECE did pay a certeine ſumme of money, towardes defrayinge of the charges of the warres againſt the barbarous people. But after that their ſeigniorie and rule was taken from them, the GREECIANS were contented a taxe ſhould be leauied, and that euery city ſhould be reaſonably ſeſſed, accordinge to their wealth and abilitie: bicauſe euery citie might know what they ſhoulde pay. And for this purpoſe, they prayed the ATHENIANS E they would appoint Ariſtides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power and authoritie to taxe and ſeſſe euery citie indifferently, conſidering the greatnes of the territory, and the reuenues of the ſame, as euery one was reaſonably able to beare it. But if Ariſtides were poore when he entred into that great charge and office of authoritie, wherein all GREECE in manner did referre them ſelues vnto his diſcretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made this aſſeſſement and taxacion not only iuſtly and truely, but alſo ſo indifferently accordinge vnto euery mans abilitie, that there was no man coulde finde fault with his doinges. And like as the auncient men in olde time did celebrate, and ſing out the bleſſednes of thoſe that liued vnder the raigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: euen ſo did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwardes honor the aſſeſſement made by F Ariſtides, calling it the fortunate & bleſſed time of GREECE, and ſpecially, when ſhortly after it did double, and treble on the ſodaine. For the taxe Ariſtides made, came to about foure hundred & three ſcore talents: and Pericles raiſed it almoſt vnto a third parte. For Thucydides

sixe hundred talentes yearely vppon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the orators and counsellers for matters of state did raise it vp higher by litle and litle, vntil it mounted vnto the summe of thirteene hundred talentes. And this was not, bicause the warres did rise to so great a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the losses the ATHENIANS had receiued: but for that they did accustome the people to make distributions of money by hand vnto euery citizen, to make them set vp games, and make goodly images, and to builde sumptuous temples. Thus was Aristides therefore iustly honored, praised, and esteemed aboue all other, for this iust imposition of taxes, sauing onely of Themistocles: who went vp and downe flering at the matter, sayinge it was no mete praise for an honest man, but rather for a cofer well barred with iron, where a man might safely lay vp his gold and siluer. This he spake B to be euen with Aristides, which was nothing like the sharpe girde Aristides gaue him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, tolde him it was an excellent thing for a Captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counsells and doinges of the enemies: and so is it, sayed Aristides againe, not onely a needefull, but an honest thinge, and mete for a worthy generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Aristides made all the other people of GREECE to sweare, that they woulde truely keepe the articles of the allyance, and he him selfe as generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their othes in the name of the ATHENIANS: and so pronouncing execrations & curses against them that should breake the league and othe taken, he threw iron wedges red hotte into the sea, and prayed the gods to destroy them euen so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstandinge, afterwardes C (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteracion in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the daunger and burden of periury and execration, and that they should not let for feare thereof to do any thing whatsoeuer they thought mete or necessary. To conclude, Theophrastus wryteth, that Aristides was not only a perfect an honest, and iust man, in priuate matters betwixt party & party: but in matters of state, and concerning the common weale, he did many thinges oftentimes accordinge to the necessitie of the time, and troubles of the citie, wherein violence and iniustice was to be vsed. As when the question was asked in open counsell, to know whether they might take away the gold & siluer that was left in the Ile of DELOS safely layed vp in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the barD barous people, and to bring it from thence vnto ATHENS, apon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the articles of the allyance, made and sworne amonge all the GREECIANS. Aristides opinion beinge asked in the same, he aunswered: it was not iust, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his citie, to rule and commaund many thousandes of people: yet was he still poore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his pouertie, then for all the famous victories and battells he had wonne: and that plainely appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torche bearer, was his neere kinseman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stoode in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other byematters, E left the chiefest matter, & spake thus to the Iudges. My Lords, you al know Aristides the sonne of Lysimachus, and you are not ignoraunt also that his vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GREECE. Howe thinke ye doth he liue at home? when you see him abroade vppe and downe the city, in a threde bare gowne all to tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all see quake for very colde, beinge so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his cosin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable: that notwithstandinge Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authoritie among you, he suffereth him, and his poore wife and children readie to begge, to starue for any helpe he geueth him. Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angryer with him for that, then for any matter else he was F accused of: he prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tel truely whether he had not offered him good rounde summes of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take take it, which he euer refuſed, and aunſwered him alwayes, that he coulde better boaſt of his pouerty, then him ſelfe coulde of his riches: (which he ſayd many did vſe ill, and few coulde vſe them wel) and that it was a hard thing to finde one man of a noble minde, that could away with pouertie, and that ſuch onely might be aſhamed of pouerty, as were poore againſt their willes. So Ariſtides confirmed all he ſpake to be true: and euery man that was at the hearinge of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Ariſtides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by AEſchines the Socratian Philoſopher: and Plato reporteth of him alſo, that notwithſtandinge there were many other famous and notable men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Ariſtides praiſe aboue them all. For others, ſayd he, (as Themiſtocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the citie with ſtately porches, and ſumptuous buildinges of golde and ſiluer, and with ſtone of other fine ſuperfluous deuiſes: but Ariſtides was only he, that vertuouſly diſpoſed him ſelfe and all his doinges, to the furtherance of the ſtate and common weale. His iuſtice and good nature appeared plainely, in his doinges and behauiour towardes Themiſtocles. For though Themiſtocles was euer againſt Ariſtides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practiſe he was baniſhed from ATHENS: yet when Themiſtocles was accuſed of treaſon to the ſtate, hauing diuerſe ſharpe enemies againſt him: as Cimon, Alcmaon, with diuerſe other: Ariſtides ſought not reuenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither ſpake nor did any thinge againſt him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyce to ſee his enemie in miſery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his proſperity. And touching Ariſtides death, ſome write he dyed in the realme of PONTVS, being ſent thither about matters of the ſtate: & other thinke he dyed an old man in the citie of ATHENS, greatly honored and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN wryteth of his death in this ſorte. After that Themiſtocles (ſayeth he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very ſtubborne and inſolent: whereupon, many lewde men grew to be common appeachers and accuſers of the noble men and chiefeſt citizens, and to ſtirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people againſt them, who were waxen proude by reaſon of their proſperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Amonge the reſt, Ariſtides was condemned for extorcion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, apon one Diophantes accuſation, of the village of AMPHITROPE: who burdened him, that he tooke money of the IONIANS, to make the annuell tribute ceaſe which they payed vnto ATHENS: and ſo Craterus ſayth, that bicauſe Ariſtides was not able to pay the fine they ſet apon his heade (which was fiue Minas) he was driuen to forſake ATHENS, and to gette him into IONIA where he dyed. Yet doth not Craterus bring foorth any probable matter to proue this true he wryteth: as his pleadinge, his ſentence and condemnation, or any decree paſſed againſt him, although he vſed great diligence elſe in collectinge all ſuch matters, and vowchinge his authors. Furthermore, all other wryters that haue ſpecially noted the faultes and offences, committed by the people of ATHENS in former times againſt their Captaines and gouernors: they do declare Themiſtocles exile, Miltiades captiuity that dyed in priſon, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that ſlue him ſelfe in the pulpit for orations, when he ſawe he was condemned: and tell diuerſe ſuch ſtories, addinge to alſo Ariſtides baniſhment: but yet they make no maner of mencion of the condemnation which Craterus ſpeaketh of. Moreouer, Ariſtides tombe is to be ſeene at this day apon the hauen of Phalerus, which was ſet vp for him at the charge of the common wealth, as it is reported, bicauſe he dyed ſo poore a manne, as they founde nothing in his houſe to bury him with. Other go further, and ſay that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the common wealth, and that the citie gaue euery one of them three thowſande Drachmas: and his ſonne Lyſimachus, a hundred Minas of ſiluer, and a hundred Iugera, and at Alcibiades requeſt, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day beſides, of ordinarie allowance. Furthermore, when this Lyſimachus dyed, he left aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Calliſthenes wryteth, as much prouiſino to liue withall, as they gaue to any that wanne the Olympian games. And ſithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Ariſtoxenus the muſitian, and Ariſtotle the Philoſopher, at the leaſt if the booke intituled of Nobilitie be any of Ariſtotles workes: all theſe agree together, that one Myrto, Myrto, Ariſtides daughters daughter maried vnto Socrates.

Ariſtides daughters daughter, was maried to the wiſe Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) bicauſe ſhe was a poore widdow, & could not be maried for her pouerty, hauing much a do to liue. Yet Panætius doth wryte againſt them, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN wryteth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had ſeene one Lyſimachus, Ariſtides ſonnes ſonne, or his daughters ſonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interpret dreames, by certaine tables, wherin was wrytten the arte to interpret the ſignification of dreames: and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his mother and his ſiſter, he ſayd he had cauſed the people to geue them a Triobolum a peece, euery day towards their liuinge. It is very true that the ſelfe ſame Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the ſtate of ATHENS, ordained that his mother and ſiſter ſhould haue eech of them a Drachma by the day to finde them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new, nor ſtraunge thing, that the people of ATHENS were ſo carefull to helpe, and to relieue, the women that dwelt in the citie: conſidering that in times paſt, Ariſtogiton hauing a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore ſtate, and that coulde not be beſtowed in matriage for her pouerty, they cauſed her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the nobleſt houſes of the city, and made her a ioynter beſides in the village of POTAMOS. Which great curteſy & humanity of theirs, hath euer deſerued great fame and commendacion, & yet cõtinueth euen vntil this day, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery man there.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Cenſor.

Marcus Cato and his aunceſters, were (as they ſay) of the city of THVSCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and delt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt & liued in the contry of the SABYNES, vpon certeine land his father left him. And though to many, his aunceſters were knowen to haue bene obſcure: yet he him ſelf did highly commende his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and ſaying he was a ſouldier, and had ſerued valliantly in the fielde. And he telleth alſo of an other Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valliant ſeruice had bene oft rewarded of the generals, with ſuch honorable

A noble giftes, as the ROMAINES did vse to geue vnto them, that had done some famous act in any battell: and how that he hauinge lost fiue horses of seruice in the warres, the value of the same were restored to him againe in money of the common treasure, bicause he had shewed himselfe trusty and valliant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speeche at ROME to call them vpstartes, that were no gentlemen borne, but did rise by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his parte, he did confesse it, that he was of the first of the house that euer had honor, and office of state: but by reason of the noble actes and good seruice of his auncestors, he maintained he was very auncient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priscus: but afterwardes by reason of his great wisedom and experience, he was surnamed Cato, bicause the ROMAINES call a wise man, and him that hath seene much, Cato. He was somewhat geuen to be redde faced, and had a payer of staring eyes B in his heade, as this man telleth vs, that for ill will wrote these verses of him after his death.

Cato called an vpstart.

The definition of this worde Cato.

Pluto (the god) which rules the furies infernall, will not receiue the damned ghost, of Porcius in his hall:
his sawcy coppered nose, and fiery staring eyes, his common slanderous tales, which he did in this world deuise, made Pluto stande in dread that he would brawle in hell, although his bones were drie and dead, on earth he was so fell.

Furthermore, touchinge the disposition of his body, he was maruelous stronge and lusty, and all bicause he did vse to labor and toyle euen from his youth, and to liue sparingly, as one C that was euer brought vp in the warres from his youth: so that he was of a very good constitution, both for strength of body, as for health also. As for vtterance, he esteemed it as a seconde body, and most necessarie gift, not onely to make men honest, but also as a thinge very requisite for a man that should beare sway and authoritie in the common wealth. He practised to speake well in litle villages neere home, whether he went many times to plead mennes causes in courtes iudiciall, that would retaine him of counsell: so as in shorte time he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in processe of time became an excellent orator. After he was thus well knowen, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behauiour in his life, and a certaine noble minde in him, worthie to be employed in matters of state and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he D did not onely refuse to take fees for his pleading, and following the causes he mainteined: but furthermore made no reckening of the estimacion he wanne by that manner and practise, as though that was not the only marke he shot at. But his desire reached further, rather to winne him selfe fame by seruice in the warres, and by valliant fightinge with his enemie: then with such a quiet and pleasing manner of life. Insomuch as when he was but a younge striplinge in maner, he had many cuttes apon his brest, which he had receiued in diuerse battells and encounters against the enemies. For he him selfe wryteth, that he was but seuenteene yeare old, when he went first vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hanniballs chiefe prosperitie, when he spoyled and destroyed all ITALIE. So when he came to fight, he would strike lustely, and neuer sturre foote nor geue backe, and woulde looke cruelly vppon his enemie, and E threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voyce, which he vsed him selfe, and wisely taught other also to vse the like: for such countenaunces, sayed he, many times doe feare the enemies more, then the sworde ye offer them. When he went any iorney, he euer marched a foote, and caried his armour apon his backe, and had a man waytinge on him that caried his vittells with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they say) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or supper, but did helpe to dresse it him selfe for the most parte, if he had any leasure, when he had done the duety of a priuate souldier in fortifying the campe, or such other nedefull businesse. All the while he was abroade in seruice in the warres, he neuer drancke other then cleane water, vnlesse it were when he founde he was not well, and then he woulde take a litle vineger: but if he saw he were weake, he woulde then drinke a litle wine. Now it fortuF ned, that Manius Curius the ROMAINE, who had triumphed thrise, hadde a prety house and lande hard by Cato, where he kept in times past, which Cato for a walke would visite oft. And he considering how litle lande he had to his house, and what a litle house he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondered with him selfe what maner of man Curius had bene, that hauing bene the greatest man of ROME in his time, and hauing subdued the mightiest nations and people of all ITALIE, and driuen kinge Pyrrus also out of the same: yet him selfe with his owne handes did manure that litle patche of grounde, and dwel in so poore and small a farme. Whether notwithstãding, after his three triumphes, the SAMNYTES sent their Ambassadors to visite him, who founde him by the fyers side seething of perseneapes, and presented him a maruelous deale of golde from their state and communalty. But Cursus returned them againe with their gold, and told them, that such as were contented with that supper, had no nede of gold nor siluer: and that for his parte, he thought it greater honor to commaunde them that had gold, then to haue it him selfe.

The moderacion of Manius Curius.

Cato remembring these thinges to him selfe, went home againe, and beganne to thinke vpon his house, of his liuinge, of his family and seruauntes, and also of his expences: and to cut of all superfluous charges, and fell him selfe to labor with his owne handes, more then euer he hadde done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato serued vnder him being very younge, where he fell into familiar acquaintãce with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN philosopher, in whom he tooke maruelous delight to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that Plato did, by callinge it the sweete poyson and chiefest bayte to allure men to ill: and saying that the body was the first plague vnto the soule, and that her onely health, remedy, and purgation stoode apon rules of reason, good examples and contemplations, that driue sinful thoughts and carnall pleasures of the body, farre of from her. Cato moreouer gaue him selfe much to sobriety and temperaunce, and framed him selfe to be contented with litle.

Platoes opinion of pleasure.

They say he fell in his very olde age to the study of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited somwhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his matter, and also to be eloquent. Which plainly appeareth, in all his bookes and writinges, full of authorities, examples, & stories taken out of Greeke authors: and many of his sentences and moralls, his adages & quicke answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a noble man of ROME at that time, one of great authoritie, and a deepe wise man besides, who coulde easily discerne buddes of vertue sprowtinge out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honorable disposition to helpe forwarde, and to aduaunce such. His name was Valerius Flaccus, a neere neighboure vnto Cato, who was informed by his seruaunts of Catoes straunge life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleade mens causes that prayed his counsaill, & that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but cast a litle coate on his shoulders, and being sommer he would go out bare, naked to the wast, to worke in his ground among his seruaunts and other workemen: & would besides, sit and eate with them together at one borde, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him also a world of such maners & facions which he vsed, that shewed to be a maruelous plaine man, without pride and of a good nature. Then they tolde him what notable wise sayinges and graue sentences they heard him speake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this reporte of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, and wel giuen, & that he was a good griffe to be set in a better ground: he perswaded him to come to ROME, and to practise there in the assembly of the people, in the common causes and affayres of the common weale. Cato followed his counsail, who hauing bene no long practiser among them, did grow straight into great estimacion, and wanne him many frends, by reason of the causes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken also, by meanes of the speciall fauour and countenaunce Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For first of all, by voyce of the people he was chosen Tribune of the souldiers, (to say, colonell of a thousand footemen) & afterwards was made treasorer: and so went forwards, and grew to so great credit & authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus cõpanion in the chiefest offices of state, being chosen Consul with him, & then Censor. But to begin with al, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of ROME, & gaue him selfe to follow him altogether: & not so much for the credit & estimacion Fabius Maximus was of, (who therein exceded all the ROMAINES of that time)

A time) as for the modesty and discrete gouernment he sawe in him, whome he determined to followe, as a worthy myrror and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and euil will of Scipio the great, who did striue at that present being but a young man, with the authoritie and greatnesse of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to enuy his risinge and greatnesse. For Cato being sent treasorer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iorney into AFRIKE, and perceiuing Scipioes bountifull nature and disposition to large giftes without meane to the souldiers: he tolde him plainly one day, that he did not so much hurt the common wealth in wasting their treasure, as he did great harme in chaūging the auncient maner of their auncesters: who vsed their souldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to spende their superfluous money (all necessaries prouided for) in vaine toyes and trifles, to serue their plea-

B sure. Scipio made him aunswere, he woulde haue no treasorer shoulde controll him in that sorte, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the wars, with full sayles as it were, and that he woulde (and did also determine to) make the state priuie to all his doinges, but not to the money he spent. Cato hearing this aunswer, returned with spede out of SICILE vnto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended playes, commedies, and wrestlinges, as if he had not bene sent to make warres, inuasions, and attemptes apon their enemies. Apon this complaint the Senate appointed certeine Tribunes of the people, to goe and see if their informations were true: and finding them so, that they should bring him backe againe to ROME. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparaunt

C victorie, through the necessary preparacion and prouision he had made for the warres: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leasure, he would be priuately mery with his frends: and though he was liberall to his souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duety and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke shippinge, and sayled towards AFRIKE, whether he was sent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that diuerse called him the Demosthenes of ROME: howbeit the maner of his life was in more estimacion, then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendacion of wordes, and one enuied an other which of them should come neareste: but few of them woulde fyle their handes with any labor as their forefathers did, and make a light

D supper and dinner, without fire or prouision, or woulde be content with a meane gowne, and a poore lodging, & finally woulde thinke it more honorable to defye fansies & pleasures, then to haue and enioy them. Bicause the state was waxen now of such power & wealth, as it could no more retaine the auncient discipline, and former austeritie and straitnes of life it vsed: but by reason of the largenes of their dominion and seigniory, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their subiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of sundry contry facions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they sawe other straight wearyed with paines and labor, tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other side neuer ouercommen, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor, nor in his age also when he

E was gray headed and balde, after his Consullship and triumphe, but like a conqueror that had gotten the maistery, he would neuer geue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth him selfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that cost him aboue a hundred pence, & that his hyndes and worke men alwayes dronke no worse wine, when he was Consull and generall of the armie, then he did him selfe: and that his cater neuer bestowed in meate for his supper, aboue thirty Asses of ROMAINE money, and yet he sayed it was, bicause he might be the stronger, and apter to do seruice in the warres for his contry and the common wealth. He sayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his frends that dyed, he had a peece of tapestry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the babilonian border, and he caused it straight to be solde: and that of all his houses he had abroade in the contry, he had not one

F wall plastered, nor rough cast. Moreouer he would say, he neuer bought bondeman or slaue dearer, then a thowsande fiue hundred pence, as one that sought not for fine made men, and goodly personages, but strong fellowes that could away with paynes, as carters, horsekepers, neatheardes, and ſuch like: and againe he woulde ſell them when they were olde, bicauſe he would not keepe them when they coulde do no ſeruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a manne bought any thinge deere, that was for litle purpoſe: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it to much to beſtow ſo litle, for that which needed not. He would haue men purchaſe houſes, that hadde more ſtore of errable lande and paſture, then of fine orteyardes or gardeins. Some ſaye, he didde thus, for very miſerie and couetouſneſſe: other thinke, and tooke it that he liued ſo ſparingely, to moue others by his example to cutte of all ſuperfluitie and waſt. Neuertheleſſe, to ſell ſlaues in that ſorte, or to turne them out of dores when you haue hadde the ſeruice of all their youth, and that they are growen olde, as you vſe brute beaſtes that haue ſerued whileſt they may for age: me thinkes that muſt needes proceede of to ſeueare and greedie nature, that hath no lenger regarde or conſideracion of humanitie, then whileſt one is able to doe an other good. For we ſee, gentleneſſe goeth further then iuſtice. For nature teacheth vs to vſe iuſtice onely vnto menne, but gentleneſſe ſometimes is ſhewed vnto brute beaſtes: and that commeth from the very fountaine and ſpringe of all curteſie and humanitie, which ſhoulde neuer drye vp in any manne liuinge. For to ſaye truely, to keepe caſt horſes ſpoyled in our ſeruice, and dogges alſo not onely when they are whelpes, but when they be olde: be euen tokens of loue and kindeneſſe. As the Athenians made a lawe, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they ſhoulde ſuffer the moyles and mulettes that did ſeruice in their cariages about the buildinge of the ſame, to graze euerie where, without lette or trouble of any manne. And they ſay, there was one of thoſe moyles thus turned at libertie, that came of her ſelfe to the place to labour, goinge before all the other draught beaſtes, that drewe vppe cartes loden towardes the caſtell, and kept them companie, as though ſhe ſeemed to encorage the reſt to drawe: which the people liked ſo well in the poore beaſt, that they appointed ſhe ſhoulde be kept whileſt ſhe liued, at the charge of the towne. And yet at this preſent are the graues of Cimons mares to be ſeene, that wanne him thriſe together the game of the horſe race at the games Olympian, and they are harde by the graue of Cimon him ſelfe. We heare of diuerſe alſo that hadde buried their dogges they brought vppe in their houſe, or that wayted on them: as amonge other olde Xanthippus buried his dogge on the toppe of a cliffe, which is called the dogges pit till this day. For when the people of Athens did forſake their citie at the comminge downe of Xerxes the kinge, this dogge followed his maſter, ſwimminge in the ſea by his gallies ſide, from the firme lande, vnto the Ile of Salamina. And there is no reaſon, to vſe liuinge and ſencible thinges, as we woulde vſe an olde ſhooe or a ragge: to caſt it out apon the donge-hill when we haue worne it, and can ſerue vs no longer. For if it were for no reſpect els, but to vſe vs alwayes to humanitie: we muſt euer ſhowe our ſelues kinde and gentle, euen in ſuch ſmall poyntes of pitie. And as for me, I coulde neuer finde in my hart to ſell my drawght Oxe that hadde plowed my lande a longe time, bicauſe he coulde plowe no longer for age: and much leſſe my ſlaue to ſell him for a litle money, out of the contrie where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his olde trade of life wherewith he was beſt acquainted, and then ſpecially, when he ſhalbe as vnprofitable for the buyer, as alſo for the ſeller. But Cato on the other ſide gloried, that he left his horſe in Spayne he had ſerued on in the warres duringe his Conſulſhip, bicauſe he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing of him home by ſea into Italie. Now a queſtion might be made of this, and probable reaſon of either ſide, whether this was noblenes, or a niggardlines in him: but otherwiſe to ſay truely, he was a man of a wonderful abſtinence. For when he was general of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three buſhells wheat a moneth of the common wealth, for him ſelfe and his whole family: and but a buſhel and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horſe and other beaſtes for his cariage. On a time when he was Prætor, the gouernment of the Ile of Sardinia fell to his lot. And where the other Prætors before him hadde put the contry to exceeding great charge, to furniſh them with tents, bedding, clothes, and ſuch like ſtuffe, and burdened them alſo with a maruelous traine of ſeruaunts and their frends that waited on them, putting them to great expence of feaſting and bancketing of them: Cato in contrary maner brought downe all that exceſſe and ſuperfluitie, vnto a maruelousneere and vncredible ſauinge. For when he

A he went to visite the cities, he came a foote to them, & did not put them to a penny charge for him selfe: and had onely one officer or bailife of the state, that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine to the goddes in his sacrifices. But though he came thus simply to the subiects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed him selfe seuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iustice: and spared no man, in any commaundement or seruice for the state and common wealth. For he was therein so precise, that he woulde not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernment, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they did before. For his grace both in speakinge and wrytinge did rightly shewe him selfe: bicause it was pleasaunt, and yet graue: sweete and fearfull: mery and seueare: sententious, and yet familiB ar: such as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared, as Plato sayed, vnto Socrates: who at the first sight seemed a plaine simple manne to them that knew him not outwardly, or else a pleasant tawnter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him throughly, they sawe he was full of graue sentences, goodly examples, and wise perswasions, that he coulde make men water their plantes that hearde him, and leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I can not see any reason that moues men to saye, Cato hadde Lysias grace and vtteraunce. Notwithstandinge, lette vs referre it to their iudgementes that make profession to discerne orators graces and styles: for my parte I shall content my selfe to write at this present, onely certaine of his notable sayinges and sentences, perswadinge my selfe that mennes manners are better discerned by their wordes, then by their lookes, and so doe many thinke.

C On a time he seeking to diswade the people of ROME, which woulde needes make a thankefull distribution of corne vnto euerie citizen, to no purpose: beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a harde thinge (my Lordes of ROME) to bringe the bellie by perswasion to reason, that hath no eares. And an other time, reprouinge the ill gouernment of the citie of ROME, he sayed: it was a hard thinge to keepe vppe that state, where a litle fishe was solde dearer then an Oxe. He sayed also that the ROMAINES were like a flocke of sheepe. For sayeth he, as euery weather when he is alone, doth not obey the sheepeheard, but when they are all together they one followe an other for loue of the foremest: euen so are you, for when you are together, you are all contented to be ledde by the noses by such, whose counsell not a man alone of you woulde vse in any priuate cause of your owne. And talkinge an other time

D of the authoritie the women of ROME had ouer their husbandes. He sayed: other men commaunde their wiues, and we commaunde men, and our wiues commaund vs. But this last of all, he borowed of Themistocles pleasaunt sayings. For his sonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day. The ATHENIANS commaund al GREECE, I commaunde the ATHENIANS, you commaunde me, and your sonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vse the libertie he hath with some better discretion, foole and asse as he is, sithence he can doe more by that power and authority, then all the GREECIANS besides. He sayed also that the people of ROME did not onely delight in diuerse sortes of purple, but likewise in diuerse sortes of exercises. For sayd he, as diuerse commonly dye that cullour they see best esteemed, and is most pleasaunt to the eye: euen so the lusty youthes of ROME doe frame

E them selues to such exercise, as they see your selues most like, and best esteme. He continually aduised the ROMAINES, that if their power & greatnes came by their vertue and temperance, they should take hede they became no chaungelings, nor waxe worse: & if they came to that greatnes by vice and violence, that then they should chaunge to better, for by that meanes he knew very wel they had attained to great honor & dignity. Again he told the, that such as sued ambitiously to beare office in the common wealth, & were common suters for them: did seme to be afraid to lose their way, & therfore would be sure to haue vshers & sergeants before the, to show them the way, least they should lose them selues in the city. He did reprone them also, that often chose one man, to continew one office still: for it seemeth, saith he, either that you passe not much for your officers, or that you haue not many choise me you thinke worthy for

F the office. There was an enemy of his that ledde a maruelous wicked and an abominable life, of whome he was wont to say, that when his mother prayed vnto the goddes that she might leaue her sonne behinde her, she did not thinke to pray, but to curse: meaninge to haue him liue for a plague to the world. And to an other also that had vnthriftely solde his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the sea side: he pointed vnto them with his finger, & made as though he wondered how he came to be so great a man, that he was stronger then the sea. For that which the sea hardly consumeth, and eateth into, by litle and litle a long time: he had consumed it all at a clappe. An other time when kinge Eumenes was come to ROME, the Senate entertained him maruelous honorably, and the noblest citizens did striue, enuying one an other, who shoulde welcome him best. But Cato in contrary maner shewed plainely, that he did suspect all this feastinge and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar frendes tolde him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes companie, that is so good a Prince, and loues the ROMAINES so well. Yea, sayed he, let it be so, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beast that liues of the pray: neither was there euer any kinge so happie, that deserued to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themistocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylcar, surnamed Barca. They say his enemies did malice him, bicause he vsed commonly to rise before day, & did forget his owne busines to folow matters of state. And he affirmed, that he had rather loose the rewarde of his well doing, then not to be punished for doing of euill: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorauntly, but not with him selfe. The ROMAINES hauing chosen on a time three Ambassadors to send into the realme of BITHYNIA, one of them hauing the gowte in his feete, the other his heade full of cuttes and great gashes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughinge, sayd the ROMAINES sent an Ambassade that had neither feete, heade, nor hart. Scipio sued once to Cato at Polybius requeste, about those that were banished from ACHAIA. The matter was argued afterwardes in the Senate, and there fell out diuers opinions about it. Some would haue had them restored to their contrie and goodes againe: other were wholly against it. So Cato rising vp at the last, sayed vnto them. It seemes we haue litle else to do, when we stand beating of our braines all day, disputing about these olde GREECIANS, whether the ROMAINES, or the ACHAIANS, shall bury them. In the end, the Senate tooke order, they shoulde be restored vnto their contrie againe. Whereuppon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the banished men whom they hadde restored by their order, might enioy their former estates and honors in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their banishment: but before he would moue the sute vnto the Senate, he woulde feele Catoes opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him, smyling: me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlysses, that when he had scaped out of Cyclops caue the gyant, he would nedes go thither againe, to fetch his hatte and girdell he had left behinde him there. He sayd also, that wise men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wise men. For wise men sayd he, do see the faults fooles commit, and can wisely auoide them: but fooles neuer study to follow the example of wise mens doings. He sayed also that he euer liked young men better that blushed, then those that looked euer whitely: and that he woulde not haue him for a souldier, that wagges his hande as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and snorteth lowder in his sleepe, then when he crieth out to his enemy. An other time when he woulde taunt a maruelous fatte man: see, sayed he, what good can such a body do to the common wealth, that from his chinne to his coddepece is nothing but belly? And to an other man that was geuen to pleasure, and desired to be great with him: my frende, sayed Cato, as refusinge his acquaintance: I can not liue with him that hath better iudgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his hart. This was also his sayinge, that the soule of a louer, liued in an others body: and that in all his life time he repented him of three thinges. The first was, if that he euer tolde secret to any woman: the seconde, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by lande: the thirde, that he had bene Idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious olde man, he would say, to reproue him: O gray bearde, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not besides with your vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a poysoner, and would needes passe some wicked law by voyce of the people, he woulde say: o young man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the drugges thou geuest, or to receiue the lawes thou offerest. An other time, being reuiled by one that ledde a lewde, and naughty life: go thy way, sayd he, I am no man to scolde with thee. For thou art so vsed to reuile, and to be reuiled, Cato woulde punish him selfe for offending.

That is to say vnderstanding. For they iudged that the seate of reason was placed in the hart, following Aristotles opinion.

Blushinge in younge men is a better token then palenes.

A louer liueth in an other body.

A reuiled, that it is not daynty to thee: But for my ſelfe, I neuer vſe to heare ſcolding, and much leſſe delite to ſcolde. Theſe be his wiſe ſayinges we finde written of him, whereby we may the eaſilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now, when he was choſen Conſull with his frend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAYNE fell to his lott, that is on this ſide of the riuer of BÆTIS. So, Cato hauinge ſubdued many people by force of armes, and wonne others alſo by frendly meanes: ſodainly there came a maruelous great army of the barbarous people againſt him, & had enuironned him ſo, as he was in maruelous daunger, either ſhamefully to be taken priſonner, or to be ſlaine in the fielde. Wherefore, he ſent preſently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. Theſe CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred talentes to come & help him: but the ROMAINES

B that were about him, coulde not abide to hyer the barbarous people to defende them. Then Cato tolde them ſtraight, there was no hurt in it, nor any diſhonor vnto them. For ſayed he, if the fielde be ours, then we ſhall pay their wages we promiſed, with the ſpoyle and money of our enemies: and if we looſe it, then our ſelues and they lye by it, beinge left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the ende he wanne the battel, after a ſore conflict, and after that time he hadde maruelous good fortune. For Polybius wryteth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this ſide the riuer of BÆTIS, were by his commaundement raſed all in one day, which were many, and full of good ſouldiers. Him ſelfe wryteth, that he tooke moe cities in SPAYNE, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boaſt, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of thē. Now, though the ſouldiers vnder him had gotten

C well in this iorney, and were riche, yet he cauſed a pounde weight of ſiluer to be geuen to euery ſouldier beſides: ſayinge, he liked it better that many ſhould returne home with ſiluer in their purſes, then a few of them with golde only. But for him ſelfe, he affirmed: that of all the ſpoyle gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thinge, ſauinge that which he tooke in meate and drinke. And yet, ſayth he, I ſpeake it not to reproue them that grow riche by ſuch ſpoiles: but bicauſe I woulde contende in vertue rather with the beſt, then in money with the richeſt, or in couetouſnes with the moſt vertuous. For, not only he him ſelfe was cleare from bribes and extorcion, but his officers alſo vnder him kept the ſame courſe. In this Spaniſh iorney, he had fiue of his ſeruauntes with him, whereof one of them called Pauus, bought three younge boyes that were taken in the warres, when the ſpoile was ſolde to them that would geue moſt.

D So Cato knew it. But Pauus being afrayed to come neere his maiſter, hong him ſelfe: and then Cato ſolde the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treaſory cheſtes of ſauing at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAYNE, Scipio the great that was his enemy, & ſought to hinder the courſe of his proſperitie, and to haue the honor of conqueringe all the reſt of SPAYNE: he made all the frendes he could to the people, to be choſen in Catoes place. He was no ſooner entred into his charge, but he made all the poſſible ſpede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority ceaſſe the ſooner. Cato hearing of his haſty comminge, tooke only fiue enſignes of footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen to attende vpon him home: with the which, in his iorney homeward, he ouercame a people in SPAYNE called the LACETANIANS, and tooke ſixe hundred traytors alſo that were fled from the ROMAINES campe to their

E enemies, and did put to death euery mothers childe of them. Scipio ſtorming at that, ſayd Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, ſayed: it was the right way to bringe ROME to floriſh, when noble borne citizens would not ſuffer meane borne men, and vpſtarts as him ſelfe was, to go before them in honor: and on the other ſide when meane borne men woulde contende in vertue, with thoſe that were of nobleſt race, and farre aboue them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commaunded that nothing ſhoulde be chaunged nor altered otherwiſe, then Cato had appointed it, whileſt he was in his office. So that the gouernment for which Scipio made ſuch earneſt ſute in SPAYNE, was a greater diſgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: bicauſe he paſſed al his time & office in peace, hauing no occaſion offered him to doe any notable ſeruice worthy memory. Further note, Cato after he had bene

F Conſul, and hadde graunted to him the honor to triumphe: did not as many others doe, that ſeeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honor and dignity. Who, when they haue bene called to the higheſt offices of ſtate, as to be Conſulls, and haue alſo graunted them the honor to triumphe: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of ſtate,& diſpoſe them ſelues to liue merely and quietely at home, and not to trouble them ſelues any more. Now Cato, farre otherwiſe behaued him ſelfe. For he would neuer leaue to exerciſe vertue, but beganne a freſhe, as if he had bene but a young noueſſe in the world, and as one greedy of honor and reputacion, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleaſure his frends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their cauſes for them that required his counſell, and go with his frendes alſo into the warres. As he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Conſul, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conqueſt of the contry of THRACE, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuer of DANVBYE apon thoſe marches. After that, he was in GREECE alſo, Collonell of a thowſande footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the great, who made the ROMAINES as much afrayed of him, as euer they were of enemy but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of ASIA, which Seleucus Nicanor enioyed before, & had ſubdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was ſo proude harted, as he would nedes haue wars with the ROMAINES, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and beſt able to fight with him. So he made ſome honeſt ſhow and pretence of warres, ſaying: it was to ſet the GREECIANS at liberty, who had no cauſe thereof, conſidering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of kinge Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodneſſe of the ROMAINES. Notwithſtandinge, he came out of ASIA into GREECE with a maruelous great army, and all GREECE was ſtraight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, bicauſe of the great promiſes and large hopes the gouernours of diuerſe cities (whome the kinge had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto them. Whereupon Manius diſpatched Ambaſſadors vnto the cities, and ſent Titus Quintius Flaminius amonge others, who kept the greateſt parte of the people from rebellinge (that were eaſily drawen to geue eare to this innouation) as we haue expreſſed more amply in his life: and Cato beinge ſent Ambaſſador alſo, perſwaded the CORINTHIANS, thoſe of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them ſticke ſtill to the ROMAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some ſay they finde an oration of his wrytten in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendacion of their aunceſters: wherein he ſayd, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee ATHENS, for the beauty and ſtatelineſſe of the city. But this is falſe. For he ſpake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he coulde haue vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene diſpoſed: but he did like the lawes and cuſtomes of his owne contrie, and the ROMAINE tongue ſo well, that he laughed at them that would praiſe and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Poſthumius Albinus, who wrote an hiſtory in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they founde any imperfection in the tongue: mary, ſayd Cato, he had deſerued pardon in deede, if he hadde bene forced to haue wrytten his ſtory in the Greeke tonge, by order of the ſtates of GREECE, called the counſel of the Amphictyōs. They ſay the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his redy tongue. For what he had vttered quickely in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circūſtances, & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GREECIANS words lay all in their lippes, and the ROMAINES wordes in their heades. Now kinge Antiochus kept all the ſtraightes and narrow paſſages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES, (beinge the ordinary way and entry into GREECE) and had fortified them as well with his army that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as alſo with walles and trenches he had made by hande, beſides the naturall ſtrength & fortification of the mount it ſelfe in ſundry places: and ſo he determined to remaine there, truſting to his owne ſtrength and fortifications aforeſayed, and to turne the force of the warres ſome other way. The ROMAINES alſo, they diſpayred vtterly they ſhould be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembringe with him ſelfe the compaſſe the PERSIANS hadde fetched about before time likewiſe to enter into GREECE: he departed one night from the campe with parte of the army: to proue if he could finde the very compaſſe about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the priſoners taken in the contrie, loſt his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruelous ſteepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore ſouldiers

A ſouldiers were in maruelous ill taking. Cato ſeeing the daunger they were brought into by this lewde guide, commaunded all his ſouldiers not to ſturre a foote from thence, and to tary him there: and in the meane time he went him ſelfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a luſtie man, and nimble to climbe apon the rockes) and ſo went forwarde at aduenture, takinge extreame and vncredible paine, & in as much daunger of his life; grubbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wilde Olyue trees, and high rockes (that let them they coulde not ſee before them, neither could tell whether they went) vntill they ſtumbled at the length vppon a litle pathe way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they ſet vppe certeine markes and tokens, vppon the higheſt toppes of the rockes they coulde chooſe, by view of eye to be diſcerned furtheſt of v-

B pon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetche the ſouldiers, whom they led towardes their markes they had ſet vp: vntill at the length they founde their pathe waye againe, where they putte their ſouldiers in order to marche. Now they went not farre in this pathe they founde, but the way failed them ſtraight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worſe caſe then before, and in greater feare, not knowinge they were ſo neere their enemies, as in deede they were. The day began to breake a litle, and one of them that marched formeſt, thought he hearde a noyſe, and that he ſaw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certeine ſouldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them ſtay, & willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, bicauſe he had founde them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his

C commaundement. They were with him at a triſe to know his pleaſure: ſo Cato ſaid vnto them. My fellowes, I muſt haue ſome of our enemies taken priſoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that paſſage, what number they be, what order they keepe, howe they are camped and armed, and after what ſorte they determine to fight with vs. The waye to worke this feate, ſtandeth apon ſwiftnes, and hardines to runne apon them ſodainely, as Lyons doe, which beinge naked feare not to runne into the middeſt of any hearde of fearfull beaſtes. He had no ſooner ſpoken theſe wordes, but the FIRMANIAN ſouldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaine, as they were, apon thoſe that kept the watch: and ſo ſetting apon them, they beinge out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man priſoner. When they had him, they ſtraight brought him vnto Cato, who by othe of the priſoner was aduertiſed, howe that

D the ſtrength of their enemies armie was lodged about the perſone of the kinge, within the ſtraight and valley of the ſaid mountaine: and that the ſouldiers they ſaw, were ſixe hundred ÆTOLIANS, all braue ſouldiers, whome they had choſen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making ſmall accompt of the matter, as well for their ſinall number, as alſo for the ill order they kept: he made the trompets ſounde ſtraight, and his ſouldiers to marche in battell with great cries, him ſelfe being the formeſt man of all his troupe, with a ſworde drawen in his hand. But when the ÆTOLIANS ſaw them comming downe the rockes towardes them, they beganne to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all diſorder. Now Manlius at the ſame preſent alſo, gaue an aſſault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made,

E ouerthwart the vallies and ſtraightes of the mountaines: at which aſſault, king Antiochus ſelfe had a blow on the face with a ſtone, that ſtrake ſome of his teeth out of his mouth, ſo that for very paine & anguiſh he felt, he turned his horſe backe, and got him behinde the preaſe. And then there were none of his armie that made any more reſiſtaunce, or that coulde abide the fierceneſſe of the ROMAINES. But notwithſtanding that the places were very ill for flying, bicauſe it was vnpoſſible for them to ſcatter and ſtraggle, beinge holden in with high rockes on the one ſide of them, and with bogges and deepe mariſſes on the other ſide, which they muſt needes fall into if their feete ſlipped, or were thruſt forwarde by any: yet they fell one apon an other in the ſtraightes, and ranne ſo in heapes together, that they caſt them ſelues away, for

F feare of the ROMAINES ſwordes that lighted vppon them in euery corner. And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremony or niſenes to praiſe him ſelfe openly, nor reckened it any ſhame to do it: did take a preſent occaſion for it, as falleth out apon all victory and famous exploytes. And ſo did ſet it out with all the oſtentacion and braue wordes he could geue. For he wrote with his owne handes, that such as saw him chase and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to say, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINES, but the ROMAINES bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hotte with chasinge of the enemy: and spake alowde with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of ROME could recompence Cato for his valliant seruice that day. After this battell, the Consul Manius sent Cato to ROME, to be the messenger him selfe to reporte the newes of the victory. So he imbarked incontinently, and had such a fayer winde, that he passed ouer the sea to BRINDES without any daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENTVM in one day, and from TARENTVM in foure dayes more to ROME. And so he came to ROME in fiue dayes after his landing in ITALIE, and made such speede, that him selfe was in deede the first messenger that brought newes of the victorie. Whereupon he filled all ROME with ioy and sacrifices, and made the ROMAINES so proude, that euer after they thought them selues able men to conquer the worlde both by sea and lande. And these be all the martiall deedes and noble actes Cato did. But for his doings in ciuill policie and state, he semed to be of this opinion. That to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thinge an honest man and good gouernour of the common wealth coulde employ him selfe vnto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be shorte, he did alwayes stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobility, the greatnes of his house, and the magnanimity of his minde, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they shoulde be able to condemne him. And so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he ioyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter so sore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the cõmon wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is sayd that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a younge manne by the way that had ouerthrowen his aduersary in sute, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame and foyle before the people: he imbraced him with a good countenaunce, and sayd vnto him. Oh my sonne, sacrifices that good children should offer to their fathers soule, be not lammes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free him selfe from daunger, in administration of the cõmon wealth. For if they could katch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost a fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of foure score yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: that it was a harder thinge to geue vp an accompt of his life before men in any other world, then in this among whom he liued. And yet was not this the last sute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was foure score and tenne yeares of age, he accused Seruius Galba. And thus he liued as Nestor, in maner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall sute and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of state and common wealth: he went on vnto the time of the seconde, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus AEmylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of MACEDON. Furthermore, Marcus Cato, tenne yeares after his Consulship, sued to be Censor, which was in ROME the greatest office of dignity that any citizen of ROME could attaine vnto: and as a man may say, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authorities the Censor had power to examine mens liues & maners, and to punish euery offendor. For the ROMAINES were of that minde, that they woulde not haue men marry, gette children, liue priuately by them selues, and make feastes and banckettes at their pleasure, but that they should stande in feare to be reproued and inquiered of by the magistrate: and that it was not good to geue euery body liberty, to doe what they would, following his owne lust and fansie. And they iudging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other thinges that are openly done at none dayes, and in the sight of the worlde: vsed to choose two Censors, that were two Surueyors of maners, to see that euery man behaued him selfe vertuously, and gaue not them selues to pleasure, nor to breake the lawes and customes of

The dignity and office of the Censor.

A of the common wealth. Theſe officers were called in their tongue, Cenſores, and alwayes of cuſtome one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. Theſe two had power and authority to diſgrade a knight by taking away his horſe, & to put any of the Senate, whom they ſaw liue diſſolutely and diſorderly. It was their office alſo, to ceaſſe and rate euery citizen accordinge to the eſtimacion of their goodes, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, and to kepe bookes of them, beſides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therefore when Cato came to ſue for this office among other, the chiefeſt Senators were all bent againſt him. Some of them for very enuy, thinkinge it ſhame and diſhonor to the nobility, to ſuffer menne that were meanely borne, and vpſtartes (the firſt of their houſe and name, that euer came to beare office in the ſtate) to be called & preferred vnto the B higheſt offices of ſtate in all their common wealth. Other alſo that were ill liuers, & knowing that they had offended the lawes of their contry: they feared his cruelty to much, imagining he would ſpare no man, nor pardon any offence, hauing the law in his owne hands. So when they had conſulted together about it, they did ſet vp ſeuen competitors againſt him, who flattered the people with many fayer wordes and promiſes, as though they had neede of magiſtrates to vſe them gently, and to doe thinges for to pleaſe them. But Cato contrariwiſe, ſhewinge no countenaunce that he would vſe them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning thoſe that had liued naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they muſt reforme their citie, and perſwaded the people not to chooſe the gentleſt, but the ſharpeſt phiſitions: and that him ſelfe was ſuch a one as they needed, & among the PATRICIANS C Valerius Flaccus an other, in whoſe company he hoped (they two beinge choſen Cenſors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burninge and cutting of (like Hydras heades) all vanity and voluptuous pleaſures, that were crept in amongeſt them: and that he ſawe well enough, how all the other ſuters ſought the office by diſhoneſt meanes, fearing ſuch officers as they knew would deale iuſtly & vprightly. Then did the people of ROME ſhew them ſelues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refuſed not the ſowerneſſe or ſeuerity of Cato, but reiected theſe meale mouthed men, that ſeemed ready to pleaſe the people in all thinges: and thereupon choſe Marcus Cato Cenſor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he hadde bene preſent officer, and no ſuter for the office, being in themſelues to giue it to whom they thought good. The firſt thing he did after he was D ſtalled in his Cenſorſhip, was: that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus, his frend and fellow Cenſor with him, prince of the Senate: & among many other alſo whom he thruſt out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius of the Senate, that had bene Conſull ſeuen yeares before, and was brother alſo vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glory to him, then that he had bene Conſull. But the cauſe why he put him of the Senate, was this. This Lucius Quintius caried euer with him a younge boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenaunce and credit vnto, as to any of his beſt familiar frendes he had about him. It fortuned on a time whileſt Lucius Quintius was Conſull and gouernour of a prouince, that he made a feaſt, and this boy being ſet at his table hard by him, as his maner was, he beganne to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was E pretily mery: & ſoothing him, told him he loued him ſo dearely, that vpon his departing from ROME, when the Swordeplaiers were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated ſwords to ſhew the people paſtime, he came his way, and left the ſight of that he neuer ſaw, that was very deſirous to haue ſeene a man killed. Then this Lucius Quintius, to make him ſee the like, ſayed: care not for the ſight thou haſt loſt, boy, for I will let thee ſee as much. And when he had ſpoken theſe wordes, he commaunded a priſoner condemned to dye, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hangman with his axe. Which was forthwith done according to his commaundement. Then asked he the boy, if he would ſtraight ſee the man killed: yea, ſir, ſayd the boy: and with that he bad the hangman ſtrike of his head. Moſt wryters reporte this matter thus. And Cicero to confirme it alſo, wrote in his booke de Senectute F that the ſame was wrytten in an oration Cato made before the people of ROME. Now Lucius Quintius beinge thus ſhamefully put of the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus beinge offended withall, coulde not tell what to doe, but beſought the people they woulde commaunde Cato

to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereuppon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirminge it was not so: Cato would haue had him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who sayed he woulde not sweare. Whereupon the people iudged straight that he deserued well that shame. So not longe after, certaine games beinge shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passinge beyonde the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloofe amongest the multitude. The people tooke pity on him, and made such a do about him, as they forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls: saluing the best they could, the shame and dishonor happened vnto so noble a house. Cato put out of the Senate also, one Manilius, who was in great towardnes to haue bene made Consull the next yere following, only bicause he kissed his wife to louingly in the day time, & before his daughter: and reprouing him for it, he tolde him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it thundered. So when he was disposed to be mery, he would say it was happy with him when Iupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the victories he had won against the great king Antiochus: which wan him much ill wil, bicause it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead. But the most thing that greeued the people of all other extreamities he vsed, was his putting downe of all feastes and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, bicause it was so common a thinge, and euery man was giuen to to it. Therefore Cato to fetche it about indirectly, did praise euery citizens goodes, and rated their apparell, their coches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iuells, and all other moueables and household stuffe, that had cost aboue a thousand fiue hundred Drachmes a peece, at tenne times as much as they were worth: to the end that such as had bestowed their money in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners of them should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasory: to the ende that they who were greeued with this taxe, and sawe other pay lesse subsidy (that were as much worth as them selues, by liuing without such toyes) might call home them selues againe, and lay a side such foolishe brauery and fineneſſe. Notwithstandinge, Cato was enuied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanity: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme them selues, then pay the taxe. And some thinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goodes, then to let them to make shew of them: and they haue a fonde opinion besides, that their riches is better seene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar frends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, & to make him graunt it the sooner, told him it was a thinge he might well spare, and did him no good: mary sayeth he, all the goodes I haue, are in such toyes as do me no good. So this couetous desire we haue to be rich, commeth of no necessary desire in nature, but is bred in vs by a false opinion from the common sorte. Now, Cato caringe least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grewe to be more straight and seuere. For he cut of the pipes and quilles priuate men had made to conuey water into their houses & gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their cõmon conduite heades, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their dores into the strete, & brought downe the prises of cõmon workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could: all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of most men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other beinge bent against him in open Senate, caused all Catoes couenauntes and bargaines made, with the master worke man for repayring & mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly preiudiciall to the common wealth. And they did also stirre vp the boldest and rashest of the Tribunes of the people against him, bicause they shoulde Scopas goodes were all in toyes, that did him no good.

A should accuse him vnto the people, and make requeſt he might be condemned in the ſumme of two talentes. They did marueloufly hinder alſo the buildinge of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate houſe: which pallace was finiſhed notwithſtanding, & called after his name, Baſilica Porcia: as who would ſay, the pallace Porcius the Cenſor built. Howebeit it ſeemed the people of ROME did greatly like and commend his gouernment in the Cenſorſhippe. For they ſet vp a ſtatue of him in the temple of the goddeſſe of health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumphe, but only ingraued this inſcription word for worde, to this effect by tranſlation: For the honor of Marcus Cato the Cenſor: bicauſe he reformed the diſcipline of the common wealth of ROME (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licentious life) by his wiſe preceptes, good maners, B and holy inſtitutions. In deede, before this image was ſet vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were deſirous of ſuch thinges: ſaying, they did not conſider how they bragged in founders, painters, and image makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for him ſelfe, the people did alwayes eary liuely images of him in their hartes, meaninge the memory of his life & doings. When ſome wondered why diuerſe meane men and vnknowen perſones had images ſet vp of them, and there were none of him: he gaue them this aunſwer. I had rather men ſhould aske why Cato had no Image ſet vp for him, then why he had any. In the ende, he would haue no honeſt man abide to be praiſed, onles his praiſe turned to the be- nefit of the common wealth: and yet was he one of them that would moſt praiſe him ſelfe. So that if any had done a fault, or ſtept awry, and that men had gone about to reproue them: he C woulde ſay they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offende. And ſuch as counterfeated to follow any of his doinges, and came ſhorte of his maner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would ſay, that in moſt daungerous times the Senate vſed to caſt their eyes vpon him, as paſſengers on the ſea do looke vpon the maſter of the ſhippe in a ſtorme: & that many times when he was abſent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come amonge them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other, as by him ſelfe. His authority was great in matters of ſtate, for his wiſedome, his eloquence, and great expe- rience. Beſides this commendacion, they praiſed him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, & a good ſauer for his profit: for he was neuer careles of them, as things to be lightly paſſed on. And therfore me thinkes I muſt nedes tell you by the way, ſome parte D of his well doinge, to followe our declaration of him. Firſt of all, he maried a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both ſhould make her proude & ſtoute enough: but yet he euer thought the nobler borne, would be the more aſhamed of diſhoneſty, then the meaner borne: and therefore that they would be more obedient to their husbandes, in all ho- neſt maner and reaſonable things. Furthermore, he ſayd: that he that bet his wife or his child, did commit as great a ſacriledge, as if he polluted or ſpoiled the holyeſt thinges of the world: and he thought it a greater praiſe for a man to be a good husband, then a good Senator. And therefore he thought nothinge more commendable in the life of olde Socrates, then his paci- ence, in vſing his wife well, that was ſuch a ſhrewe, and his children that were ſo harebrainde. After Catoes wife had brought him a ſonne, he could not haue ſo earneſt buſines in hande, if it E had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his houſe, a- bout the time his wife did vnſwadell the younge boy to waſhe and ſhift him: for ſhe gaue it ſucke with her owne breſtes, and many times woulde let the ſlaues children ſucke of her alſo, bicauſe they might haue a naturall loue towardes her ſonne, hauinge ſucked one milke, and bene brought vp together. When his ſonne was come to age of diſcretion, and that he was able to learne any thinge, Cato him ſelfe did teache him, notwithſtanding he had a ſlaue in his houſe called Chilo (a very honeſt man, & a good grammarian) who did alſo teach many other: but as he ſayed him ſelfe, he did not like, a ſlaue ſhould rebuke his ſonne, nor pull him by the eares, when paraduenture he was not apt to take very ſodainely that was taught him: neither would he haue his ſonne bounde to a ſlaue for ſo great a matter as that, as to haue his learning F of him. Wherefore he him ſelfe taught him his grammer, the law, and to exerciſe his body, not only to throw a dart, to play at the ſword, to vawt, to ride a horſe, and to handle all ſortes of weapons, but alſo to fight with fiſtes, to abide colde and heate, and to ſwimme ouer a ſwift runninge riuer. He ſayed moreouer, that he wrote goodly hiſtories in great letters with his owne hande, bicauſe his ſonne might learne in his fathers houſe the vertues of good men in times paſt, that he taking example by their doinges, ſhould frame his life to excell them. He ſayed alſo, that he tooke as great heede of ſpeaking any fowle or vncomely wordes before his ſonne, as he would haue done if he had bene before the Veſtall Nunnes. He neuer was in the whotte houſe with his ſonne: for it was a common vſe with the ROMAINES at that time, that the ſonnes in law did not bathe them ſelues with their fathers in law, but were aſhamed to ſee one an other naked. But afterwardes they hauinge learned of the GREEKES to waſh them ſelues naked with men, it taught them alſo to be naked in the bathe euen with their wiues. There lacked no towardlines, nor good diſpoſition in Catoes ſonne, to frame him ſelfe vertuous: for he was of ſo good a nature, that he ſhewed him ſelfe willing to followe whatſoeuer his father had taught him. Howebeit he was ſuch a weake pulinge, that he coulde not away with much hardneſſe, and therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that ſtraight and painfull life, which him ſelfe had kept. Yet he became valliant in the warres. For he fought maruelous ſtowtely in the battell, in which Perſeus the kinge of MACEDON was ouerthrowen by Paulus AEmylius: where his ſword being ſtriken out of his hand with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reaſon his hand was ſomwhat ſweaty beſides, he fell into a great fury, and prayed of his frendes about him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vppon the enemies in that place where his ſword fell out of his hande, and came in ſo fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them, and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much a do, being vnder ſuch a heape of dead bodies and other weapons, as well ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, one lying on an other. Paulus AEmylius the Generall hearing of this act of his, did highly cõmende the younge man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his ſonne, in the which he praiſeth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recoueringe of his ſworde againe. Afterwardes, this Cato the younger maried Tertia, one of Paulus AEmylius daughters, and ſiſter vnto Scipio the ſeconde, and ſo was matched in this noble houſe, not onely for his owne vertues ſake, but for reſpect of his fathers dignity & authority: wherby the great care, paines, and ſtudy that Cato the father tooke in bringing vp his ſonne in vertue and learninge, was honorably rewarded in the happy beſtowing of his ſonne. He euer had a great number of young litle ſlaues which he bought, when any would ſell their priſoners in the warres. He did chooſe them thus young, bicauſe they were apt yet to learne any thinge he would traine them vnto, and that a man might breake them, like young coltes, or litle whelpes. But none of them all, how many ſoeuer he had, did euer goe to any mans houſe, but when him ſelfe or his wife did ſende them. If any man asked them what Cato did: they aunſwered, they coulde not tell. And when they were within, either they muſt needes be occupied about ſomewhat, or elſe they muſt ſleepe: for he loued them well that were ſleepy, holdinge opinion that ſlaues that loued ſleepe were more tractable, and willing to do any thing a man would ſet them to, then thoſe that were waking. And bicauſe he thought that nothing more did prouoke ſlaues to miſchiefe and naughtines, then luſt and deſire of women: he was contented his ſlaues might company with his bondewomen in his houſe, for a peece of money he appointed them to pay, but with ſtraight commaundement beſides, that none of them ſhould deale with any other woman abroade. At the firſt when he gaue him ſelfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his ſeruauntes did about his perſone: ſaying it was a fowle thing for a gentleman or noble man, to fall out with his ſeruauntes for his belly. Afterwardes, as he roſe to better ſtate, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or ſupper for any of his frendes and familiars, they were no ſooner gone, but he woulde ſcourge them with whippes and leather thonges, that had not waited as they ſhould haue done at the borde, or had forgotten any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with an other: for he could not abide they ſhould be frendes, beinge euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deſerued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to dye, he would put him to death before them all. Howebeit in his latter time he grewe greedy, and gaue vp his tillage, ſayinge it was rather pleaſaunt, then profitable. Therfore bicauſe he would lay out his money ſurely, and bring a certaine renenue

Furthermore, he was a great vſerer, both by land and by ſea: and the vſery he tooke by ſea was moſt extreame of all other, for he vſed it in this ſorte. He would haue them to whome he lent his money vnto, that traffiked by ſea, to haue many parteners, and to the number of fifty: and that they ſhould haue ſo many ſhippes. Then he would venter among them for a parte onely, whereof Quintius his ſlaue whom he had manumiſed, was made his factor, and vſed to ſayle, and traffiked with the marchaunts, to whom he had lent his money out to vſery. B riches by his vſery. Moreouer he lent money to any of his ſlaues, that would therwith buy other young ſlaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do ſeruice, at Catoes charge and coſt: and then they ſolde them againe at the yeares ende, and ſome of them Cato kept for his owne ſeruice, and gaue his ſlaues as much for them, as any other offered. Therfore to allure his ſonne in like manner to make profitte of his money: he tolde him it was no wiſe mans parte to diminiſhe his ſubſtance, but rather the parte of a widowe. Yet this was a token of a moſt greedy couetous minde, that he durſt affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortall praiſe, that increaſed his wealth and patrimony more, then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was growen very olde, Carneades the ACADEMICKE, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were ſent from ATHENS as Ambaſſadors to ROME, to ſue for a releaſe of a fyne of fiue hundred talentes
C which they had impoſed on the ATHENIANS apon a condemnation paſſed againſt them, for a contempt of appearaunce, by the ſentence of the SICYONIANS, at the ſute of the OROPIANS. Immediatly when theſe two Philoſophers were arriued in the citie of ROME, the younge gentlemen that were geuen to their bookes, did viſite and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them ſpeake, and ſpecially to Carneades: whoſe grace in ſpeaking, and force of perſwading was no leſſe, then the fame ranne vppon him, and ſpecially when he was to ſpeake in ſo great an audience, and before ſuch a ſtate, as would not ſuppreſſe his praiſe. ROME ſtraight was full, as if a winde had blowen this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GREECIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence woulde leade a man as he luſt. There was no other talke a while through the whole city, he had ſo in-D flamed the younge gentlemens mindes with loue and deſire to be learned: that all other pleaſures and delightes were ſet a ſide, and they diſpoſed them ſelues to no other exerciſe, but to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, as if ſome ſecrete and diuine inſpiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lordes and Senators of ROME were glad, and reioyced much to ſee their youth ſo well geuen to knowledge, and to the ſtudy of the Greeke tongue, and to delite in the company of theſe two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that young men beganne to ſtudy the Greeke tongue, and that it grewe in eſtimacion in ROME, did diſlike of it: fearing leaſt the youth of ROME that were deſirous of learninge and eloquence, woulde vtterly giue ouer the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he ſawe the eſtimacion and fame of theſe two perſonages did increaſe more and more, E and in ſuch ſorte that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefeſt of the Senate, made ſute to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the citie by ſome honeſt meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambaſſadors were long there, and had no diſpatche: conſidering alſo they were cunninge men, and coulde eaſily perſwade what they would. And if there were no other reſpect, this onely might perſwade them to determine ſome aunſwere for them, and ſo to ſend them home againe to their ſchooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he ſpake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as ſome men thought: but bicauſe he generally hated Philoſophy, and of an ambition deſpiſed the muſes, & knowledge of the Greeke F tongue. Which was the more ſuſpected, bicauſe he had ſayd, the auncient Socrates was but a buſie man, and a ſturrer vp of ſedition, and ſought by all meanes poſſible to vſurpe tyranny, and rule in his contrie: by peruerting and chaunging the maniers and cuſtomes of the ſame, and alluringe the ſubiectes thereof to a diſlikinge of their lawes and auncient cuſtomes. And he laughed at Socrates ſchoole, that taught the arte of eloquence: ſaying, his ſchollers waxed old, and were ſtill ſo long a learning, that they ment to vſe their eloquence and pleade cauſes in another worlde, before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore, to plucke his ſonne from the ſtudy of the Greeke tongue, he ſayd to him with a ſtrayned voyce, and in a bigger ſound then he was wont to doe: (as if he had ſpoken to him by way of prophecy or inſpiration) that ſo longe as the ROMAINES diſpoſed them ſelues to ſtudy the Greeke tongue, ſo longe woulde they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine wordes falſe and vntrue. For the citie of ROME did neuer floriſhe ſo much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer ſo great, as at that time, when learninge and the Greeke tongue moſt floriſhed. Howebeit Cato did not onely hate the Philoſophers of GREECE, but did diſlike them alſo, that profeſſed phiſicke in ROME. For he had either hearde or red the aunſwere Hippocrates made, when the king of PERSIA ſent for him, and offered him a great ſumme of golde and ſiluer, if he woulde come and ſerue him: who ſware he would neuer ſerue the barbarous people, that were naturall enemies to the GREECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an othe that al other phiſitions ſware euer after: wherefore he commaunded his ſonne to flie from them all alike, and ſayed he hadde wrytten a litle booke of phiſicke, with the which he did heale thoſe of his houſe when they were ſicke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwayes bringe them vppe with erbes, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringedoues, and hares: for ſuch meates, ſayd he, are good for the ſicke, and light of diſgeſtion, ſauing that they make them dreame and ſnorte that eate them. He boaſted alſo how with this maner of phiſicke, he did alwayes keepe him ſelfe in health, and his family from ſickenes. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife, and his ſonne alſo. But he him ſelfe was of a ſtronge nature, and a luſty body, full of ſtrength, and health, and liued long without ſickeneſſe: ſo that when he was a very olde man and paſt mariage, he loued women well, and maried a younge maiden for that cauſe onely. After his firſt wife was dead, he maried his ſonne vnto Paulus AEmylius daughter, the ſiſter of Scipio, the ſeconde AFRICAN. Cato him ſelfe beinge a widower, tooke paines with a prety younge maide that waited in his houſe, and came by ſtelth to his chamber: howebeit this haunt coulde not long continue ſecret in his houſe, and ſpecially where there was a younge gentlewoman maried, but needes muſt be ſpied. So, one day when this young maide went ſomewhat boldly by the chamber of young Cato, to go into his father, the young man ſayd neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was ſomewhat aſhamed, and gaue the maide no good countenaunce. Wherefore findinge that his ſonne and daughter in lawe were angry with the matter, ſayinge nothinge to them of it, nor ſhewinge them any ill countenaunce: he went one morninge to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongeſt whome was one Salonius, that had bene his clearke, and wayted vpon him as the reſt did. Cato calling him out alowde by his name, asked him if he hadde not yet beſtowed his daughter. Salonius aunſwered him, he had not yet beſtowed her, nor woulde not, before he made him priuie to it. Then Cato tolde him againe: I haue founde out a husbande for her, and a ſonne in lawe for thee, and it will be no ill matche for her, vnleſſe ſhe miſlike the age of the man, for in deede he is very olde, but otherwiſe there is no faulte in him. Salonius tolde him againe, that for that matter, he referred all to him, and his daughter alſo, prayinge him euen to make what matche he thought good for her: for ſhe was his humble ſeruaunt, and relyed wholly vppon him, ſtandinge in neede of his fauor and furtheraunce. Then Cato beganne to diſcouer, and tolde him plainely he woulde willingely mary her him ſelfe. Salonius therewith was abaſhed, bicauſe he thought Cato was too olde to mary then, and him ſelfe was no fitte manne to matche in any honorable houſe, ſpeciallie with a Conſull and one that hadde triumphed: howebeit in the ende, when he ſawe Cato ment good earneſt, he was very glad of the matche, and ſo with this talke they went on together to the markette place, and agreed then vpon the mariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the ſonne taking ſome of his kinne and frendes with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thinge, that for ſpight he ſhoulde bringe him a ſteppe mother into his houſe.

Then

A Then his father cried out,& sayd:O my sonne, I pray thee say not so,I like well all thou doest, and I finde no cause to complaine of thee: but I do it,bicause I desire to haue many children, and to leaue many such like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some say that Pisistratus the tyran of ATHENS, made such a like aunswere vnto the children of his first wife, which were men growen, when he maried his seconde wife Timonassa, of the towne of ARGOS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Thessalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a sonne by his second wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldest sonne died in his office beinge Prætor, of whome he often speaketh in diuerse of his bookes, commendinge him for a very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very paciently, and like a graue wise man, not leauing therefore to do any seruice or businesse B for the state, otherwise then he did before. And therein he did not,as Lucius Lucullus, & Metellus surnamed Pius,did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernment and state, after they were waxen olde. For he thought it a charge and duety,wherevnto euery honest man whilest he liued, was bounde in all piety. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN hadde done before him, who perceiuing that the glory & fame of his doings did purchase him the ill will of the citizens, he chaunged the rest of his life into quietnes,and forsooke the citie and all dealings in common wealth,and went & dwelt in the contry.But as there was one that told Dionysius, the tyran of SYRACVSA, as it is wrytten,that he could not die more honorably,then to be buried in the tyranny: euen so did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honestlie, olde,then in seruing of the common wealth,vnto his dying day.So at vacant times,when Ca- C to was desirous a litle to recreate and refresh him selfe, he passed his time away in makinge of bookes, and lookinge vppon his husbandry in the contry. This is the cause why he wrote so many kindes of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the contry, he did tende and followe all in his youth, for his profit. For he sayed he had but two sortes of reuenue, tillage, and sparinge: but in age, whatsoeuer he did in the contry, it was all for pleasure, and to learne some thinge euer of nature. For he hath wrytten a booke of the contry life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth howe to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe frutes. He woulde needes shew such singularity and skill in all thinges: when he was in his house in the contry, he fared a litle better then he did in other places,and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had lande lying about him,to come and suppe with him, and he would be D merry with them: so that his company was not onely pleasaunt, and likinge to olde folkes as him selfe, but also to the younger sorte. For he had seene much, and had experience in many thinges, and vsed much pleasaunt talke, profitable for the hearers. He thought the bord one of the chiefest meanes to breede loue amongest men, and at his owne table woulde alwayes praise good men and vertuous citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable acte and seruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for in deede he that wanne it, and rased it vtterly, was Scipio the seconde, but it was chiefely through Catoes counsell and aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and it chaunced apon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICKE to vnderstande the cause and controuersie that was betwene the E CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, kinge of NVMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither, bicause king Massinissa had euer bene a frend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowen by Scipio the first, who tooke for a fyne of them, a great parte of their Empire, and imposed apon them besides, a great yearely tribute. Now when he was come into that contrie, he founde not the citie of CARTHAGE in miserie, beggerie, and out of harte, as the ROMAINES supposed: but full of lusty youthes very riche and wealthie, and great store of armour and munition in it for the warres, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high sayle, and stowped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMAINES to leaue to vnderstande the contro- F uersies betwext the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, and rather to prouide betimes to destroye CARTHAGE, that hadde beene euer an auncient ennemie to the ROMAINES, and euer sought to be reuenged of that they hadde suffered at their handes before, and that they were now growen to that greatnes and corage in ſo ſhorte time, as in manner it was incredible: ſo as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the ROMAINES, as they euer did before. Therefore ſo ſoone as he returned to ROME, he plainly tolde the Senate, that the loſſes and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the laſt warres they had with them, had not ſo much diminiſhed their power & ſtrength, as the ſame had ſhewed their owne folly & lacke of wiſdom: for it was to be feared much, leaſt their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakened them for the warres. And that they made warres nowe with the NVMIDIANS, to exerciſe them onely, meaninge afterwardes to warre with them ſelues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermiſſion & ſtay of warres, only expecting time and opportunity to breake with them againe. They ſay moreouer, that beſides the perſwaſions he vſed, he brought with him of purpoſe, AFRICKE figges in his long ſleeues, which he ſhooke out amongeſt them in the Senate. When the Senators maruailed to ſee ſo goodly fayer greene figges, he ſayed: the contry that beareth them, is not aboue three dayes ſailinge from ROME. But yet this is more ſtraunge which they reporte of him beſides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one ende of his tale: me thinketh ſtill CARTHAGE would be vtterly deſtroyed. Publius Scipio Naſica, vſed euer in like manner the contrary ſpeech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE ſhould ſtand. This Publius Scipio ſaw, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and inſolency were full of abſurdities, and caried them ſelues very high, by reaſon of their happy ſucceſſe and victories, and were ſo lofty minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reaſon of their great authoritie, they imagined they might bringe their citie to what height they would. Therefore he ſpake it, that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwayes continue as a bridle, to raigne in the inſolency of the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no ſufficient power to make warres with the ROMAINES, nor yet to ouercome them: and euen ſo were they not wholly to be deſpiſed, and not to be feared at all. Cato ſtill replied to the contrary, that therein conſiſted the greateſt daunger of all: that a citie which was euer of great force and power, and had bene puniſhed by former warres and miſery, would alwayes haue an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horſe that had broken his halter, that being vnbridled, would runne vpon his rider. And therfore he thought it not good, nor ſounde aduiſe, ſo to ſuffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their ſtrength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward daunger, and the feare they ſtoode in to looſe their conqueſt: and ſpecially, when they left meanes within the city ſelfe to fall ſhill againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cauſe why they ſuppoſe Cato was the occaſion, of the thirde and laſt warre the ROMAINES had againſt the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begonne, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would ſay, who it ſhould be that ſhould ende thoſe warres. And it was Scipio the ſecond, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Colonell ouer a thouſand footemen: but in all battells, and whereſoeuer there was warres, he ſhewed him ſelfe euer valliant and wiſe. Inſomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto ROME, and Cato hearinge them, ſpake as they ſay, theſe two verſes of Homer:

Which prophecy, Scipio ſoone after confirmed true by his doinges. Moreouer, the iſſue Cato left behinde him, was a ſonne he had by his ſeconde wife: who was called (as we ſayd before) Cato SALONIAN, by reaſon of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldeſt ſonne that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a ſonne behinde him that came to be Conſull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philoſopher, one of the moſt vertuous men of his time.

THE COMPARISON OF Aristides with Marcus Cato.

A NOw that we haue sette downe in wrytinge, these notable and worthie things of memory: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhappes the difference betwene the one and the other will not easily be discerned, seeinge there be so many similitudes and resemblances one of an other. But if we come to compare them in euery particularity, as we would doe Poets workes, or pictures drawen in tables: first, in this we shall finde them much a like, that hauing had nothing else to preferre and commende them, but their onely vertue & wisdom, they haue bene both gouernors in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honor and estimacion. But me thinkes when Aristides B came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and seigniory of Athens was then of no great power, and therefore it was easie for him to set him selfe in preasse. Besides, the other gouernors and captaines that were of his time, & competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authority. For the taxe of the richest persones then at Athens in reuenue, was but at fiue hundred bushells of corne, and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushells, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato comminge out of a litle village, from a rude contry life, went at the first dashe (as it were) to plunge him selfe into a bottomles sea of gouernment in the cõmon wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by such gouernors and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, and Ostilius C were in old time. For the people of Rome did no more bestow their offices vpon such meane laboring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they woulde looke now apon the nobility of their houses, and vpon their riches, that gaue them most money, or sued earnestly to them for the offices. And by reason of their great power and authority, they woulde be waited vpon, and sued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honorable offices of the state and common wealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to haue Themistocles an aduersary and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goodes his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fiue hundred talentes, when he beganne to deale in state) in respect as to contende for the chiefest place of honor and authority against Scipio African, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other main- E tenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnes. Moreouer, Aristides at the battells of Marathon, and of Platæes, was but one of the tenne captaines of the Athenians: where Cato was chosen one of the two Consuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Censors, before seuen other that made sute for it, which were all men of great reputacion in the citie, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Aristides was neuer the chiefest in any victory. For at the battell of MARATHON, Miltiades was the generall: and at the battell of SALAMINA, Themistocles: and at the iorney of PLATÆES, king Pausanias, as Herodotus sayeth, who wryteth that he had a maruelous victory there. And there were that striued with Aristides for the second place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valliant seruice at those battells. Now Cato was generall him selfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthines and counsell, during the warre he made in SPAYNE, while he was Consull. Afterwards also in the iorney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowen in the contry of THERMOPYLES, Cato being but a Colonell of a thousande footemen, and seruinge vnder an other that was Consull, wanne the honor of the victory, when he did sodainely set vpon Antiochus behinde, whereas he looked only to defend him selfe before. And that victory, without all doubt was one of the chiefest actes that euer Cato did, who draue ASIA out of GREECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to passe afterwardes into ASIA. So then for the warres, neither the one nor the other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, Aristides was supplanted by Themistocles, who by practise got him to be banished ATHENS for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greatest and noblest men of ROME that were in his time, sworne enemies vnto him: and hauing alwayes contended with them euen to his last hower, he euer kept him selfe on sounde grounde, like a stoute champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foyle. For he hauing accused many before the people, and many also accusing him: him selfe was neuer once condemned, but alwayes his tongue was the buckeler and defence of his life and innocency. Which was to him so necessary a weapon, and with it he could help himselfe so in great matters, that (in my opinion) it was only cause why he neuer receiued dishonor, nor was vniustly condemned: rather then for any thing else he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truely, eloquence is a singular gift, as Antipater witnesseth, in that he wrote of Aristotle the Philosopher after his death: saying, that amongest many other singular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he coulde perswade what he listed. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a city: a parte whereof is Oeconomia, cõmonly called houserule, considering that a city is no other, then an assembly of many households and houses together, & then is the city commonly strong & of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wise and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that banished golde and siluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them money of iron, that woulde be marred with fyre & vinegre when it was hot, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not onely cut of all superfluous expences that commonly wayte vppon riches, but did also prouide that his people should lacke nothing necessary to liue withall, fearing more to see a begger and nedy persone dwellinge in his citie, and enioy the priuiledges of the same, then a proude man by reason of his riches. So me thinkes, Cato was as good a father to his household, as he was a good gouernor to the common wealth: for he did honestly increase his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by sauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof, in his booke he wrote sundry good rules and precepts. Aristides contrariwise, made iustice odious & slanderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans selfe that vsed iustice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth iustice so much, doth wishe vs withall to be good husbandes, reprouing sloth and idlenes, as the roote and originall of all iniustice. And therefore me thinkes Homer spake wisely when he sayed.

Aristides and Catoes accesse to the common wealth.

Cato in marshall affaires excelled Aristides.

Aristides and Catoes displeasures in the common wealth.

The power of innocency & eloquence.

Oeconomia, houserule.

In times past, neither did I labor, carcke nor care for busines, for family, for foode, nor yet for fare:
but rather did delight, vvith shippes the seaes to saile, to drvvv a bovv, to fling a dart in vvarres, and to preuaile.

As giuing vs to vnderstand, that iustice & husbandry are two relatiues, & necessarily lincked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his owne thinges, nor house, doth liue vniustly, and taketh from other men. For iustice is not like oyle, which Phisitions say is very holsome for mannes body, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke

The nature of oyle.

A drinke it: neither ought a iuſt man to profitte ſtraungers, and in the ende not to care for him ſelfe nor his. Therefore, me thinkes this gouerninge vertue of Ariſtides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt authors wryte of him: that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leaue ſo much, as to mary his daughters withall, nor therewith to bury him ſelfe. Where thoſe of the houſe of Cato, continued Prætors and Conſulls of ROME, euen vnto the fourte diſcent. For his ſonnes ſonnes, and yet lower, his ſonnes ſonnes ſonnes came to the greateſt offices of dignity in all ROME. And Ariſtides, who was in his time the chiefeſt mã of GREECE, left his poſterity in ſo great pouerty, that ſome were compelled to become Soothſayers (that interprete dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might

No man wiſe, that is not wiſe to him ſelfe.

B be ſayd, pouerty of it ſelfe is neither ill nor diſhoneſt: but where it groweth by idlenes, careleſſe life, vanity, and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth apon any man that is honeſt, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iuſt, valliant, wiſe, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great ſigne of a noble minde. For it is vnpoſſible that man ſhould doe any great thinges, that had ſuch a baſe minde, as to thinke alwayes vppon trifles: and that he ſhoulde relieue the poore greatly, that lacketh him ſelfe reliefe in many thinges. And ſure, riches is not ſo neceſſary for an honeſt man that will deale truely in the common wealth, and gouernment, as is ſufficiency: which beinge a contentacion in it ſelfe, and deſirous of no ſuperfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his buſineſſe in the common wealth, that enioyeth the ſame. For God is he alone, who ſimply and abſolutely

Whether pouerty be an ill thing.

C hath no neede of any thinge at all: wherefore the chiefeſt vertue that can be in man, and that commeth neareſt vnto God, ought to be eſteemed that, which maketh man to haue neede of leaſt thinges. For like as a luſty body, and well complexioned, hath no neede of ſuperfluous fare and curious apparell: euen ſo a cleane life, and ſounde houſe, is kept with a litle charge, and ſo ſhoulde the goodes alſo be proportioned, accordinge to vſe and neceſſity. For he that gathereth much, and ſpendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no deſire to ſpend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do deſire it, and dare not for niggardlines ſpende parte of that he laboreth for, then is he miſerable. Now woulde I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vſe them, why do you boaſt then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth ſuffice you? and if it be a commendable thing (as in D troth it is) to be contented with the breade you finde, to drinke of the ſame tappe workemen and laborers do, not to care for purple dyed gownes, nor for houſes with plaſtered walles: it followeth then that neither Ariſtides, nor Epaminondas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haue forgotten any parte of their dueties, when they cared not for gettinge of that which they would not vſe nor occupy. For it was to no purpoſe for a man that eſteemed rootes and parſenippes to be one of the beſt diſhes in the worlde, and that did ſeeth them him ſelfe in his chimney, whileſt his wife did bake his bread, to talke ſo much of an Aſſe, and to take paines to wryte by what arte and induſtry a man might quickely enrich him ſelfe. For it is true, that ſufficiency, and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thinge: but it is bicauſe it taketh from vs all deſire of vnneceſſary thinges, and maketh vs not to paſſe for them.

E And therefore we finde that Ariſtides ſayd, when riche Callias caſe was pleaded, that ſuch as were poore againſt their willes, might wel be aſhamed of their pouerty: but ſuch as were willingly poore, had good cauſe, and might iuſtly reioyce at it. For it were a mad parte to thinke that Ariſtides pouerty proceeded of a baſe minde & ſlothfulnes, ſince he might quickely haue made him ſelfe rich without any diſhoneſty at all, by taking only the ſpoyle of ſome one of the barbarous people whome he had ouercome, or any one of their tentes. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victories and battells Cato had wonne, they did in maner

Whether Ariſtides faſhion or Catoes did moſt benefit their country.

F litle helpe to increaſe the Empire of ROME: for it was already ſo great, as it could almoſt be no greater. But Ariſtides victories are the greateſt conqueſtes and nobleſt actes that the GREECIANS euer did in any warres: as the iorney of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, and the battell of PLATEES. And yet there is no reaſon to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the walles of the citie of SPAYNE which Cato ouerthrewe and raſed, vnto ſo many thouſands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrowen and put to the ſword by the GREE-

CIANS, as well by lande, as by ſea. In all which ſeruices, Ariſtides was the chiefeſt before all other, as touching his valliantnes in fighting: notwithſtanding, he gaue other the glory of it, that deſired it more then him ſelfe, as he did eaſily alſo leaue the gold & ſiluer vnto thoſe, that had more neede of it then him ſelfe. Wherein he ſhewed him ſelfe of a nobler minde, then all they did. Furthermore, for my parte, I will not reproue Catoes manner, to commende and extoll him ſelfe ſo highly aboue all other, ſince he him ſelfe ſayth in an oration he made, that to praiſe himſelf is as much folly, as alſo to diſpraiſe himſelfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect, that deſireth other ſhould not praiſe him, then he that commonly doth vſe to praiſe him ſelfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great ſhew of humanity, & neceſſary for him that will liue amongeſt men of gouernment: and euen ſo, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuy vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Ariſtides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Ariſtides did help Themiſtocles his chiefeſt enemie, in all his nobleſt actes, and did ſerue him (as a man would ſay) like a priuate ſouldier that garded his perſone, when Themiſtocles was generall, beinge the onely inſtrument and meane of his glory: which was in deede the onely cauſe that the city of ATHENS was ſaued, and reſtored againe to her former good ſtate. Cato contrariwiſe, croſſing Scipio in all his enterpriſes, thought to hinder his voyage and iorney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hanniball, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and ſo in the ende, continuing him ſtill in iealouzy with the ſtate, and euer accuſinge of him, he neuer left him, till he had driuen him out of the city, and cauſed his brother Lucius Scipio to be ſhamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperaunce and modeſty, which Cato did euer commende ſo highly: Ariſtides truely kept them moſt ſincerely. But Catoes ſeconde wife, who maried a maide, (that was neither fit for his dignity and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifeſt cauſe. For he can not be excuſed with honeſty, that beinge a man paſt mariage, brought his ſonne that was maried, and his fayer daughter in lawe, a ſteppe mother into his houſe, and but a clearkes daughter, whoſe father did wryte for money, for any man that woulde hyer him. Take it Cato maried her to ſatisfie his luſt, or elſe for ſpite to be reuenged of his ſonne, bicauſe his ſonne coulde not abide his younge filth he had before: either of theſe turneth ſtill to his ſhame, as wel the effect, as alſo the cauſe. Againe, the excuſe he made to his ſonne why he maried, was alſo a lye. For if he had grounded his deſire in deede, to haue gotten other children, as he ſayd, that might be as honeſt men as his eldeſt ſonne: then ſurely he had done well after the death of his firſt wife, if he had ſought him an other wife ſoone after, that had bene of an honeſt houſe, and not to haue lien with a young harlatry filth, til his ſonne had ſpied him, and then when he ſaw it was knowen, to goe and mary her, and to make alliance with him, not bicauſe it was honorable for him to do it, but was eaſieſt to be obtained.

Ambition, a hatefull thing in the commō wealth.

Cato reproued for his ſecond wife.

THE LIFE OF Philopœmen.

IN the city of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caſſander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in gouernmẽt there, as any man of his time whatſoeuer. Notwithſtanding, fortune frowned on him in the ende, inſomuch as he was driuen out of his contry, and went to lye in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauſis, Philopœmenes father, a rare man, and nobly geuen in all thinges, and one that loued him alſo very well. Now ſo longe as Crauſis liued, Caſſander was ſo well vſed at his handes, that he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this worlde, Caſſander, to requite the loue Crauſis bare him in his life time, tooke his ſonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer ſayd Achilles was brought vp by the olde Phœnix. So this childe Philopœmen grewe to haue noble conditions, and increaſed alwayes from good to better. Afterwardes, when he came to grow to mans ſtate, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philoſophers that had bene hearers of Arceſilaus, in the ſchoole of Academia, and afterwardes employed all the Philoſophy they had learned, apon the gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of ſtate, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyranny of Ariſtodemus, who kept it in ſubiection, by corrupting thoſe that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus alſo to driue the tyran Nicocles, out of SICYONE. At the requeſt of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuil diſſention & factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the ſtate of the common wealth, and ſtabliſhed good lawes for them. But for them ſelues, they reckened the education and bringing vp of Philopœmen, the chiefeſt acte that euer they did: iudging that they had procured an vniuerſall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of ſo noble a nature, in the rules and precepts of Philoſophy. And to ſay truely, GREECE did loue him paſſingly well, as the laſt valliant man ſhe brought foorth in her age, after ſo many great and famous auncient Captaines: and did alwayes increaſe his power and authority, as his glory did alſo riſe. Whereupon there was a ROMAINE, who to praiſe him the more, called him the laſt of the GREEKIANS: meaninge, that after him, GREECE neuer brought foorth any worthy perſone, deſeruinge the name of a GREECIAN. And now concerninge his perſone, he had no ill face, as many ſuppoſe he had for his whole image is yet to be ſeene in the city of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were aliue. And for that they reporte of his hoſteſſe in the city of MEGARA, who tooke him for a ſeruing man: that was by reaſon of his curteſie, not ſtanding vppon his reputacion, and bicauſe he went plainely beſides. For ſhe vnderſtanding that the Generall of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there all night, ſhe beſturred her, and was very buſie preparinge for his ſupper, her husband paraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane ſeaſon came Philopœmen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The ſimple woman ſeeinge him no better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and ſo prayed him to lende her his hande in the kitchin. He ſtraight caſt of his cloke, and beganne to fall to hewe wodde. So, as Philopœmen was buſie about it, in commeth her husbande, and findinge him riuinge of wodde: ha ha ha, ſayd he, my Lorde Philopœmen, why what meaneth this? Truely nothing elſe, ſayd he in his DORICAN tongue, but that I am puniſhed, bicauſe I am neither fayer boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius ſayed one day vnto him, ſeeminge to mocke him for his perſonage: O Philopœmen, thou haſt fayer handes, and good legges, but thou haſt no belly, for he was fine in the waſte, and ſmall bodied. Notwithſtandinge, I take it this ieaſtinge tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body: bicauſe he had both good horſemen, and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. Theſe geaſtes, ſchollers haue taken vppe in ſchooles, of Philopœmen. But now to diſcend to his nature and conditions: it ſeemeth that the ambition and deſire he had to winne honor in his doinges, was not without ſome heate and wilfullnes. For, bicauſe he would altogether follow Epaminondas ſteppes, he ſhewed his hardines to enterpriſe any thing, his wiſedome to execute all great matters, and his integrity alſo, in that no money could corrupt him: but in ciuill matters and controuerſies, he coulde hardly otherwhiles keepe him ſelfe within the bondes of modeſty, pacience, and curteſie, but woulde often burſt out into choller, and wilfulnes. Wherfore it ſeemeth, that he was a better Captaine for warres, then a wiſe gouernor for peace. And in deede, euen from his youth he euer loued ſouldiers, and armes, and delited marueloufly in all martiall exerciſes: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of horſes gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And bicauſe he ſeemed to haue a naturall gift in wreſtling, certaine of his frendes, and ſuch as were carefull of him, did wiſhe him to geue himſelfe moſt vnto that exerciſe. Then he asked them, if their life that made ſuch profeſſion, would be no hinderaunce to their martiall exerciſes. Aunſwere was made him againe, that the diſpoſition of the perſone, and manner of life that wreſtlers vſed, and ſuch as followed like exerciſes, was altogether contrary to the life and diſcipline of a ſouldier, and ſpecially touching life and limme. For wreſtlers ſtudied altogethet to keepe them ſelues in good plight, by much ſleeping, eating, and drinking, by laboring, and taking their eaſe at certaine howers, by not miſſinge a iotte of their exerciſes: and beſides, were in hazard to looſe the force and ſtrength of their body, if they did ſurfit neuer ſo litle, or paſſed their ordinary courſe & rule of diet. Where ſouldiers contrariwiſe are vſed to all chaunge, and diuerſitie of life, and ſpecially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardneſſe, and ſcarſity, and to watche in the night without ſleepe. Philopœmen hearing this, did not onely forſake thoſe exerciſes, and ſcorned them, but afterwardes beinge Generall of an army, he ſought by all infamous meanes he coulde to put downe all wreſtling, and ſuch kinde of exerciſe, which made mennes bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become ſouldiers for to fight in defence of their contry, that otherwiſe would haue bene very able and handſome for the ſame. When he firſt left his booke and ſchoolemaſters, and beganne to weare armor in inuaſions the MANTINEIANS vſed to make vppon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get ſome ſpoyle on a ſodaine, or to deſtroy a parte of their contry. Philopœmen then would euer be the formoſt to go out, and the hindermoſt to come in. When he had leaſure, he vſed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquainte his body with toyle and trauell, or elſe he would be digging of his groundes. For he had a fayre mannor, not paſſinge twenty furlonges out of the city, whether he would walke commonly after dinner or ſupper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lye vpon ſome ill fauored mattreſſe, as the meaneſt laborer he had, and in the morninge by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine men to labor in his vineyard, or elſe with his plough men to follow the plough, and Philopœmen, haſty and wilfull.

Philopœmen delighted in warre & martiall exerciſes.

Philopœmen did reproue wreſtling.

A and ſomtimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his frendes and other officers of the ſame. Whatſoeuer he could ſpare and get in the warres, he ſpent it in buying of goodly horſes, in makinge of fayer armors, or payinge his poore contry mens ranſome, that were taken priſoners in the warres: but for his goodes & reuenue, he ſought onely to increaſe them, by the profit of tillage, which he eſteemed the ieſteſt and beſt way of getting of goodes. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and ſtudy apon it, as one that thought it fit for euery noble man & gentleman ſo to trauaill, gouerne, and increaſe his owne, that he ſhould haue no occaſion to couet or vſurpe an other mannes. He tooke no pleaſure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to read all ſortes of bookes of Philoſophy: but thoſe onely that would teache him moſt to become vertuous. Neither did he much B care to read Homers workes, ſauinge thoſe places onely that ſtirred vp mens hartes moſt vnto valliantnes. But of all other ſtories, he ſpecially delited to read Euangelus bookes, which treated of the diſcipline of warres, how to ſet battells, and declared the actes and geaſtes of Alexander the great, ſayinge: that men ſhoulde euer bringe his wordes vnto deedes, onleſſe men would take them for vaine ſtories, and thinges ſpoken, but not to profit by. For in his bookes of the feates of warre, and how battells ſhoulde be ordered, he was not onely contented to ſee them drawen and ſet out, in cartes and mappes: but would alſo put them in execution, in the places them ſelues as they were ſet out. And therefore, when the army marched in order of battell in the fielde, he woulde conſider and ſtudy with him ſelfe, the ſodaine euentes and approches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they comming downe to the val- C ley, or going out of a plaine, were to paſſe a riuer or a ditche, or through ſome ſtraight: alſo when he ſhould ſpread out his army, or elſe gather it narrow: and this he did not only fore caſt by him ſelfe, but woulde alſo argue the ſame with the Captaines that were about him. For Philopœmen doubtleſſe was one of the odde men of the worlde, that moſt eſteemed the diſcipline of warre, (and ſometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the moſt large field and moſt frutefull ground that valliantnes could be exerciſed in: ſo that he deſpiſed & contemned all that were no ſouldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes kinge of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the ſodaine, and gaue an aſſault to the city of MEGALIPOLIS, ſo luſtely, that he draue backe the watche and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopœmen hearinge of it, ranne immediatly to the reſcue. Ne- D uertheleſſe, though he fought very valliantly, and did like a noble ſouldier, yet he coulde not repulſe the enemies, nor driue them out of the city. But by this meanes he got his citizens leaſure, and ſome time to get them out of the towne to ſaue them ſelues, ſtaying thoſe that followed them: and made Cleomenes ſtill waite vpon him, ſo that in the end he had much a do to ſaue him ſelfe being the laſt man, and very ſore hurt, & his horſe alſo ſlaine vnder him. Shortely after, Cleomenes being aduertiſed that the MEGALOPOLITANS were gotten into the city of MESSINA, ſent vnto them to let them vnderſtād, that he was ready to deliuer them their city, lands, & goods againe. But Philopœmen ſeeing his contrymen very glad of theſe newes, & that euery man prepared to returne againe in haſt: he ſtayd them with theſe perſwaſions, ſhewing them that Cleomenes deuiſe was not to redeliuer thē their city, but rather to take thē together E with their city: foreſeeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked walles and empty houſes, and that him ſelfe in the ende ſhould be compelled to goe his way. This perſwaſion ſtayed the MEGALOPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occaſion to burne and plucke downe a great parte of the city, and to cary away a great ſumme of money, and a great ſpoyle. Afterwardes, when kinge Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS againſt Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the toppe of the mountaines of Sellaſia, and kepe all the paſſages and wayes vnto them out of all thoſe quarters: king Antigonus ſet his army in battel hard by him, determining to ſet vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could poſſibly. Philopœmen was at that time amongeſt the horſemen with his citizens, who had the LEFT HAND on the ſide of them, being a great number of footemen & excellent good ſouldiers, which F did ſhut in the taile of all the army. So they were commaunded to ſtand ſtil, and to keepe their place, vntill ſuch time as they did ſhew them a redde coate of armes on the toppe of a pyke, from the other wing of the battell, where the king him ſelfe ſtoode in perſone. ding this straight cõmaundement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no lenger, but went to see if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwise, kept their place and order, as they were commaunded. Euclidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing thus their enemies footemen were seuered from their horsemen, sodainly sent the lightest armed souldiers & lustiest fellowes he had in his bands, to geue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behinde, to proue if they coulde make them turne their faces on them, bicause they had no horsemen for their garde. This was done, and these light armed men did maruelously trouble and disorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopœmen perceiuinge that, and considering howe these light armed men would be easily broken and driuen backe, since occasion selfe inforced them to it: he went to tell the kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes. But when he saw he could not make them vnderstand it, and that they made no reckening of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, bicause he had not yet attained any credit or estimacion to be iudged a man, that could inuent or execute any stratageame of warre: he went thither him selfe, and tooke his citizens with him. And at his first comming, he so troubled these light armed men, that he made them flie, and slue a number of them. Moreouer, to encorage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them geue a lusty charge vppon the enemies, whilest they were thus troubled and out of order: he left his horse, and marched a foote vp hill and downe hill, in rough and stony wayes, full of springs and quauemyres, being heauely armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fightinge in this sorte very painefully and vneasily, he had both his thighes past through with a dart, hauinge a leather thonge on the middest of it. And though the blow did not take much holde of the flesh, yet was it a stronge blow, for it pearced both thighes through & through, that the iron was seene on thother side. Then was he so combered with this blow, as if he had bene shackled with irons on his feete, and knew not what to doe: for the leather fastened in the middest of the darte, did greue him maruelously, when they thought to haue pulled the darte out of the place where it entred in, so as neuer a man about him durst set his handes to it. Philopœmen on the other side, seeing the fight terrible on either side, and would soone be ended: it spited him to the guttes, he would so faine haue bene among them. So at the length he made such struggling, putting backe one thigh, and setting forward an other, that he knapped the staffe of the darte a funder, and made them pull out the two troncheons, the one on this side, and the other on the other side. Then when he saw he was at liberty againe, he tooke his sword in his hande, and ranne through the middest of them that fought, vnto the foremost ranckes, to meete with the enemy: so that he gaue his men a newe corage, and did set them on fyre with enuy, to followe his valliantnesse. After the battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captaines, to proue them: who moued the horsemen to deuide them selues, and giue the charge, before the signe that was commaunded. They aunswered him, that they were forced to doe it against their willes, bicause a young MEGALOPOLITAN gentleman gaue a charge with his company, before the signe was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the parte of a wise and valliant Captaine. This exployte, together with Antigonus testimony, gaue great reputacion vnto Philopœmen, as we may easily imagine. So king Antigonus maruelously intreated him he would serue with him, and offered him a bande of men at armes, and great entertainement, if he would go with him. But Philopœmen refused his offer, and chiefly, bicause he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commaunded by any. Nothwithstandinge, bicause he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into CRETA, where he knewe there were warres, onely to continue him selfe in exercise thereof. So when he had serued a longe time with the CRETANS, which were valliant souldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of warre, and moreouer were men of a moderate and spare dyet: he returned home againe to ACHAIA, with so great credit and reputacion of euery one, that he was presently chosen Generall of all the horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he foun de many horsemen very ill horsed, vpon litle Iades, such as might be gotten cheapest, & how they vsed not to goe them selues in persone to the warres, but did sende other in their steade: and to be shorte, how they neither had hartes, nor experience of the warres, and all bicause the Generalls and Captaines of the people of the ACHAIANS that serued before him, did take no heede

A to thoſe matters, as fearinge to offende any, bicauſe they had the greateſt authority in their handes, to puniſh or reward whom they thought good. Philopœmen fearinge none of all theſe thinges, would leaue no parte of his charge and duety vndone, but went him ſelfe in perſone to all the cities, to perſwade and encorage the young gentlemen, to be well horſed, and well armed, that they might winne honor in the fielde, be able to defende them ſelues, and ouerthrow their enemies. And where perſwaſion could doe no good, there he would ſet fynes vpon their heades that ſo refuſed, and did vſe to muſter them oft, and did acquainte them with tilting, turning, and barriers, and one to fight with an other, and at ſuch times and places ſpecially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the lookinge on: that in ſhorte ſpace he made them very forwarde, proper, and ready horſemen, whoſe chiefeſt pro-
B perty is, to keepe their order and ranckes in the battell. So as when neceſſitie ſerued for the whole company of horſemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or elſe euery man by him ſelfe: they were ſo throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe ſet in battell ray, did ſeeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued ſo together, and withall ſo eaſily, and at all times, and ſo oft, as turne they woulde on the one ſide, or on the other. Now in a great battell the ACHAIANS had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the riuer of Lariſſus: Demophantus, Generall of the horſemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopœmen, who alſo made towardes him, and gaue him firſt ſuch a blow with his ſpeare, that he ſtrake him ſtarke deade. When Demophantus fell to the grounde, his ſouldiers fled by and by vpon it. This wanne Philopœmen great honor, who gaue no place to the youngeſt men
C in fighting moſt valliantly with his owne handes: nor to the oldeſt men in wiſedome, for the wiſe leading of his army. In deede the firſt man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAIA was of ſmall reckeninge, bicauſe the cities of the ſame ſtoode deuided betwene them ſelues, and Aratus was the firſt manne that made them ioyne together, and ſtabliſhed amonge them an honeſt ciuill gouernment. Whereby it happened, that as we ſee in brookes and riuers where any litle thinge ſtoppeth and falleth to the bottome, which the courſe of the water bringeth downe the ſtreame, there the reſt that followeth doth vſe to ſtay, and goe no further: euen ſo in the cities of GREECE that were in harde ſtate, and ſore weakened, by faction one againſt an other, the ACHAIANS were the firſt that ſtayed themſelues, and grewe in amity one with the other, and afterwardes D drewe on the reſt of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederats. Some by helpinge and deliueringe them from the oppreſſion of tyrans, and winninge other alſo by their peaceable gouernment and good concorde: they had a meaninge in this wiſe, to bringe all the contrie of PELOPONNESVS into one body and league. Neuertheleſſe, while Aratus liued, they depended moſt apon the ſtrength and power of the MACEDONIANS: firſt with ſtickinge vnto kinge Ptolomie, and then vnto Antigonus, and laſt to Philip, who ruled in manner all the ſtate of GREECE. But when Philopœmen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefeſt man, the ACHAIANS beinge ſtronge enough to reſiſt the ſtrongeſt, woulde marche then no more vnder any other bodies enſigne, nor woulde ſuffer any more ſtraunge gouernors or Captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it ſeemed) was ſomewhat to ſofte and colde for the E warres, and therefore the moſt thinges he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the kinges frendſhippes with whome he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopœmen beinge a manne of execution, hardy and valliant of perſone, and of very good fortune, in the firſt battell that he euer made, did maruelouſly encreaſe the corage and hartes of the ACHAIANS: bicauſe vnder his charge they euer foiled their enemies, and alwayes hadde the vpper hande ouer them. The firſt thinge Philopœmen beganne withall at his comming, he chaunged the manner of ſettinge of their tables, and their facion of arminge them ſelues. For before they caried litle light targettes, which bicauſe they were thinne and narrowe, did not couer halfe their bodies, and vſed ſpeares farre ſhorter then pykes, by reaſon whereof they were very light, and good to skirmiſhe and fight a farre of:
F but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then hadde great vantage of them. As for the order of their battelles, they knewe not what it ment, nor to caſt them ſelues into a ſnaill or ringe, but onely vſed the ſquare battell, nor yet gaue it any ſuch fronte where the pykes of many ranckes might puſhe together, and where the ſouldiers might ſtande ſo cloſe A that their targettes ſhould touch one an other, as they do in the ſquadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reaſon whereof, they were ſoone broken, and ouerthrowen. Philopœmen reformed all this, perſwading them to vſe the pyke and ſhielde, in ſteade of their litle target, ſpeare, or boreſtaffe, and to put good morryans or burganettes on their heades, corſelettes on their bodies, and good taſſes and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not geuinge a foote of grounde, as light armed men that runne to and fro in a skirmiſhe. And thus hauinge perſwaded and taught the younge men to arme them ſelues throughlie, firſt he made them the bolder and more coragious to fight, as if they had bene menne that coulde not haue bene ouercome: then he turned all their vaine ſuperfluous charge, into neceſſarie and honeſt expences. But he could not poſſibly bring them al- B togither from their vaine and riche apparell, they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceede an other: nor from their ſumptuous furniture of houſes, as in beddes, hanginges, curious ſeruice at the table, and delicate kinde of diſhes. But to beginne to withdrawe this de-ſire in them which they hadde, to be fine and delicate, in all ſuperfluous and vnneceſſarie things, and to like of thinges neceſſarie, and profitable: he wiſhed them to looke more nerely to their ordinarie charge about them ſelues, takinge order as well for their apparell, as alſo Philopœmen turned all curioſity and dainty fare, into braue & riche armors.
